Probably the oldest published work on this subject was by Schumacher and is entitled "The Disinfection of Railroad Coaches in Repair Shops."[3] In Europe such chambers exist in Potsdam, Cologne-Nippes, Posen, Zagreb, Budapest, Bucharest, Sarajevo, Skoplje. The most ideal arrangement is a circulatory system, which can handle even the most poisonous substance with ease and safety. There are also fumigation tunnels, as in Sarajevo for example, which can handle two railroad cars at a time. Of importance is the rapid and uniform distribution of the gas by means of circulation ducts or blowers, at least partly because the speed of the operation is the very key to its efficiency. Only relatively small amounts of the gas are necessary for this work. A Zyklon container with 500 grams of hydrocyanic acid is already sufficient to delouse a modern express passenger railroad car (approx. 200 cubic meters); larger containers are used in the fumigation tunnels where 500 to 1000 grams of hydrocyanic acid, depending upon the temperature, are used per 100 cubic meters of interior volume—the higher the temperature, the greater the effect of any given amount of the gas.[4]

Another hydrocyanic acid method which has recently been used here and there is the spreading of Calcid, a powdery cyanide of calcium (zyanwasserstoffsäurem Kalzium), which reacts with the moisture in the air and gives off quantities of hydrocyanic acid but which leaves traces behind whose removal is time consuming. Because of the greater amounts of material which are needed to achieve an effective gas concentration, one must also expect longer fumigating periods (längere Arbeitsbelastung).

It should also be emphasized that the use of hydrocyanic acid gas, on passenger railroad cars for example, has absolutely no effect on upholstery, leather, fabrics, metals, paints and interior furnishings of any sort.

On June 23, 1942 the Reich Ministry of Transport issued an unpublished decree to plant managers and others which specifies the measures to prevent the spread of typhus (Disinfection of passenger cars and freight cars). Only a small number of disinfection substances are mentioned.

In 1941 a decree was published regarding the removal of contagious substances from trains and ships engaged in the transport of livestock within the Generalgouvernement [those parts of German-occupied Poland that were not annexed] which specified precisely when and under what circumstances trains had to be immaculately cleaned and disinfected; and also, which chemicals could be used for this purpose. The chemicals which were permitted were primarily a mixture of cresol and sulfuric acid, caustic soda solution, concentrated watersoluble chloride of lime preparations or raw chloramin (Rohchloramin). It can be noted also that a single certifiable cleaning and disinfestation made within the German Reich, would be sufficient [to meet the regulation].

Dry heat together with vacuum (Unterdruck) has also been used to disinfest railroad cars. This hot air process has, however, not proven itself successful in the long run; furthermore, it only works in stationary chambers, as long as sufficient fuel is available for heating.

For all practical purposes, the best method for the fumigation of small spaces on ships is probably with T-gas (ethyloxide).

No less important, but particularly during peace time, are the methods for exterminating rats on ships. It is well known that the rats which exist on every large ocean liner can spread the plague bacillus, the germ of this terrible disease, which lives on or in the rat flea. One used to try to kill off the ship rats with makeshift methods. In America one tried at first to use poison gas. Ever since the International Sanitary Convention which was ratified on June 21, 1926 in Paris by most countries of the world[6] this despicable dangerous parasite has been fought in an organized fashion. Of course, one has tried to get rid of the rats, as already mentioned, from ships arriving from countries which may be plague-infested. At this point, the method which comes to mind is the very practical Nocht-Giemsa process (producer gas) which was formerly used in the harbor of Hamburg. The fight against ship rats became a universal responsibility only with the implementation of the international treaty mentioned above which provided for uniform procedures for the control of contagious disease and, of special importance, even went so far as to specify the actual measures for controlling the spread of diseases that are a public menace because of international shipping.

In Germany one worked a great deal with sulfur dioxide (according to the Clayton Method or through the generation of SO_2 from carbon disulfide, Salforkose, and sulfur preparations, etc), but this was steadily replaced by hydrocyanic acid over the years. The spreading of poisonous bait had only limited success on ocean-going vessels because the rodents within the cabins, galleys, and cargo bays were able to find more suitable food elsewhere. The "ratproofing" system which was introduced sometime ago in the United States of America did not prove itself over the long run.

This method relied upon simple devices to prevent rats from climbing onto ships at dockside without considering the fact that these animals could also be brought on board with the cargo.

Regarding ship disinfestation in general, hydrocyanic acid won hands down over the competition. Appropriate personnel for the intended tasks are the exterminators, health inspectors and fumigation companies. The certification of the fumigation results is the responsibility of the harbor authorities.

Aside from pest rats—laboratory experiments in Algiers have shown that a single rat may at times carry as many as 2500 fleas and each flea can be the host to 5000 pest bacilli[7]—one must also mention mice (Weilsche disease), lice (typhus), mosquitoes (malaria, yellow fever), and flies (typhoid, dysentery) as carriers of disease on ships.[8] With the regular control of the most dangerous parasites, the rats, one is also controlling all other vermin on board as well; of course, this includes bed bugs, fleas and cockroaches.

Hydrocyanic acid gas kills all vermin including the brood and, because of its great ability to penetrate, is able to fill every space as well as all cracks and hiding places as no other gas available for pest control purposes and, as has already been mentioned, is harmless to furnishings and cargo because of its chemical inactivity.[9] Even foodstuffs need to be removed only if they happen to be uncovered liquids. But live animals and plants, photographic products, raw coffee and tea must all be removed from aboard ship. For years hydrocyanic acid has been applied in the form of Zyklon. The ship being fumigated must be cleared of all people except for the ship's watch and must be distinguished until the ship is released by means of a special flag by day and by a particular light by night.

A few words are still necessary regarding rat elimination from decks with Calcid. On the basis of experience, rats are often present, for example, in the steampipe insulation, under the winches, in the potato bins, lifeboats and similar equipment. For the procedure to be successful, it is necessary to exterminate these as well. Whereas when one is working with Zyklon one simply spreads out the contents of a can upon pieces of paper, on deck one normally uses Calcid tablets [instead] which are ground into a fine powder in a pulverizer and blown onto the locations to be disinfected.

Regarding the hygienic treatment of ocean-going vessels in German harbors, there is a regulation from the Reich Minister of the Interior dated December 21, 1931[10] in which the extermination of rats is regulated in Paragraph 12.

That the field of hygiene for transportation vehicles has been extended just recently to include airplanes is not really surprising since it has been established that dangerous disease carriers can even be carried by aircraft. The danger is especially great when the airplanes land in regions which are still today a constant source for disease.[11] In the International Sanitary Treaty for Air Travel of April 12, 1933 (The Hague) a series of preventive measures have been established for the removal of vermin and rats as well as for sanitary services in airports and the possible quarantine of travelers, the treatment of the sick and—under certain circumstances—the pest control of goods and mail. Foremost among the diseases which can be carried are: plague, cholera, yellow fever, typhus and smallpox. In the treaty just mentioned, the controlling substances are not specified. However, at the conference of the International Sanitary Office in Paris in May of 1937 a report from the Quarantine Commission for Air Travel discussed pyrethrum powder, hydrocyanic acid and other fumigating substances for killing mosquitoes on aircraft and also indicated the toxicity of these gases for humans.

In reality, it is very difficult to disinfect aircraft with gas even though it has been done in the past and will continue be done again many more times. A fumigation of a covered aircraft (often practically impossible because of the often immense proportions of the wings) or an aircraft in a hangar is possible. However, it is necessary to protect the expensive, important, often oil-enclosed and not hermetically sealed instruments in the cockpit; oils can absorb gas—they can even combine chemically with them.

Aedes and anopheles, the carriers of yellow fever and malaria, are most effectively destroyed with gas but these species of mosquitoes can also be exterminated with pyrethrum-based insecticides. In the United States one is less particular. Griffiths and Michel[12] recommend without any reservations the use of hydrocyanic acid preparations and Carboxide, a mixture similar to the German Cartox which is made from ethyl oxide and carbon dioxide. In South Africa and even North America, airplanes were already treated without any hesitation with Zyklon with special care for the wing interior spaces which could not be sealed. Nonetheless, the use of highly toxic gas (by the natives) in transcontinental air traffic has not yet established itself; similarly, it has not been possible, at least for the time being, to implement the plan to build mosquitofree aircraft.

Before World War 2 Germany had no special reason to disinfest aircraft for hygienic reasons. However, many experiments had been initiated which could not be completed under the circumstances—otherwise, German discoveries would have certainly pioneered in this field once again.

It is hardly necessary to mention the demothing of automobiles (passenger vehicles) and the fumigation of trucks for the extermination of vermin that infest foodstuffs. Clothes moths, including their brood, as well as other vermin which infest foodstuffs and provisions can be easily neutralized with sulfur dioxide (difficult to remove), T-gas and, most of all, hydrocyanic acid. The methods are, as is apparent from the above, simple and safe; but, these measures play almost no role as far as hygiene is concerned. Delousing of passenger vehicles (carriages, streetcars, boats) is regulated by a decree from the Reich Minister of the Interior of February 13, 1941.[13]

In closing, it should be added that [supposedly] louse-infested railroad trains, airplanes, etc., are in reality often quite harmless because there simply may not even be a single louse present. As Rose[14] explains, it is not the suspected means of transportation but quite often it is the louse-infested people themselves in close proximity to one another in overcrowded vehicles who are the true source of the lice. In other words, one should not overestimate the benefits to be derived from a totally lifeless transport vehicle.

APPENDIX C

The Epidemiology of Typhus in the Generalgouvernement

(Zur Epidemiologie des Fleckfiebers im Generalgouvernement)

by Assistant Physician Prof. Dr. E. Zimmermann (deceased at the front)

translated by F. P. Berg and I. Steinwarder from:
Zeitschrift für Hygiene und Infektionskrankheiten, Vol. 123
(Berlin: Springer Verlag, 1942), Heft 5, pp. 552-7.

Typhus has always reigned as an endemic disease in the Eastern and Southeastern provinces of the former Polish state. This was especially true for the provinces of Wilna, Nowogrodek and Stanislawow. Here during severe outbreaks, about 510% and more of the population would fall ill annually whereas in the Western parts of Poland, the disease declined steadily over the years so that it was virtually unknown in the present Warthegau or else occurred only in isolated cases or clusters without any tendency to spread. During the last years before the present war, the pestilence had almost been eradicated within the central parts of the country, just as conditions in the Eastern parts were also improving. That the present wartime dislocations would again increase the frequency of typhus was to be expected since it had always been a typical plague of war, but the magnitude of the reoccurrence in 1940 was many times less than had been expected. If we adjust the number of previously reported cases [for all of Poland] in order to try to get numbers that only apply to the area of the present day Generalgouvernement—obviously, these values will be only rough approximations in order to be able to make comparisons with those for 1940—we get the following.

Typhus occurrences per year in the present-day Generalgouvernement.

1920	34,000	1931	420
1921	10,000	1932	500
1922	8,500	1933	680
1923	2,200	1934	1,000
1924	1,500	1935	800
1925	800	1936	740
1926	700	1937	680
1927	600	1938	700
1928	500	1939	?
1929	400	1940	7,900

Obviously, the statistics can not show all occurrences because it can be assumed that, at the very least, the undiagnosed, mild cases were not reported. It is quite possible that the true morbidity rates are actually double or triple the values which have been reported.

It is well-known that during the world war [World War I], typhus had been widespread on the Eastern front and had caused sickness among our own troops. Then in 1919-1920, the Russian-Polish war came again with great troop movements, refugee treks, food shortages, great poverty and from 1921-1922, the Poles returned in great waves from plague-infested Russia. And so, it is not at all surprising that Typhus exanthematicus developed dramatically at that time. With the gradual consolidation of the political situation, which resulted in an improvement in the general hygienic conditions, the pestilence subsided quickly and steadily until the general economic crisis of 1930-33 with its unemployment interrupted the favorable progress and brought with it another peak in typhus mortality in 1934. After that, conditions improved once again. Although many attempts have been made to try to relate the reduction of the epidemic to the anti-typhus inoculations given by Weigl after 1930, the contribution of these inoculations to the favorable development could only have been rather modest since the decline of the typhus had already begun earlier. According to Weigl, 67,893 persons had been vaccinated but these were predominantly doctors, sanitary personnel, civil servants, people close to patients and others who might be endangered by close contact.

It was inevitable that troop and refugee movements, in addition to economic difficulties arising from the developments in 1939, would lead to a re-emergence of the epidemic but an ever-increasing number of cases in strength could only be expected at the beginning of 1940 since the usual course of the typhus epidemic would produce many cases. At any rate, since the morbidity rate did not increase more than usual in 1940 and since our troops were practically unaffected by the disease, a number of favorable factors were cited: on the one hand, ideological beliefs of our troops resulted in less fraternization with the Jewish population, i.e., the carriers of the epidemic, than during the world war. On the other hand, this war was over too quickly to allow the disease to establish itself and to spread. Additionally, this time the refugee treks came, in contrast to the years after the world war, not from a center of contagion (Seuchenherd), but from the West, from a region which was free of the pestilence.

Although it was in the nature of earlier population figures and epidemiological statistics in Poland that there are no exact numbers available, nonetheless the Jewish share [(Anteil der Juden)—emphasized as in the original] in the typhus phenomenon has obviously always been rather high. Normally it seems to have been about 70%-80%, but in 1940 the Jewish share in some communities was 95% or even more of all typhus cases. We personally had the opportunity to study an outbreak of the epidemic in greatest possible detail in one town with approximately 30,000 inhabitants of whom about 11,000 were Jews. Of the 303 cases of the illness, 295 were among Jews, i.e., 97% among Jews and only 3% among Poles. For our further investigations it was important that we examined the significance of age of the people in the homes affected by typhus. A total of 3464 Jewish persons, living more or less without any non-Jewish intermingling, were evaluated statistically.

The mortality of the disease in all these years seems to be surprisingly low. For the years following the world war, the rate was 7%-9% with the exception of 13.4% for 1920. Thereafter, the mortality rate decreased to 5.2% in 1938 and in 1940 to 5.6%. However, many mild cases may not have been reported so that the hazards of the illness might, in fact, be even less.

If it seemed as if Jews were especially resistant to typhus, that picture changed as soon as age was taken into consideration (Table 2, Column a). More than half of all the cases of illness which were observed by us were of persons less than 20 years of age, and one quarter of the total number of cases occurred among persons between 16 and 20 years of age. It should not be necessary to explain any further that the usually favorable course of the disease for this age group lessened the mortality rate in general. Contrary to the widespread opinion that Jews are less susceptible to typhus, the mortality rate of approximately of 5% for the 16 to 20 year old group and 25-30% for middle-aged adults (Table 2, column C) is absolutely normal. This fact appears favorable only because the typhus of 1940 affected primarily children and adolescents. Perhaps this had also been the case in former years with the exception of 1920 and its higher death rate.

Morbidity and Mortality of Typhus in 1940

Age Group	(a) Age Combination of the ill in %	(b) % of ill in age groups	(c) Mortality
11-15	15.7	10.4	0
16-20	25.7	20.9	5.2
21-25	8.6	8.2	11.5
26-30	3.6	3.5	18.2
31-35	5.4	5.7
36-40	6.6	8.3	35
41-45	5.6	8.9	30
46-50	5.4	8.3	31
51-55	2	4.2	33

The high percentage of adolescents among the ill suggests an immunity of adults which might have been acquired during the epidemic years following the world war which protected them now even though typhus usually produces only limited immunity. This influence can only be examined more closely if we calculate the percentages of the affected within their respective age groups. To begin with, we can make the following estimate. The Jewish population over 20 which might have become immune after the heavy epidemics following the world war could not be more than 1.2 million in the Generalgouvernement. Assuming that 250,000 Jews had become ill at that time, then one can estimate very roughly that 25-30% of those who are 20 years old today would be immune while all the others in this age group and practically all adolescents in 1940 would have been susceptible. Our age calculations (Table 2, Column B) gave indeed few differentials which could have been appraised as partial immunity of the 20-year olds. The percentage of the 1620 year olds is conspicuously high because 77 out of 369 from the age group fell ill, while the 15 year olds might either have an inborn immunity or the illness developed abortive, which is typical at this age, and remained undiscovered. It is, however, a fact that in the beginning of 1940 enough people susceptible for the epidemic were available to spread the ground for epidemics during the next year.

In the area for which we were responsible—about a quarter of the Generalgouvernement—according to statistics and reports from doctors, typhus had occurred only sporadically before the year 1940. This was also evident from the fact that the younger people among them were not personally acquainted with the clinical facts of Typhus exanthematicus. Only a few towns showed an unexplained slight increase of morbidity during 1938 and 1939, while only only half a dozen cases showed up in towns with 10,000 to 20,000 inhabitants.

Thus, the winter of 1939-40 started at first with only a very limited number of cases. Only in 1940 did isolated cases occur at the same time or quickly following each other, mostly in small towns, in many cases in villages which had until now been untouched by the pestilence and which were far removed from each other. Of course, one imagined that a [single] carrier of typhus-infected lice might have caused the outbreak because of his wanderings, but this explanation remained unsatisfactory for all practical purposes. Very often the villages affected were 100 to 200 kilometers apart and it seemed unlikely that at a time of unusually severe cold with masses of snow on the ground that a person might have gone wandering over such great distances. It seemed much more likely that several virus carriers were wandering around who had sought shelter because of the weather conditions and had left the infection behind. Beggars and tramps have traditionally been the most important carriers. But it also has to be remembered for the first cases of an epidemic that a virus can remain alive in the lice excrements on clothing for a long time and that the re-use of winter clothing might result in new infections. Experiments conducted by Weigl showed that the virus is capable of infecting for several months.

After only a few individual cases had occurred in January and the beginning of February, the interconnection of which was unclear, the further course of the pestilence could be observed accurately. Sometimes the illness disappeared by itself, even without special protective measures being taken. In other cases, there were cases within the vicinity or greater outbreaks, these only in towns and often it could be verified how the typhus had been carried from one community to another. Very often, but not always, beggars and vagabonds were involved, but the principle cause was the lively Jewish wandering which still prevailed at that time. The elders of the Jewish communities were supposed to care for these wanderers, but this care often failed since Jewish solidarity was definitely not always as dependable in crisis as it should have been (Notfest) to include practical measures of disease prevention. Arrivals were very often considered and treated as unwanted guests in the communities. They were quickly urged to go away again with a small contribution and thereby promoted the wanderings. In other cases they were housed in mass quarters which quite frequently developed into terrible epidemic hotbeds. In extreme cases only 34 square meters of floor space and even less were made available per person.

Smaller communities with less than 7000 inhabitants and the flat countryside were generally at first hardly affected by the epidemic. Only in April and May, when under the influence of countermeasures and other factors the Typhus exanthematicus started to subside in the cities, several small farming communities were affected, even if the occurrences were limited to isolated cases. Here too, it was mostly Jews who became ill, but the Polish share was greater than in the cities. With regard to the unpleasant result that the typhus spread to the countryside and therefore evaded the measures used to combat the epidemic, this was caused to a significant degree by the fact that many Jews had succeeded in breaking out of the quarantine zones in the cities. Very often the inhabitants of a community could give very exact information as to who had brought the disease. Not infrequently, however, it was the Polish farmer who brought a typhus infection upon himself when he, as was customary, without comprehending the precariousness of his acts, took a wandering Jew along on his vehicle for a ride for part of journey.

As the month of May came to an end, the illnesses in the cities decreased markedly but the countryside was still very much affected. Numerically the high point had passed but the danger that farming communities would be dangerous endemic centers of contagion was not eliminated. Contrary to expectations and without any apparent reason, the number of affected persons declined suddenly in the second half of June in the countryside. Since for a long time already, about 20-25 small towns had been identified in which new cases were reported, the number suddenly fell back to 5 or 6. Shortly before there had been an increase in the summer temperatures and perhaps the increased formation of perspiration diminished the multiplication of lice and consequently the virus. This development was of course consistent with the usual decline for the disease during the summer months but the simultaneous decline over a wide area was striking, nevertheless, on the whole, the course of the epidemic was more or less typical because the late winter and early spring months had, just as during many other typhus outbreaks, brought the peak of the illnesses.

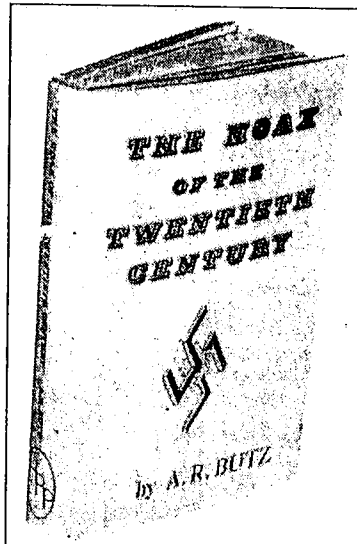
The subsequent course of the epidemic for the rest of the year 1940 was typical also. The summer months showed only isolated cases and it was only the month of November which slowly brought once again the winter rise of the pestilence.

Summary

(1) The epidemiological circumstances of typhus in the General-gouvernement in the year 1940 were examined thoroughly. (2) The results showed that the highest number of cases occurred within the age groups of 16-20, and that the percentage of Jews affected by typhus was on the average 70-80%, in some communities even 95-97%. (3) The mortality rate generally grew with increasing age. It was no less for Jews than for non-Jews.



Were six million Jews really gassed . . . or has a colossal hoax been perpetrated on the world?

Professor Butz has carefully investigated the alleged extermination of 6 million Jews during WW II and has written a book which thoroughly documents his startling findings. His book strips away the cover of fraud and deceit from this emotion-charged topic and lays bare the full and complete truth.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor/publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavour to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of our Western culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change, or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

THE SORRY RECORD

I have frequently cited in these pages Christian News, a weekly published in New Haven, Missouri, to which I have subscribed for years. I early recognized it as the best single source of information regarding religious activities in the United States, and over the years I slowly came to the conclusion that, strange as it will seem to anyone acquainted with modern journalism or contemporary Christianity, it is an honest newspaper.

Christian News is edited by the Reverend Mr. Herman Otten, who performs each week the astonishing feat of bringing out twenty-four or more folio pages of closely set newspaper type, and, it is said, performs it with no more assistance than is given by his wife and children. He is a clergyman of the Missouri Synod of the Lutheran Church, which he represents at its best, although his newspaper is not officially recognized by that denomination, and he is out of favor with its more ambitious promoters and salesmen, who often complain that he publishes news that should be kept from the church's customers.

The Missouri Synod and the much smaller Wisconsin Synod represent what is left of the Lutheran religion in this country. The three big corporations that purveyed that brand of Christianity were recently merged under the name Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, retaining 'Lutheran' for advertising purposes, since the more accurate term, 'Marxist,' might be bad for business.[1]

As a clergyman, the Reverend Mr. Otten was necessarily interested in the famous "Holocaust," although from an unusual standpoint, since he was interested in ascertaining the historical truth, rather than what attitude pays best. As you all know, the Jews refuse to debate their negligently contrived Holohoax, limiting themselves to screaming how wicked are the Neo-Nazis who presume to question anything God's People tell them, and to ordering their employees in the governments of the various Aryan nations to make their White pigs shut up. He accordingly proposed and sponsored an open debate on the question.

1. The new corporation publishes as its official propaganda organ seventeen times a year a small magazine, edited by a staff of thirteen editors, production managers, art directors, and the like, called The Lutheran, of which the issue for 1 March 1989 is before me, an expensively printed little bundle of obscene gabble, devoted principally to proving how pious White men and women must love niggers and all the mongrels, wogs, and Asiatic hybrids that are being imported in such quantities by the Jews' government to supplant and massacre Aryans when the time comes for breaking up the United States.

Mr. Otten cannot have foreseen, in his wildest imaginings, what the result of his proposal would be.

Two brash and ostentatiously Christian young attorneys—young, at least, in the photographs they supply the press—volunteered to represent the Jews in the debate. It would be good advertising, and lawyers are naturally eager to see their names and mugs in the newspapers, for it is widely believed that with enough publicity a wily man can rise to the eminence and prosperity attained by the protagonist of Hillary Waugh's brilliantly bitter novel, Parrish for the Defense. And winning the debate and wide acclaim in the jewspapers must have seemed easy, given the well-known lawyers' axiom: "The facts don't matter: it's what you can make the dumb clucks on the jury believe."

The presumably young lawyers were to appear in what would be an informal but uniquely spectacular trial, one in which they would be the mouthpieces of old Yahweh instead of Sammy the Shill.

Since our race surrendered long ago to the odd sociological convention described by Richard Swartzbaugh in The Mediators (Cape Canaveral, Howard Allen, 1973), lawsuits in our society, except those in which the rulers of the country dictate the verdicts to be rendered by their employees in the courts, are a kind of involved poker game. In civil (private) cases—and I have seen an estimate that eighty percent of all the lawsuits now pending in the world are in the United States—litigious persons well know that the outcome of a case in the courts will depend on the relative cleverness of the advocates they have hired to represent them. Any good attorney can, for a fee, surpass the professional Sophists whom Plato reprehended, and make black look not only white but pure gold.

In my youth I knew an old attorney who maintained that the sad state of the legal profession at that time, even before the vast corruption of the proto-Communist "New Deal" under the slimy War Criminal, could be traced to Abraham Lincoln. He admitted, of course, that the corruption in his day seemed to be the work of Jewish shysters, but he thought that behind that lay the example set by Lincoln.

Everyone has heard the story of the way in which Lincoln procured the acquittal of a murderer who had had the bad luck to commit the murder within sight of a chance witness, who recognized him and saw the crime by the light of the full moon. Having delayed the trial as long as he could, Lincoln, in his concluding address to the jury, produced and exhibited an almanac he had prepared by taking the cover of an almanac for the current year and putting it about tables taken from the almanac for a suitable year in the past. He was thus able to prove to the jury from his prepared almanac that on the night in question the moon was not full but nearly new; the prosecution's witness was therefore a perjurer and Lincoln's client was as innocent as a babe in arms. Now, said the old attorney, it does not really matter whether that story is true or not. It was widely told and believed, and Lincoln was admired for his cleverness in devising the trick that won the case for him. It was, of course, the kind of trick with which no reputable lawyer would have thought of soiling his hands and character when law was a profession for gentlemen. In the wild adulation that was accorded Lincoln for his part in precipitating the war that devastated half of the states that had been united by the Constitution, "Honest Abe's" trick, tantamount to forgery, became an example to be imitated by ambitious men who would acquire skill in manipulating laws and juries.

The old attorney was doubtless right about the conduct of lawyers who were gentlemen, but I fear he erred in supposing that such attorneys were ever preponderant in their profession. It is unlikely that the actual practice of law changed in that respect, except in superficial and external details, since Dickens published Bleak House and Samuel F. B. Warren published Ten Thousand a Year.[2]

2. It would be bootless to go farther back. In the Renaissance, the most distinguished of Italian historians, Guicciardini, thought that a great improvement in the administration of justice would be effected by having all cases decided by throwing dice, which would ensure a just decision in half of them. He seems not to have realized that clever advocates would find ways to load the dice. Eventually we should have to consider the advantages of the ancient Greek practice by which the litigants had to present their own cases and address the jury themselves. That may have been unfair to poor speakers and possibly to children, women, and aliens, who had to be represented in court by male citizens, but dispensing with

In poker games, something depends on the cards, much on the relative skill of the players, and no little on sheer bluffing. That is why lawsuits are like poker.

The two ostensibly young attorneys who were to be the Jews' mouthpieces may have thought that simple-minded historians would be afraid to encounter experts in the art by which the worse case is made the better, and clever verbiage and courtroom histrionics sway the unthinking or uninterested individuals who have been conscripted to serve on a jury, but they were mistaken. The Reverend Mr. Otten's challenge had been accepted as soon as it was made by Mark Weber (an able young historian who is becoming one of the foremost authorities on the disgusting history of the Jews' most impudent swindle, but is not related to Dr. Charles Weber, who is well-known to all readers of Liberty Bell), and Bradley Smith, who has ably represented our race and historical truth in appearances on the radio and even some television stations.

Eventually, the lawyers brought up reinforcements in the form of Hal Lindsey, a veteran hokum-peddler who has never been quite able to attain the prosperity of the big-time salvation-hucksters, Robertson, Falwell, Bakker, and Swaggart, and later they claimed to have called up the Yiddish weasel, who has the distinction of not having been exterminated in more "death camps" than any other professional survivor. Undaunted, the advocates of history then enlisted on their side Dr. Robert Countess, an ordained minister, and Professor Faurisson, who has long been the most distinguished and courageous critic of the shabby Holohoax.

mediators had its advantages, not least in that it prevented laws from being made utterly unworkable by the "democratic" practice of hiring politicians to multiply and complicate them further at every session of a legislature. Many years ago a writer in the American Mercury considered the problem of a young man who joined a police force and wanted to know all the laws he was expected to enforce. If he was allowed to devote all of his time to that task and had a keen and retentive memory, so that he could memorize the cardinal provisions of the existing laws applicable to his duty at the rate at which students memorized poetry in the old days of education in the schools, he would complete the task in, as I recall, about thirty-five years. But while he was memorizing the existing laws, the law-makers would have produced a flood of new ones, and so on. The writer estimated that a zealous young man might succeed in catching up with the legislators in time to go on active duty as policeman for three or four years before he was retired for advanced old age and infirmity.

The lawyers insisted on moving the debate from Washington, District of Corruption, to Los Angeles, and then added the amazingly impudent condition that they were not to be asked questions by their opponents or members of the audience. That seemed to fit a lawyer's notion of Paradise, a place where he can put perjurers on the stand without exposing them to cross-examination. (One reason for this became apparent later when, according to Christian News, the two mouthpieces admitted they had read nothing of the case they were going to refute, having relied, evidently, on antics such as legal hustlers perform extemporaneously in courtrooms.)

To the astonishment of everyone, doubtless including the legal luminaries, the historians blandly accepted the insolent condition. Observers were concerned because the historians had agreed to such an outrageous disadvantage, especially since it seems never to have been determined who was to judge the debate. Might it not be an audience packed with the boobs whom old Hal Lindsey entices to an evangelical emporium somewhere in the purlieus of Los Angeles, where he regularly roars that "Anti-Semitism is Anti-God." (The old buncombe-artist means "Anti-Jewish opinions," and ignores the fact, now obvious in the Near and Middle East, that the most viciously anti-Semitic people in the world are the Jews.)[3]

The pair of sleight-of-tongue artists, having had their outrageous condition unexpectedly accepted, then thought to terrify the historians by loudly proclaiming themselves "exterminators" who would exterminate "revisionists." (The latter is a term now applied to honest historians, playing on the two meanings of the word 'history.')[4] Although the vaunt was doubtless to be taken as metaphorical, observers naturally perceived a reflection of the

3. I was amused years ago when I saw what the Jews contemptuously call a "shicksa" (i.e., a White woman who was "converted" to a Jewess to marry a Jew) going page-by-page through the two thick volumes of Doughty's monumental Travels in Arabia Deserta (1888) in search of proof that Arabs are sub-human, so that it is only right for God's Race to kill them.

4. The word 'history' is now generally taken to mean an account of what actually happened, as truthful as the knowledge and Weltanschauung of the historian permit. There is the more primitive meaning, now almost obsolete, of 'story, tale,' as in Fielding's History of Tom Jones or Lucian's Vera historia. In French, histoire was used even of fairy tales, whence the French colloquialism, "Il nous dit des histoires," i.e., he is lying to us. Only in that French sense could the Holohoax be called 'history' and revised.

blood-thirsty fanaticism that the Christians inherited from the Jews, who, as is well known, in the first century of the era fixed by Dionysius Exiguus, exterminated the Jews who were becoming civilized, the Sadducees (Greek Saddoukaioi, a word of uncertain derivation and meaning).[5] The historians laughed at the foolish braggadocio.

The debate, which Mr. Otten somewhat extravagantly called "The Debate of the Century" because it would be the first time the question was actually debated, was set to follow the annual meeting of the Institute for Historical Review in Costa Mesa, California.

As the date approached, trouble began. First of all, it became known that one of the loud mouthpieces had, a few years ago, founded a law school from which he was now bounced for "moral failure," and was retaliating by founding an instantaneous law school to compete with it.

According to a despatch by William Alnor of the Religious News Service, which Christian News faithfully published in its issue of 23 January, the godly lawyer had been forced from his old law school by its Board of Directors for undetailed financial shenanigans and the ethical problem raised by the charge made by his first wife that he had, without her knowledge, procured a divorce from her by forging her name to legal documents. The lawyer's son produced a tape recording on an answering machine which the model Christian used to inform his wife that she had been fired and that he was "leaving the family with nothing." The wife told the press that she had had the divorce set aside as fraudulent. Immediately after a second and legal divorce, the man of God married a new wife, more up-to-date than the one to whom he had been married for thirty years. (If the photographs he supplies the press are to be trusted, he must have married at the age of five or earlier.) A Christian dervish solemnly pronounced the new marriage "proper and scriptural," but his divine learning would have been more impressive if, according to the Board of Directors, he had not been a party to the financial shenanigans at the College. The Chairman of the Board told the press that the hyper-Christian attorney had lied to them about his clandestine divorce until the Board consulted the legal record. Two of the holy lawyer's former colleagues said they had received threatening letters, warning them not to make public the contents of the three-page list of charges against him they had compiled in 1987, which precipitated the wrangling that terminated when a "Christian conciliation board" worked out a "deal" by which Yahweh's mouthpiece was given his back salary and permitted to resign from the College without further proceedings.

5. It is likely that the Sadducees were not a sect and that the term, like our 'sceptic,' was applied to men too intelligent to share the low superstitions of the vulgar or be taken in by the knavery of priests. A Sadducee was probably the author of the passages in Ecclesiastes which express the thought of an educated man, who rationally perceives that the world is governed by natural laws and not by imaginary spooks.

The heroic divorcé's partner in blustering for the Holohoax promptly termed the despatch from the Religious News Service "ridiculous," without saying why, and averred that the subject of it was "a righteous man" who "lives a holy life." Of course, as all Christians know from the examples set by the Fathers of the Church, men who sizzle with high-voltage holiness are dispensed from the pagan notions about integrity and personal honor that so many vile atheists think an adequate substitute for being laundered in the blood of the Lamb.

In the issue dated January 30, Christian News published a letter from Yahweh's mouthpiece No.1 in which he denied the forgery and threatened to start suing for libel. Simultaneously with it appeared a letter from some persons who called themselves Professors and Doctors, without specifying what they were Professors of or whence they had obtained their doctoral degrees—a matter of some importance in a day when "Bible colleges" bestow the degree of Divinitatis Doctor (if they can spell it) on such candidates as a handsome German police dog, owned by a reporter in Chicago, and an amiable grey mare of my acquaintance. The persons who signed the letter "In the flowing love of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ," demanded the resignation of the Board of Directors of the Law School from which Yahweh's advocate had been permitted to resign, on the grounds that the Directors had been unfair to a man "who had devoted his whole life to Christian service," including, no doubt, his marital and financial miracles; the function of a law school, they averred, was "to return intellectual credibility to our faith, to teach the Gospel, and to bring our Lord's salvation to the lost." Since, according to their own letter, they cannot have been members of the staff of that law school, it may be they were professors in the rival Christian law school, which had been founded almost overnight, as seems possible in California, where, I suppose, there must be thousands of law schools, dispensing Buddhist, Taoist, Moslem, Voodoo, and other brands of righteous law.

Yahweh's mouthpiece No. 1 was obviously in deep trouble, and on the day set for the debate he was conveniently defending himself in court, although any judge would have granted a continuance to permit him to appear in a debate that had been scheduled long before.

Mouthpiece No. 2 claimed he had enlisted a Rabbi from the "Simon Wiesenthal Center" to help exterminate the historians, but if the Jew had indeed agreed to appear as stated, he quickly thought better of it. So Yahweh's remaining mouthpiece blustered that he alone would exterminate the historians, presumably with the help of old Hal Lindsey.

Then came inexorably nearer the appointed day, and in the chill dawn Big Mouth felt a touch of frost on his pedal extremities, because, he said, he had heard that someone might throw a bomb, and Yahweh's Bold Paladin must not take a risk of encountering unpleasantness. Hal Lindsey, who assures the suckers that his god personally watches over everyone who contributes more than he can afford to subsidize evangelical rant, knew what that protection is worth and promptly decided that his godly hide was too precious to be risked in the service of his god, since, he said, "only Nazi lunatics" doubt stories God's People choose to tell. Thus did the valiant exterminators ignominiously crawl out of their engagement.

This should complete the chronicle of dishonor, but there is more, which may at first sight seem beyond belief to you. According to Christian News, 13 March 1989, p. 11, col. 1, Big Mouth, who had evidently charged himself with arranging for a church in which the debate was to be held, immediately canceled that arrangement when he decided he didn't dare to appear. You see, if there wasn't any debate, that would prove that the wicked historians had not dared to confront him, who had boasted that he would prove "in open debate before the global media" that the impossible Holohoax had actually happened. If Yahweh's champion ever has to cease lawing for his Lord, he can find good employment in the "dirty tricks" department of the C.I.A.

And that was not enough. After thinking it over, Big Mouth had an even better idea. According to the same issue of Christian News, p. 1, col. 4 (lower third), he discovered that the "bomb threat" had been made by the wicked "revisionists," who were afraid he would confute them, presumably by waving his arms and yelling, for he admitted he did not know what evidence is used by historians, i.e., did not know what he would be talking about. He was promptly supported (at a safe distance) by Mouthpiece No. 1, who, it is said, has written thirty-five volumes of lucrative sucker-bait and is credited with ownership of one of the biggest brains in the Lutheran business, with which he doubtless planned his marital, financial, and academic coups. Big Brain, although he was supposedly unable to appear in the debate because he had to defend himself in court on that day, supported Big Noise by telling the press that it was "immoral" to doubt the Holohoax, but he refrained from proposing prematurely that doubters be burned at the stake while holy men of his stripe dance about the pyre and yell "Hosannah," hoping that some kind Jew will throw them a bone or a chocolate bar afterwards.

The dirty trick did not work. Even on such short notice, the historians were able to find a place for the scheduled meeting, and, facing four chairs bearing the names of the pusillanimous and prudently absent exterminators, they had no difficulty in demonstrating that the touted "Holocaust" is just an amazingly impudent and carelessly manufactured hoax by a race in which deceit is habitual and inveterate—the race which, as Hitler observed, always uses words, not to express their own thoughts, but to conceal them from their victims.

The Reverend Mr. Otten confessed that his "Debate of the Century" had "fizzled out." One must feel sympathy for him in what must have been an acutely embarrassing affair. He is an honorable man and cannot have suspected the character of the four-flushers with whom he dealt.

He had the exemplary courage to speak at the Convention of the Institute for Historical Review and affirm his disbelief in the Jews' hoax. (The text of his address appears in Christian News, 20 February 1989). And he has had the signal courage to say forthrightly in an editorial in his own newspaper that the Yiddish weasel, Eli Wiesel, "is a liar who poses as some mystic or guru." He drew, furthermore, a perceptive and pregnant analogy, adding that the "scholars" who revere the weasel's authority are like "those who go into ecstasy when they view a painting by Picasso," i.e., another blatant Jewish hoax.

My opinion of Judaeo-Christianity is well-known, but I can honor a clergyman of whom Martin Luther would be proud and in whom Archbishop Turpin, who, in Western Christianity's great saga, fought valiantly and died with Roland and Oliver at Roncesvalles, would recognize a fellow spirit. An atheist can wish there were many like him.

AN INTREPID LIAR

When the wealthy Sir William Stephenson died in his luxurious home on Bermuda at the age of 93, he lived up to his reputation as a very modest and retiring man. He wished "to die unnoticed by the world," and he accordingly arranged to have his death and funeral kept strictly secret until after he had been buried—the surest way of attracting the attention of the press throughout the world.

The newspapers in Britain, Canada, and the United States—and, no doubt, in many other countries—blossomed with obituaries. The Chicago Tribune, for example, lauded him as the great "spymaster," the man who "resolutely took on Hitler and the Nazis," and whose work in British intelligence "was decisive in the fight against the Nazis." And surely a man who was thus responsible for the defeat of Germany, the destruction of the British Empire, the ruin of the United States, and the fall of Western civilization deserved the most fulsome plaudits a hack writer could devise.

When I read that obituary, I laughed sardonically. About a dozen years ago, I picked up a book about Sir William's career in espionage, entitled A Man Called Intrepid. I read eighty or ninety pages before I threw it aside because I had no time for crude fiction. I thought it likely that Sir William had written it himself, and that the journalist whose name appeared as the author was just a part of the hoax.

Now let me hasten to add that Sir William undoubtedly knew by long and practical experience far, far more about intelligence work than I do. But let me suggest an analogy. My knowledge of chemistry is little more than what I learned in school, where, in those far off days, one verified empirically in the laboratory most of what one was taught. I went only so far as the second year. But nevertheless, if a distinguished chemist and holder of a Nobel Prize were to assert that there is no hydrogen in water, which is a compound of nitrogen and helium, I would know at once that he lied thrice with so reckless a disregard of facts as to make all his other statements suspect.

The Tribune had not pulled out all the stops on its calliope. That was done by the Sunday Times (London), which described the late Sir William as "the giant of the century," asseverating that no one, "excepting possibly Churchill," had done more than he had to "win the War."

If I may borrow a metaphor from the eminent British historian, Hugh Trevor-Roper, the newspapers in their encomia on the great Sir William merely regurgitated the tripe they had swallowed years before. Professor Trevor-Roper, in the Sunday Telegraph (London), 19 February 1989, used the weight of his authority (as should have been unnecessary) to expose definitively the crude imposture, and he did so judiciously, admitting that Sir William was really entitled to no little credit for work he had actually done as an operative in the British secret service.

I have often alluded to the important and sometimes crucial work of the secret services of both civilized and barbarous nations, and in Liberty Bell, January 1988, under the rubric "The Business of Deception," I explained why intelligence agencies, sometimes by necessity and sometimes from mere habit, deceive even the nations for whom they are working. The career of Sir William is relevant to that subject, and is otherwise significant.

He was a Canadian, the son of a prosperous owner of a lumber mill. He served honorably in the British Army's air force in the First World War and was decorated for his services. After that war and until 1939 he promoted numerous corporations and similar financial enterprises in Britain, always with great profit to himself and, one supposes, also with profit to the stockholders or participants in limited partnerships. He became a well-known and very wealthy man.

His prominence as a business man and financier gave him a cover that made him the obvious choice when he was enlisted by British Military Intelligence to take charge of British espionage and sabotage in the United States, which he directed from an office in New York that was later made famous under the name "Room 3603." What American acquaintance would believe that the affable but pedestrian and rather dull English business man was really the director of a branch of what was, among civilized nations, the most cunning and ruthless secret service in the world, excelled only by the Jews'?

He was doubtless given assistants experienced in espionage, sabotage, and subversion, and profited from their instruction and advice, but much of the agency's success must be credited to his own lucid mind. He won the admiration and loyalty of his operatives, if the testimony of two or three of them is to be trusted, and if, as one may suspect, his imagination provided some of the exploits of which he told them, that could be attributed to a technique of inspirational management.

The espionage, sabotage, and subversion in the United States was principally directed against the Americans who were obstinately refusing to be shipped to Europe as cannon-fodder to rescue Britain from the insane war on which she had embarked on behalf of the Jews and their Soviet Empire, but he also discreetly kept under surveillance Roosevelt's government, to make certain that the perfidious criminal would keep his promises when he could. Only a small part of what Stephenson's branch of the British secret service accomplished in the United States has been disclosed in the book about it. There can be no doubt but that he did make a large contribution to the vast complex of forces that brought about the Suicide of the West.

After Roosevelt succeeded in using the Japanese to give himself dictatorial powers to herd millions of Americans abroad to fight and die for the benefit of their enemies, Stephenson, whose illegal activities had been only reluctantly tolerated by J. Edgar Hoover and the F.B.I., affiliated himself with the mushroom organization headed by the madcap and unscrupulous "Wild Bill" Donovan, and known as the O.S.S.—an abbreviation which the old-line American intelligence services translated as "Office of Soviet Stooges."

It was a bizarre organization. One of its principal purposes was to provide a secure refuge for Jews and others whose valuable hides must not be exposed to a risk of abrasion. It maintained a hive of big brains who turned out very secret reports, many of which were ludicrous. (I rather vaguely remember one by a psychiatrist who had been morbidly fascinated by the way in which Japanese children are house-broken, and deduced from it that the Americans, after their victory, must be careful not to humiliate the Japanese or bruise their delicate souls by letting them know that they had been defeated.) It did mount operations abroad during the war, some of which had a limited success. It included, of course, many well-meaning but rather naive individuals. There was, for example, the American major who, with two sergeants, was sent by plane to deliver a supply of weapons to supposedly patriotic Italian partisans who were harassing the Germans. The two sergeants, who were Communist agents, murdered the major and delivered the arms to Italian Communists, who were plotting to make Italy part of the Soviet Empire.

Stephenson probably had a well-dissembled contempt for the staff of the O.S.S., but he basked in the unlimited admiration which was accorded him as a master spy, although, so far as is known, he only transmitted to them information from his superiors which they permitted him to communicate to that strange American operation. And he did work closely with the O.S.S. although British Military Intelligence knew better than to trust Donovan's madhouse, until he was recalled about a year before the end of the war, possibly at his own suggestion.

After the war, Stephenson was knighted in recognition of his services and then, with his old pal, Donovan, and others, he embarked on business ventures, made possible by the catastrophe, which were highly profitable to him and made him more wealthy than ever.

Donovan and others who had been connected with the Office of Soviet Stooges lavished praise on Sir William for his supposed genius in secret work, and the Canadian press, for some obscure reason of its own, made of him the national hero of Canada. Virtually all the universities in Canada showered honorary degrees upon him, and ambitious Canadian politicians boasted they had once had the great privilege of meeting him. That may have inspired him.

In 1960, Sir William subsidized H. Montgomery Hyde, a British writer who had served with him in New York, to produce a biography entitled Quiet Canadian. I have not seen that book, but it fashioned the specious legend that Sir William was so extremely modest and retiring a man that he did not want to talk about his great exploits during the War.

Hyde is a really expert professional writer, who has turned out so many books on every conceivable subject that he thought would yield large sales and royalties that I suspect that if I were to compile a list of all of his publications, it would fill a page of Liberty Bell, and perhaps run over to the following one.

For his next effort at spectacular modesty, Sir William turned again to H. Montgomery Hyde, who typed out a chronicle of his great achievements as a British agent in the United States, entitled Room 3603, published in 1962. In that very successful book, Hyde narrates his own experiences in Stephenson's organization, and I am willing to suppose that this rather minor part of the book does not depart too greatly from the truth. For the rest, Hyde was dependent on, and naturally accepted, what the modest Sir William told him about international affairs and his rôle in them. The account in Room 3603 is not absolutely incredible, if you make allowance for the chronic habit of deception in intelligence agencies on which I commented in Liberty Bell.

For example, the heads of British Military Intelligence probably told the highest officials of their government "in utmost secrecy" that the talents of a beautiful female spy in bed had sufficed to extract the Italian naval code from a high-ranking Italian officer; they thus concealed the way in which their ability to read that code had actually been obtained. Furthermore, if the spurious "secret" was kept, well and good; if it somehow leaked to Italian intelligence, the Italians would thereupon suspect in turn all the officers who could have betrayed their country and sold the code for sexual favors—and thus demoralize all of them.[1] Long after the war and the necessity for secrecy had passed, it is quite likely that ranking British officers repeated the canard, from habit or because they knew no better. (I gave an American example of this in the article I mentioned above.) Thus a reader who read the story about the beautiful and erotically talented spy in Room 3603 would, even if he knew the facts, assume that Sir William had merely repeated the cover story.

1. This secret did not reach Italy, and it gave rise, in the mid 1950s, to a sensational and rather pathetic event. A competent and, I believe, patriotic Italian writer, pondering the disgraceful record of the Italian Navy in the War, wrote and published a book entitled Nave e poltrone. (The last word is a pun; it was in current use as the Italian equivalent of the French ronds de cuir, a contemptuous designation of bureaucracy; it also means 'poltroon,' and indeed the English word was derived from it.) The author attributed the Navy's record of continual defeat and disaster correctly to Mussolini's decision to have the entire Italian Navy commanded from Rome, moving ships about like the pieces on a chessboard in a great strategic game against the British fleet. The poor author, however, never suspected that all the orders transmitted in "unbreakable code" from Rome were read by the British as soon as they were read by the Italian commanders to whom they were addressed. He accordingly reached the conclusion that the Admirals of Supermarina, the centralized command in Rome, must have been traitors, for the record of constant and disastrous defeats when the Italians sailed into British traps simply could not have been the result of coincidence. The government of De Gaspari was at that time eager for ways to distract attention from its own rascality and prosecuted the author for "libeling the honor of the armed services." After a long and sensational trial, the unfortunate man was convicted and imprisoned.

In 1965, Hyde, with the cordial coöperation of Sir William, produced what may be his finest book, a "best-seller" entitled Cynthia. When I read it, I considered the hypothesis that the book was a hoax and that seven of the eight photographs in it had been posed by hired actors (the eighth could have been taken from some book on French geography or history). It seems however that the female spy who is the subject of the book actually existed. A friend of mine in Minneapolis verified one essential detail for me, and Professor Trevor-Roper, who unfortunately seems not to have seen the book, assumed that it was, at least in large part, truthful.

"Cynthia" was the sobriquet and code name of a beautiful British spy, a well-born American girl, Amy Elizabeth Thorpe, born in Minneapolis and born with a lust to become an heroic adventuress—an ambition she eventually realized, after she had been imbued with all the horror stories about Hitler and the wicked Nazis with which the Jews filled the press they controlled before and during the Second World War. She may have welcomed an opportunity "to consider her [lovely] body as expendable as any soldier's in the line of duty," on behalf of what she credulously thought a noble cause instead of a project for universal ruin.

Cynthia is a moving book, for it was written with a deep emotion. Hyde was unmistakably in love with Cynthia and had been her lover, with or without the knowledge of her two successive husbands, on several occasions, the last not long before her untimely and agonizing death from cancer, which touched him deeply. One hopes that most of the story, which Hyde attributes to Cynthia herself, was substantially true. There is at least one episode which cannot be a truthful report as it stands, but if we assume that Hyde did not invent it and foist it upon Cynthia, a man who gallantly wishes to champion the beautiful young woman can form a plausible hypothesis that what Cynthia told Hyde was misunderstood in terms of what he had heard from Sir William.

Hyde probably wrote Room 3603 in good faith, not taking time to ponder the inconsistencies and improbabilities in Sir William's stories (for he was simultaneously working on a book on a totally different subject), but he must have had his misgivings, for he refused to carry out Sir William's next project in ostentatious modesty.

As I have said, after glancing at A Man Called Intrepid, I decided that Sir William, who signed a preface reluctantly certifying the accuracy of the story a pertinacious journalist had coaxed from him, probably wrote the whole tale himself, perhaps in competition with Ian Fleming, whose novels about spies were enjoying great and lucrative popularity. According to Professor Trevor-Roper, however, I was mistaken about that and the journalist who took responsibility for the book actually existed and may be alive today.

A Man Called Intrepid, which could have been more accurately entitled "A Four-Flusher Who Calls Himself Intrepid," was the pay-off. As I have said, even with my limited knowledge of such matters, I discarded the book in disgust after inspecting, with growing incredulity, a first slice of the baloney. Professor Trevor-Roper remarks that the book is "a work of such blatant absurdity that it ought to have sunk author and subject for good." Sir William's megalomania had progressed to the point at which he made himself the alter ego of Winston Curchilll and co-director of Britain's part of the War, superior to the British Cabinet and all the officers of the Royal Army and Navy.

According to Trevor-Roper, in a part of the book I did not have the fortitude to read, Sir William decided that he had invented television and jet aircraft (first produced by Messerschmitt for the German Air Force). And this "singularly modest man, who shunned publicity" (in the words of his journalistic stooge) forged and photographed a letter from grateful Winston Churchill to himself—forged it so crudely that it was almost patently spurious. And he made in his book many claims that are outrageous not only for the effrontery of his mendacity but because he could not rationally have hoped that they would not be detected and exposed.

The British professor gives one example. Sir William claimed to have trained in Canada the team of assassins whom he then despatched by parachute into Czecho-Slovakia to assassinate the celebrated Reinhard Heydrich, "der Henker."[2] One of the cowardly assassins[3] was living in Canada, read the book, knew where he and his accomplices had been trained and by whom, and did not hesitate to denounce the lie by a man of whom he had not before heard. This was but one of many examples.

Sir William was not perturbed by the fact that, as Professor Trevor-Roper says, the book, "one of the most ludicrous works ever written on such a subject," was promptly "torn to shreds by those who knew the facts, or could read the documents, or could distinguish sense from nonsense." To all questions Sir William blandly replied that he could not discuss such matters without risk of revealing even more profound and world-shaking secrets he was guarding inviolate in his bosom. And he even had the astounding temerity to hire his tame journalist to take responsibility for an even more blatantly absurd book, Intrepid's Last Case, in 1981.

Sir William's impudent mendacity was publicly and indubitably exposed many times, but, amazingly, he continued to enjoy the fictitious honors he had created for himself. In 1983, two years after the publication of a book that put the Baron von Münchhausen to shame, he came to New York to receive the "William J. Donovan Award for services to democracy and freedom" at a grand banquet, attended by eight hundred well-heeled suckers, where he received a personal message from Ronnie Reagan, who shamelessly averred that he and "all freedom-loving men in the world have a special place in our hearts and minds and our history books for the man called Intrepid."

There could be no more conclusive demonstration of the density of the mephitic fog of lies in which the Aryan world has lived and groped since 1945, as the Jews enforce by pseudo-legal ter-

2. As you have been told a thousand times by professional liars, Heydrich was one of the monstrously wicked Nazis and so cruelly oppressed the people of Czecho-Slovakia that he rode through the cities and countryside in an open automobile with no companion but his chauffeur, and no one thought of harming him. Actually, of course, many of the Czechs so admired Heydrich that they were becoming pro-German. That, however, was not the primary reason for the assassination. Heydrich was a man of keenly lucid mind, the one German in a position of power who saw that Admiral Canaris, the head of German Military Intelligence, must be a traitor, and who was trying to obtain the positive and incontrovertible proof that would be needed to convince Hitler of the foul duplicity of a man whom he regarded as his devoted friend and trusted implicitly. (If Heydrich had lived to obtain that proof, the catastrophic and tragic end of the War might have been averted.) The British had to rush in the team of assassins to save Canaris, who had called for help that his Soviet friends could not or would not give him.

3. "Cowardly" because they arranged matters to make it seem that Heydrich had been assassinated by a conspiracy among the inhabitants of the village of Lidice, on whom the Germans accordingly took reprisals in conformity with a provision of the International Law that was once recognized by all civilized nations—a provision, by the way, which the United States had once specifically sanctioned.

rorism respect for the rank excrement of their preposterous "Holohoax," hordes of thieves and parasites dominate politically all the nations of the Western world, and venal "educators" inject fraudulent "history" and the deadly "One world" pus into the minds of the hapless and helpless children that befuddled parents voluntarily send to the tax-supported boob-hatcheries. The impudent hoaxer who claimed to have defeated the wickedly sane Nazis was so dear to the malignant scum that rules us that, knowing him to be a liar, they continued to believe him.

What is more, Sir William knew they would believe him, no matter how preposterous the lies he told: they had to. He was keeping inviolate in his bosom deep and dark secrets about many of the dirtiest and most scabrous crimes they had to conceal. His reference to such secrets when asked about his wilder tales was a polite threat: denounce my lies and I will tell the truth.

A man of his experience in intelligence work must have known that everything the general public is told about the Second World War by the several governments and by the press in each Western nation, and is rammed into the minds of children as "history," is simply a vast spider's web of lies and flagitious deceit, from the Jews' gigantic Holohoax or the reported character and actions of the great War Criminals, Roosevelt and Churchill, to even quite minor matters, such as trivial incidents on the battlefield or the contents of now forgotten books.

The dense miasma of lies conceals the putrescence of "democracy" and "social justice," and the abomination of "politicians" who feed on our nations as worms feed on buried corpses. In a world of lies, Sir William amused himself by imitating with covert sarcasm and parody, and thus subtly mocking, the elected "leaders" and "champions of democracy" in Washington, London, Bonn, and Paris. And I, for one, believe he did more than amuse himself.

Sir William did well to use his death as a last means of calling attention to himself. He was a great man, and he fully deserved the praise that was lavished upon him, although for quite different reasons.

I misjudged him when I contemptuously tossed aside A Man Called Intrepid, and assumed that Sir William was merely profiting from the ignorance and gullibility of persons whose knowledge of intelligence services was limited to novels by Eric Ambler and his successors. It was only when he received the "Donovan Award" that I understood what he had done and began to admire the intrepid liar.

Every person who has served in intelligence work above the level of clerical tasks or routine assignments, knows the truth about at least one incident that is sufficient to make him perceive the enormity of the whole intricate webs of lies that is used to enslave our people.[4] He may acquiesce in the gigantic fraud because he accepts with military discipline the alleged raison d'état, or because he himself approves the subjection of mankind to Judaeo-Communism, or because he is unwilling to take the risk of giving the lie to the masters of the world, or because he knows he would not be believed by the victims if he told them the truth.

Sir William must have known that if he began to expose the rulers of the world, he would be murdered without compunction or delay. He chose the only safe way to tell the truth to men who could understand. He told enormous and flagrant lies which the masters of deceit had to pretend they believed. The "Donovan Award" and the accompanying adulation was his moment of triumph. That sealed the record. That tells an intelligent historian all that he needs to know to direct properly his research in archives from which it was not possible to delete all vestiges of the truth. And any thinking man who perpends what Sir William has done will arrive at working knowledge of the truth for himself.

But, despite every effort that may be made to disclose historical facts, the Aryan suckers who are the victims of organized crime will doubtless continue to relish the swill that their owners dump in their troughs. They have been taught to love their enemies.

The well-known axiom must be rephrased: Those whom the Jews would destroy, they first make mad.

4. For example, the American officer who was present when the Germans exhumed the bodies of some of the Polish officers murdered in the Katyn Forest knew that the murders had been committed by the Bolsheviks. If he knew only this one fact, he would nevertheless have seen the pattern of the whole web of deceit when the Americans pretended that the Germans were guilty and so stated when they carried out their equally vicious and more obscene murders of German officers at Nuremberg. Such is the force of one crucial fact, which additional knowledge will merely confirm and extend to other areas. No one man in an intelligence agency—not even its head and director—will learn all of the relevant facts concealed from the public, but a man of Sir William's wide experience must have learned very many.

IDENTITY

We all feel a certain sympathy for the cult called "British Israel" or, in this country, "Identity." It is an attempt to make Christianity innocuous by claiming that Yahweh's rabble of marauders, thieves, and swindlers, whose depredations are exalted in the "Old Testament," were our Aryan and probably Anglo-Saxon ancestors. That makes it possible to claim that the Jesus of the "New Testament" was not a Jew.[1]

I therefore report the glad tidings (eu-angelium) that there is now available a new and more plausible source of inspiration for the cult.

A man named Victor Dunstan has been doing "in-depth research" (whatever that is) in the Vatican Library, the British Museum, and (oh, how appropriately!) the library of Jesus College.[2] He has presented his epochal discoveries in a book which I have not seen, but some of them are summarized in the publisher's rather long and detailed advertisement, so I can list here for you some of the drastic revisions of Christian theology that are now requisite. I base my report on the advertisement, adding my own identifications and explanations within parentheses.

The Virgin Mary's mother (Anne) was a native of Cornwall and belonged to a wealthy and prominent family, but she made an unhappy marriage, from which she escaped by eloping to Palestine for a few years. She soon returned to merry England, however, with her (legitimate?) daughter, the Virgin Mary, who was born to wealth and culture. Her uncle (Joseph of Arimathea, who must have been either Anne's brother or the brother of Mary's unnamed father) was "the Onassis of his day," a great shipowner and financier, and also "Minister of Mines in the Roman Empire."

1. Although highly improbable, this is not an absolute impossibility, assuming that the Jesus of the "New Testament" actually existed. I have defined the limits of the improbable possibility in Christianity Today, pp. 3-15 (reprinted from Liberty Bell, November 1987).

2. Jesus College is not one of the older colleges at Oxford, since it was established as late as 1571. In prestige it ranks below Baliol, All Souls', Magdalen, and Corpus Christ, and is about on a par with Trinity and Pembroke, and, of course, far above the even later foundations. It would be presumptuous (and hazardous) to rank the other colleges that are older than Jesus. The better Oxford colleges all have libraries of their own, which are not part of the Bodleian; for example, Baliol has one of the most important manuscripts of Cicero's Academica posteriora, and Lincoln has another.

The Virgin Mary spent most of her life in England, where she, like her uncle, is now buried. She wasn't a virgin very long, for "she enjoyed a very active sex life and gave birth to no less than seven children." (The number of fathers, if known, is not stated.) While visiting her relatives, the ancestors of the British and Americans of today, in Palestine, she gave birth to her favorite son, Jesus, on whom she bestowed the name of a god that "the Druids of Britain worshipped ...for hundreds of years before [the now famous] Jesus was born." (I am sure Mr. Dunstan was clever enough to derive the later Latin form, Iēsus (i.e., with consonantal I and a short ultima) from the name of the Gallic god of war, Ēsus or Hēsus, whose sanguinary rites and blood-stained altars were compared by Lucan to those of the Tauric goddess whom we know from the Iphigenia in Tauris of Euripides.)

When Mary and her favorite son, belonging to the most wealthy and fashionable society of the day, visited her British relatives and friends in Palestine, they naturally moved in the best circles and attended " 'high life' parties in Capernaum." (The famous miracle of changing water into wine was presumably performed at such a party when the booze ran out.)

On one such visit, Jesus was crucified and resurrected, after which he and his mother escaped from Palestine under assumed names "by boat" (doubtless a ship belonging to Mary's uncle, "the Onassis of his day") and returned to their native land, where the first Christian church in the world was established by Paul, "a half-brother to one of the Roman commanders in Britain" and "a friend of the British Royal Family." That royal family, in which Mary's uncle had "fathered a British queen" (perhaps by an unofficial intervention), supplied the first Christian Bishop.

Although Jesus has a strange taste for going slumming—he was hard on the money-changers in the Temple, but "he never whipped anyone out of a brothel"—his family belonged to the upper classes and sponsored the new religion in their own interests. The real disciples were rich and influential property-owners and business men; the tale about "simple fishermen" fitted the "myth of Jesus' poverty," which "was a convenient way for the Church to make the poor satisfied with their lot. Good 'sob stuff' religion!"

I have told you enough to show you how Mr. Dunstan's "in-depth research" can make of "Identity" a plausible and attractive cult. I am sure you are eager to learn more, but I must refer you to his epochal book, Did the Virgin Mary Live and Die in England? So rush eight pounds in British currency to the publishers, Unusual Books, 5 High Street, Shirley, Solihull, West Midlands. Better add two pounds for air mail and special delivery so you won't have to wait so long.

DEATH OF A MAN

Integrity and courage have become so rare in science and learning under a "democracy" that I think it proper to note here the premature death of a man our civilization could not afford to lose.

The New Scientist, 25 February 1989, contains an appreciative review of What Do You Care What Other People Think? by Richard Feynman with Ralph Leighton (London, Unwin Hyman, 1989). There undoubtedly is or soon will be an American edition, which I intend to obtain.

From this review I learn that Dr. Feynman died of cancer in February 1988. He was a physicist of distinction, holder of the Nobel Prize for his work on a quantum theory to explain the behavior of electrons in atomic structure, but I mentioned him in Liberty Bell, November 1986, for his aphorism, "For a successful technology, reality must take precedence over public relations, for nature cannot be fooled." That, incidentally, probably explains why Japanese technology is so greatly superior to the technology of a decaying nation that devotes most of its energies to trying to fool nature with Judaeo-Christian hokum and humanitarian blarney.

As we all remember, when the National Space Agency's showboat with its multiracial cargo blew up at Cape Canaveral in the Spring of 1986 (cf. Liberty Bell for May and June of that year), a Presidential Commission of twelve men was appointed to report on the cause of the disaster to the superterrestial circus, and by some oversight Professor Feynman of the California Institute of Technology was made one of the twelve.

As everyone knows, when investigatory commissions are appointed in the District of Corruption, they are charged with one of two functions. The first is to score a touchdown in the perpetual football game that the two big gangs play to keep the boobs amused; that permits loud-mouthed vulgarians to yell insults at each other and thus convince the boobs who elected them that there is an important difference between the two teams, while simple-minded aficionados of political sport "root" for the team of their choice; that also permits solemn pundits in the press and television to pontificate about the game and pretend that the shenanigans of the players are to be taken seriously as political realities.

Commissions are charged with the second function when something really does go wrong. They are then supposed to investigate and report that, although there may have been some little hitch somewhere, there is nothing to worry about: everything in Tel Aviv-on-the-Potomac is just wonderful and all the predators and thugs in it are wonderful and purer than Sir Galahad, and the tax-paying animals should be grateful for the precious freedom to be robbed and kicked in the face by such noble creatures. The Presidential Commission to investigate the explosion of the rocket-launched showboat should have concocted such a report.

Professor Feynman, who was a scientist and interested in facts, not paregoric for serfs, insisted not only on disclosing the real cause of the destruction of the showboat, the disregard of the elementary laws of physics and chemistry by the managers of the act in their reckless determination to impress on schedule the boobs who would be staring at their hypnogogic boxes at the appointed hour, but on disclosing the secret of "democracy." He remarked that in governmental organizations "the men who know something about what the world is like are at the lowest level" and are merely powerless and voiceless subordinates of the shysters "who know how to influence other people by telling them how the world would be nice."

It was not his fault that he was addressing a populace that was too interested in fooling nature with vapid verbiage to be concerned for its own survival. We should honor him for his integrity as a scientist and his hardihood in maintaining it, which was worthy of our race in its prime, but is unlikely to be often emulated in our decadence.

According to the review, his posthumous book is a miscellany and includes his "behind-the-scenes account of the investigation," and a moving tribute to his first wife, whom he married in his early youth, loved deeply, and lost after five years. A rational man, he bore the grievous loss without drugging himself with opiate fancies that ghosts can transcend reality.

THE PROGRESS OF HIGHER LEARNING

The Los Angeles Times, 30 January 1989, carried the news that the Washington State University has attained a new pinnacle of academic distinction: it has created the first Distinguished Professorship of Fast-Food Service to crown its curriculum in the Science of running restaurants. The eminent scholar who will hold the professorship will doubtless supervise laboratory research in washing dishes (preferably without breaking them) and putting chemically-flavored meat scraps into steamed buns. Such studies, it is hoped, will not be beyond the intellectual capacities of promising young savants, many of whom, no doubt, who will be graduated, summa cum laude, from the northwest Temple of the Muses as Philosophiae Doctores, and will then proudly tack up their imitation parchment diplomas in the greasy kitchens of wayside joints. Some genius among them may even invent a brilliant new technique of merchandising: Free bicarbonate of soda with every three hamburgers.

The news should excite no astonishment. It was in the late 1940s, if I remember correctly, that the shyster who was then President of the University of Texas proudly announced, "We will teach anything for which there is a demand." That was his pedantic way of saying, "Our professionals will do anything for a buck in this academic whore-house." I am quite sure that the old buncombe-artist on another occasion, when he was wheedling appropriations from a legislature or addressing the massed parents of the young persons who were being graduated from his swindle-shop (some of whom, to be sure, could have obtained the rudiments of an education, if they insisted on it), descanted on the glories of "a liberal education." He could be confident that the few who would think about what they heard would not remember that a liberal education is liberal precisely because it has nothing to do with earning a living or getting the current substitute for money. It is liberal because it is intended to develop the intellectual, moral, and aesthetic capacities of individuals who are truly liberi, i.e., free from economic or social servitude.

Such individuals must not be allowed in a Communist state, where Equality is the rule, with, of course, the proviso that Jews and their accomplices are infinitely more equal than their subjects. Although the meaning of 'liberal' has now been generally forgotten, I still insist on spelling the word with a capital letter and placing it within quotation marks when it refers to the fledgling Bolsheviks who call themselves "Liberal intellectuals": the first of the two words is as much of a misnomer as the second.

Meanwhile, one may expect American universities to go on to greater and higher achievements. Thus far the labor unions have prevented them from offering the degree of Philosophiae doctor in plumbing or carpentry or truck-driving, but that need not stop them as they work to increase the body count and thus the loot taken from stupid tax-payers. For example, they might institute an "innovative" curriculum in number science, as distinct from old-fashioned mathematics: in the progressive new curriculum advanced degrees could be given niggers who learn to count up to twenty without removing their shoes. If some Neo-Nazis dare to protest and it is not convenient to have them beaten up by the police, the Prexy of the progressive university could point out that such degrees are only just compensation for the horrible injustice committed when the niggers' ancestors were sold to White or Jewish slave-traders instead of being made the pièces de résistance at a tribal barbecue or steak-fry.[1]

This example may seem to you satirical, just as the notion of a college degree in "fast-food service" would have seemed too far-fetched to be even funny three decades ago, but don't be too sure of that, and, above all, remember never to put anything beyond the outreach of a modern "educator's" greed.

LAND OF THE SPREE AND HOME OF THE SLAVE

A cutting from one of the carpetbagger papers in Atlanta, sent to me without notation of date, reproduces a despatch by the Associated Press from Las Vegas with the news that the proprietor of the Imperial Palace, one of the great casinos on the famous Strip, was amerced in the amount of $1,500,000 by the State of Nevada and placed on probation under surveillance. His crime was having displayed "Nazi memorabilia" in his casino and having held a party on the birthday of Adolf Hitler.

For his atrocious crime the guilty wretch could, of course, have been punished severely. The Imperial Palace could have been locked up by the police, as was originally intended, its owner could have had imposed on him a fine greater than his net worth, and he could then have been put in jail until he paid what he could not pay. But the commissars were merciful.

The fine was reduced to the modest sum of $1,500,000 and the criminal escaped severe penalties because he evinced remorse,

1. Do not laugh. As I write, the press reports that a biped insect in the government of Massachusetts has proposed an enormous bond issue to compensate the niggers in the state for the failure of Massachusetts to suppress the slave-trade two centuries ago, when the colony was inhabited by sane men and women.

threw himself on the mercy of the commissars, and humbly apologized for having so insolently thought the United States was still an American nation. He was even permitted to continue his business and earn his livelihood while the police watch him to make sure of his obedience to God's Law.

When will the stupid Americans learn that, in the country they gave away, they have kept only the precious freedom to do whatever the Sacred Sheenies tell them to do?

The thralls should not presume on the leniency their masters have thus far shown. It is a question of expediency. You see, if the Imperial Palace had been burned to the ground, its owner despatched to Jerusalem for torture and eventual execution, the homes of all persons so depraved that they patronized such a den of iniquity dynamited, and the homeless sinners beaten, crippled, and blinded by U.S. soldiers, the Aryan serfs, stupid as they are, might have become restless and even insubordinate. The evil Palestinians are giving enough trouble now, so, until the Semites in the Near and Middle East have been put in their place, it is deemed expedient to be indulgent to Americans who sin against the Holy Race. If they are contrite, they may even be permitted to retain possession of property, which, according to God's Law as stated in the Holy Talmud, naturally belongs to God's Race.

It will probably be ten years, or even a little more, before the Lord's Chosen are ready to get tough with their tax-paying animals.

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful ana-lysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. For your copy of Which Way Western Man? send $14.00 including postage and handling for the softback edition (Order No. 22003) to: LIBERTY BELL PUBLICATIONS, Box 21, Reedy WV 25270 USA.

LÜGE UND WAHRHEIT

("Falsehood and Truth")

Translation by Charles E. Weber

The following is the second translation from the Kritik series, nos. 60 and 61. The first translation, which had to do with the involvement of the United States in the Second World War, was published in Bulletin 28 and republished in the Liberty Bell of October 1988, pp. 27-31. For information on the Kritik series, see Bulletin 28. We plan to present further translations from the series.

It is a lie that a whole city was wiped out in a blood bath in the case of Lidice, as is claimed, for example, in the book by L.W. Thayer, Die unruhigen Deutschen.

It is the truth that Lidice was a Czech village whose male inhabitants—not by any means its women and children—were shot by Czech gendarmes of the Prague security police on German orders. The 199 men were shot because the village had given refuge to two Czechs who had been living in exile, who had been flown in from England and who had then murdered Reinhard Heydrich [the Deputy Reichsprotektor of Bohemia and Moravia; died on 4 June 1942]. The Czechs had been flown in because no acts of resistance or sabotage whatsoever had taken place, as a result of the wise policies of Heydrich, who aimed at reconciliation. The British author Alan Burgess writes in his book, Seven Men at Daybreak, concerning the preliminary history: "The Western powers could no longer count on having further resistance carried out. With every passing day Czechoslovakia went further into the Nazi camp. The Czech Secret Service envisaged only the possibility of interrupting the course of things and showing the world that Czechoslovakia was again on the side of the Allies. Heydrich (the Reichsprotektor and Supreme Head of the Sicherheitspolizei [Security Police] had to be killed." [Note: This and the next quotation are retranslations.]

In the case of the measure taken after the murder, the German leaders were acting on the basis of international law. It is permissible to shoot hostages for the purpose of intimidating partisans; this has also been the practice of the Western Allies. F.J.P. Veale writes in Advance to Barbarism: "Articles 453 and 454 of the British manual of military law are clear and not to be misunderstood on this point. Article 454 declares that reprisals become a means of exerting pressure by involving individuals who are innocent in most cases. Article 358 of the American manual likewise declares the shooting of hostages to be permissible and to be a measure necessary to preserve the safety of troops." [This retranslation from Veale's book corresponds more or less to passages on page 344 of the edition published by the Institute for Historical Review in 1979, but no mention is made of the American manual there.]

The Western Allies acted accordingly even after the Second World War. On 11 February 1957 the village of Danuba in the British protectorate of Aden was completely destroyed by English bombers because its inhabitants refused to hand over residents of the village who were responsible for an ambush of a patrol. During the Algerian war of independence the French air force boasted of having leveled 44 Arabian villages. The French did not even stop at villages in neighboring countries. The Tunesian village of Sakiet-Sidi-Yussef was destroyed because Algerians who had made attacks in Algeria had allegedly found refuge there. The victims numbered 75 dead, 30 severely injured and more than 170 slightly injured.

Whilst in the case of the punitive expedition against Lidice only the men were killed, women and children were also involved in the aforementioned instances. On 9 April 1948 the Israelis slew the entire population of the Palestinian village of Deir Yassin, 250 men, women, and children, and threw their bodies into wells in order to contaminate them. On 13 October 1948, according to the report of the head of the United Nations armistice commission, the Danish general Bennike, the entire population of the Syrian village of Kibya, men, women, and children were slain by regular Israeli troops. Some of the inhabitants were shot in the village and some of them driven into their houses, which were then blown up with those in them.

We could cite further examples. We do not wish to. We cite these examples simply because we assume that they are not well known and because we wish to pose the following question: Why does every German pupil know about Lidice today and why not about Danuba, Sakiet-Sidi-Yussef, Deir Yassin, or Kibya? The objective which is supposed to be attained is clear: Collective shame, as was already urged on us by Federal President [1949-1959] Heuss. And to what does this collective shame lead? To turning one's back on one's own nation, to willingness for penitence and expiation, to voluntary payments, to renunciation of one's own fatherland and turning to such ideologies as Marxism that are uncharacteristic of one's own nation [volksfremd]. For that reason, we cannot be indifferent about the lies that are being told about our past! And if we do not defend ourselves against the lies, we need not be astonished when the campaign of lies that is being carried on against us is so successful. But if it is successful, we cannot expect any sympathy in the world for our political concerns and we shall be lacking in allies. One of our readers has written us that we should be less concerned about lies about the past and more about lies concerning the present. We can remain silent only when the lies about our past are no longer spread by our enemies. Otherwise our silence will be interpreted as a confession of guilt.

If others cease to lie, then we shall no longer have to set any part of the record straight.

Television Series Review

TWIST OF FATE

On the evenings of the 8th and 9th of January 1989 the National Broadcasting Corporation (NBC) broadcast a so-called mini-series which must be considered one of the silliest and least probable of all the television films having to do with Jews in Europe during the Second World War.

Let us first consider a brief outline of the plot of this series. A colonel in the SS attends a meeting in which officers discuss what to do after the impending defeat of the Third Reich. The colonel is involved in a plot to kill Hitler. The setting is Treblinka, a concentration camp with, of course, a huge smokestack and the usual arriving train. Naturally, there are also film sequences of piles of dolls and clothing taken from the internees. The colonel, Helmut von Schraeder (sic) is playing his flute on the evening of 20 July 1944 when his telephone rings and he is told that the plot to kill Hitler has failed. Now the colonel decides to escape the wrath of the Allies by having his nose altered to make him look like a Jew and to join the Jewish internees after his simulated death by typhus. As the Jewish internee Ben Grossmann, he is transferred to Belsen, where he works under terrible conditions in a foundry. After some time von Schraeder, now Ben Grossmann, is freed by bagpipe-playing Scottish troops. Grossmann makes his way through Italy with a number of Jews on their way to Palestine, where they are opposed by British forces after they land from their dilapidated fishing boat. Grossmann has met an attractive Jewess who has persuaded him to go to Palestine. There he joins a kibbutz and takes part in its defense. In far-off Buenos Aires, a well-dressed Dr. Schlossberg, the plastic surgeon who altered von Schraeder's nose, notices a picture of von Schraeder in a local newspaper.

On the second evening of the series, Grossmann is assigned to go to Switzerland in order to purchase arms for Israel. He had wanted to go to Switzerland after the war and is now inclined to stay there but his sweetheart, the attractive Jewess Deborah, telephones him that she is pregnant, after which Grossmann returns and marries Deborah in a very Jewish ceremony.

Now the action resumes 25 years later, presumably around 1973. Grossman, who has become a general in the armed forces of Israel, is talking to his son, Daniel, who wants to go to Munich to do archival research in order to make a motion picture about "war criminals." Grossmann departs for Buenos Aires on some sort of mission, while his son goes to Munich to work in a Jewish archival center there. The son meets a young Jewess in Munich with whom he starts a love affair. In the course of his research he comes across a file on Helmut von Schraeder. Daniel gradually recognizes that von Schraeder, who is, naturally, regarded as a war criminal, is his father. Now Grossmann is kidnapped in Buenos Aires by agents of ODESSA who blackmail him into making a promise to obtain uranium to make atomic bombs from stockpiles in Israel. One of the agents is none other than Dr. Schlossberg. (Although never correctly explained in the film, ODESSA is an abbreviation of Organisation der ehemaligen SS-Angehörigen = Organization of Former SS Members.) Now the general returns to his beautiful home in Israel to find that his son has returned with the young Jewess he met in the archives. She aspires to work in Yad Vashem. Mossad, Israeli intelligence, now learns of the general's true identity and there follows the almost obligatory automobile chase of the general's car by his son, who wants to shoot him but is dissuaded from doing so by a Mossad agent. The general manages to get onto a motor boat on which the ODESSA agents are waiting for the uranium. Just after the boat leaves the shore it is blown sky-high by the bombs (rather than uranium) that the general has taken into the boat. He is finally recognized as an SS colonel who was transformed into an Israeli patriot. It is all very touching!

So much for the plot. Hardly a sequence takes place in this film series which does not contain an improbability from an historical point of view. The basic turning point of the film, the alteration of Helmut von Schraeder's facial features to make him look like a Jew, so that he could lose his identity amongst the Jewish internees, is in contradiction to the Extermination Thesis, another basic tenet of the film. Obviously, if the interned Jews were all marked for death, von Schraeder would hardly have been inclined to share their fate. He would have had a far better chance of escaping Allied injustice in some other way. And have we not always heard that Jews are simply a religious group, not a physically distinguishable race?

The film plot follows various formulas often found in films intended for the entertainment of adolescents. There is the bedroom scene in which the hero and heroine indulge in sexual delights and the automobile chase toward the end of the film to stir up lagging adrenaline and to overcome ennui.

Although Colonel von Schraeder was a member of the SS, he was involved in the plot to overthrow Hitler's government and to kill Hitler. Of the 70 military officers listed by General Otto Ernst Remer in his book, Verschwörung und Verrat um Hitler (pp. 320-324; reviewed in Bulletin 11), who were executed, shot or committed suicide in connection with the revolt on 20 July 1944, not a single one was a member of the SS, thus another historical anomaly in the film. Still another anomaly in this connection is the improbability that SS officers would meet in a large group to make plans about what they were to do after a defeat of Germany as early as July 1944, when the outlook for Germany was grim but by no means hopeless, since it was widely assumed that Western Allied forces might even continue their advance to the east against the USSR to keep Soviet forces out of Europe, erroneous as this assumption proved to be. The historical reality is that defeatism was very severely punished in the later stages of the war. Such a meeting of large numbers of SS officers would have been quite impossible, one of the historical circumstances that was flagrantly disregarded by the makers of the film.

As in the case of The Winds of War and War and Remembrance (reviewed in the Liberty Bell of May 1983 and Bulletin 32) dates and places are occasionally flashed on at the beginning of sequences in order to give the impression to viewers that the film represents some sort of historical reality.

The chief "moral teaching" of the film would seem to be that even a German who had been dedicated to the survival of his country can be morally redeemed if he comes to devote his life to the service of Jews and the objectives of Zionism.

The number of hours which television networks have been devoting to the "Holocaust" material in a desperate effort to lend credence to the Extermination Thesis seems to be on the increase lately, coinciding with increasing awareness of the genocidal actions of the Jewish state in Palestine and the rising doubts about the Extermination Thesis and its objectives amongst ever wider circles of the American public. □

by

Nicholas Carter

History of Religion texts, and other works that delineate the basic tenets of Judaism, are virtually all alike in one very significant respect: they are monuments of disinformation that both overemphasize and exaggerate the impact of the Jewish perspective on Western culture.

More in the tradition of preachers than teachers, the authors tell us that (1) Western civilization adopted the Jewish "angle of vision" on the deepest questions life poses; (2) the Jews were lifted from obscurity to religious greatness because of their "passion for meaning;" (3) the moral heritage of the West "originated" in the primitive Palestinian settlements of the Israelites, and "descended" to us through their sacred writings; (4) the prophets of Judaism were a "reforming political force" which has never been surpassed in subsequent world history; (5) the Jews have contributed to civilization "out of all proportion" to their numbers; and on and on, ad nauseum.

Most damaging of all to Western civilization and culture is the fact that so many young Gentiles are totally at the mercy of this single-sided coin; and either forgotten, or deliberately avoided during these ecstatic literary peregrinations, is the fact that there is another side to this coin—and the two sides are mutually exclusive.

In the beginning, the Habiru, meaning "people from beyond the river," were among the most primitive of desert peoples—predatory nomads who existed on goat meat and camel milk, and who were ferocious, warlike, and merciless like many of the tribes who were confined to the harsh and barren "wilderness." There is some historical speculation to the effect that members of their community once fought with the hated Hyksos who brought so much damage and misery to Egypt.

Biblical records tell us that the Habiru were held in captivity in Egypt for 215 years, according to the Septuagint, or 430 years, according to what is now called the Hebrew text. We are also told that there was an Exodus of the Habiru from Egypt sometime within either the 14th or 15th centuries B.C. For a long time it was generally believed in the West that the first few books of the Bible, and in particular Joshua, would provide a guide to the region's early history that archeology would confirm. But no longer. Most archaeologists are now convinced that those portions of the Bible leave much to be desired within the realm of inerrency. Apparently archeology no longer needs to support its rationale for existence by being the stepchild of people who desperately want reality to conform to their emotional conclusions.

To date, an enormous amount of large-scale archaeological excavations have taken place throughout the area known today as Israel. As well as examining specific Old Testament-cited locations, the scientists excavated between 600 and 700 settlements not mentioned in the Bible. The results: there is no evidence showing that large numbers of people moved across the Sinai desert during the Exodus period. Before entering the land of Canaan, as the Bible specifies, the Habiru gathered at Kadesh. Excavations in that area, however, didn't turn up a single artifact that could be dated prior to the 10th century. And the biblical claims that the Habiru built cities for the Egyptians are also false, since archaeological evidence indicates that those cities never existed during the period of 1275 to 1300 B.C.

What of Joshua, who led the great war of conquest against the enemies of the Habiru, and brought down the walls of Jericho? Once again, there are flies in the biblical ointment. Excavations prove that there was no city there at the time, nor was there one at Ai, which the Bible says was leveled by Joshua. The best educated guess regarding the exploits of Moses and Joshua must embrace the theory that they are theological scenarios designed to magnify the relationship that supposedly existed between Yahweh and the "Men of Yahweh." The achievement of leading the Habiru out of a hostile environment, along with the parting of the Yam Suph ("Reed Sea" or "Sea of Weeds"), were added to the Moses story by his biographers to contribute to his image as a Servant of Yahweh who could summon up great miracles from the Semitic god. A similar theological scenario was fabricated by the biographers of Joshua who wanted to portray him as one of the world's great conquerors.

From whence did the Habiru come, if not from Egypt? The word Hallelujah, which meant literally "Praise Yah," offers a tantalizing clue. Yah was the name of the Kenite tribal god adopted by the Habiru. The Kenites were a branch of the larger Semitic nation of the Midianites who dwelled principally in the desert north of the peninsula of Arabia. Southwards, Midian extended along the eastern shore of the Gulf of Eyleh; and northwards it extended along the eastern frontier of Palestine. Within that vast arena the Habiru probably lived and roamed for centuries. Logically, they emerged from this "wilderness" beyond the Jordan—the one river of Palestine that runs a course of little more than 200 miles from the eastern mountain range of Lebanon, known to ancient geographers as "Anti-Libanus," to the head of the Dead Sea.

Becoming known among themselves as Israelites (to foreigners they were Hebrews), the Habiru came as strangers to an inhabited land. The lack of any specifically Jewish artifacts in the villages generally accepted as early Israelite leads to another logical conclusion: not until sometime during the 12th century B.C. did they settle in what they knew as "the land of Canaan"—as opposed to "the land of Gilead" in the east—a long and broad strip of maritime plain west of the Jordan. They called the area Palesheth. Jerusalem, the city they occupied just west of the Jordan and Dead Sea, was known in 19th century Egypt as Urushalimma (meaning "foundation of Shalem"); and Salem, or Shalem, was the same Semitic god whose name appears in Shalmaneser, the Asyrian king.

The Philistines, who were of Hellenic descent, had settled on the plain along the southern coast of the area. Lying next to the sea and being also the high road from Egypt to Phoenicia and the richer regions north of it, the Philistine plain was known to the Western world as Syria Palaestina, or Philistine Syria. Palesheth translates as Philistia; and the name Palestine is derived from Philistia. Eventually, the area was gradually extended by western geographers to the country farther inland; and near the beginning of the Christian era, Palestine became the established name for the country—both east and west of the Jordan—a tiny landbridge about the size of New Jersey connecting southern Europe and Asia with northern Africa. The name frequently used throughout the Middle Ages and down to our own time by Christians is Terra Sancta—the Holy Land.

The developing language of the Israelites was mostly composed of Accadian, Aramaean, to which the Chaldee and Syriac dialects belong, and Canaanite, along with some Egyptian loan-words. There were two genders and very few adverbs in the small vocabulary. Symbol and metaphor were used to express abstract terms: soul was the breath, being was the bones, descendants the seed, vigor the horn, compassion the bowels, and so on. King of Kings, song of songs, holy of holies, etc., was their way of expressing the superlative degree. Eating dust, a common expression, was a refinement of eating dung. Bethlehem meant house of bread. Rock was a common word for deity.

The Israelites fought in the land of Canaan until triumphant under Saul and David around 1000 B.C., and that enabled them to gain dominion over a large part of the area and establish two kingdoms: Isra-el (ruled by God) located in Samaria in the north, and Judah in the south. Nearly 500 chaotic years followed during which the Syrians sacked Samaria and demolished the northern kingdom; and the Babylonians invaded Jerusalem twice, totally destroying the city and kidnapping the survivors—a Captivity that lasted until the Persians under Cyrus conquered Babylon. By 520 B.C., the Jewish captives had returned to Jerusalem and its environs as Persian subjects where they began to build the temple. By 516 it was completed and the empire reorganized. By that time, the Habiru/Israelite/Judeans had begun to leave significant tracks in the records of history.

The constituent elements of the developing religion of the Jews were nearly all drawn solely from the ideas and beliefs common to the Semitic desert peoples, as well as the imposing civilizations around them: Assyria and Babylon to the east, Egypt to the South, and Phoenicia and Syria to the north. Far back in their history, they had been worshipers of more than one god. Terah is Yerah, the moon; Moses is Ma-shu, the sun; and Sinai comes from the moon-god, Sin. Eventually, another people—probably the Egyptians—inspired them to embrace the concept of monotheism. Many ethical parallels between the Old Testament and earlier Egyptian writings are evident. Specifically, Psalm 104 is a redaction of a hymn to Aton, the God of the monotheistic Egyptians. For these reasons it is safe to assume that some, perhaps many, of the Habiru were sojourners in the land of Egypt. And it's likely that the return of a goodly number of them prior to the actual exodus from Midian to Palestine, inspired the biographers of Moses to fabricate the miraculous Exodus from Egypt.

The Habiru probably quarreled with the Midianites on occasion; but, for reasons that should by now be obvious, we can safely discount the exaggerated Old Testament victories supposedly achieved over the Midianites during the wars of Gideon and Moses.

The only commandments the Habiru brought with them from the wilderness were simple taboos typical of those held by any primitive people, such as the one dealing with the sacrifices of the firstborn to the gods. The more sophisticated commandments later adopted by both Jews and Christians were culled from Egyptian sacred law and the Code of Hammurabi—both in existence long before the time of Moses. Nothing of the so-called Mosaic legislation can be attributed to the biblical Moses, whose historical existence has never been verified. In building his image, his biographers drew upon so many sources, it is quite impossible to determine what he ever did or thought, if he was a historical personage.

Although all of the moral and ethical ideas in Judaism have analogies in the faiths of Egyptians, Babylonians, and others, there are at least three innovative concepts that are peculiarly Jewish: the lack of a divine mother; the concept of "sin;" and the conviction that the one god of the universe belonged to them.

All of the ancient theologies of the Hellenistic Orient were based on the maternal deity. The divine mother of the Babylonians was Ishtar; of the Egyptians, Isis; of the Phrygians, Cybele; of the Greeks, Aphrodite; of the Romans, Venus, to name but a few. The composite figure was the Great Mother who bestowed fertility and mothered all the other gods. Perhaps the Israelites had a divine mother long ago; but everything about their religion indicates the lack of a female deity—a Baalah, or "Great Mother." If, indeed, they never had a divine mother, this would be one of the amazing riddles of history.

The acceptance of monotheism within the motherless religion of a people who lived in the harsh conditions of a barren desert, paved the way for the creation of an intensely essential, wifeless, womanless, childless Father-God, before whom no goddess could ever prevail...a total patriarchy in which the son was exalted, and the daughter ignored. . . a religious structure in which an entrenched orthodox minority could exercise an exclusive authority over all areas of life and religious practice for an entire people. . . an inflexible faith in which the prophets—"lean-looked" and angry—demanded with clenched fists and enraged voices, total obedience to Yahweh and a total observance of the inviolate Law of Yahweh.

Hence "sin," which simply means "to fall short." Among all other peoples, a sense of guilt, of baseness, of evil, could be found; but not sin, as the Jews used the word. Their sins involved falling short in the worship of their God, and in the adherence to the laws of their God. As opposed to the Greeks, for instance, who believed that people were naturally good, pious Jews believed that people were naturally evil because of the prevalence of sin. More and more over the centuries, therefore, the number of sacrificial ceremonies—new moons, passovers, sheaves, Pentecosts, feasts of trumpets and tabernacles, days of atonement, etc., dedicated to making sin-offerings for their transgressions, increased.

It isn't difficult to understand why the Jews became so obsessed with sin. So many mitzvoth (duties, or opportunities to serve Yahweh) evolved within their faith, it was virtually impossible for a man, however faithful and dedicated, not to "miss the mark" now and then, since there was nothing that Israel's god had overlooked when he gave the commandments to his people—not only for food and dress, holy days, birth, marriage, mourning, burial and death, labor, rest and sleep, prayer and thanksgiving; he had also provided rules on giving and lending, debts, slaves, adornment, grief, bathing, suicide, losing and finding—and even on love, wooing and copulation. No wonder an anonymous cynic once commented that the formalistic religious chains the Jews laid upon themselves were far heavier than any chains that could ever be laid upon them by non-Jews.

With the development of monotheism came a unique emphasis in all Jewish sacred writings on Yahweh's creation of a special people to serve him, to proclaim his name, and to exhibit knowledge of him: "Thou art an holy people chosen before all other peoples upon the face of the earth." In the beginning, preached the rabbis, the Ancient of Days had offered his wisdom to all peoples—to 70 nations— and only Israel had accepted. For that reason, the sons of Israel were the elite among men. Ergo, throughout the history of the Israclites, the prophets, whose political and theological missions were to communicate the divine word of Judgement directly to the king, and to exhort the nation to obey the laws of God, were in the vanguard of the struggle to prevent the mixing of Israel with other peoples. And just as the Israelites did not mix with non-Jews, they did not mix things: neither ox and ass, neither barley and lentil, neither linen and wool. They were proud slaves of the Torah, even to its last letter...proudly dedicated to being a peculiar and a chosen people...proudly contemptuous of all heathen—the wicked sons-for-nothing of the no-gods.

From a Jewish apologist stating that "We are a choosing people, rather than a Chosen People," to an eminent Gentile philosopher's claims to the effect that the Jewish people, rather than having been chosen primarily as recipients of special privilege, were chosen to serve and to suffer the ordeals such service entails, every attempt has been made to whitewash the religious aristocracy of Judaism. Even the rarely-voice criticism of the Chosen concept has, on occasion, been dismissed as a product of Christian anti-Semitism. But it should be evident to any biblical scholar that these rationalizations have little in common with the many Old Testament salutations to the Chosen concept. The prophet Ezra, for instance, speaking to the Jewish God, says it all:

> Thou hast said that for our sakes, Thou hast created this world. But as for the other nations, which are descended from Adam, Thou hast said that they were nothing, and that they are like unto spittle; and Thou hast likened the abundance of them to a drop on a bucket...

Throughout their history, the Habiru/Israelite/Judeans were influenced by the peoples around them: Egyptians, Babylonians, Canaanites, Philistines, and the various conquerors of Palestine including the Syrians and the Romans. But nothing was ever as stimulating and disturbing to the Jewish nation as the spread of Hellenic civilization over that part of the world by Alexander in the 4th century B.C. As a result of an increasing interest in Greek thinking and taste, young Jews seeking enlightenment began to visit Alexandria and other Hellenic cities. Even worse, when they returned to Israel, it was to mistrust the Jewish God who made light before the sun was made...to ridicule the prophets who were preaching that the badness of men was better than the goodness of women...and to quote famous Greeks like Anaxagoras who believed that god was mind; Epicurus who said there was no supernatural but only the natural; Zeno who said education was the basis of virtue and only ignorance was evil; Miletus who taught that human beings evolved from lower forms of life; Musonius who said the study of philosophy was as essential to women as to men; and even Diogenes who, when he entered a temple, cracked a louse on the altar, saying: "There! I sacrifice to all gods at once."

Jews who were impressed with Greek learning, taste, and philosophical speculation came to be known as the Letzim, or Hellenists. They rejected the notion that the one god of the universe belonged to the Jews because he had exclusively chosen them to be exalted above all other tongues. The brilliant Greeks whom they admired—among them, Aristotle, Myron, Euripides, Phidias, Polycletus, Socrates, Aristophanes—all considered themselves to be superior persons; but they never believed that they were a god-appointed people. More than anything else, this remarkable individualism appealed to the Letzim; and more and more the conviction grew within their ranks that Greek democracy could never find a common ground with Jewish theocracy.

On the other hand, the Hasidim, or Pious among the Jews, were enraged by the traitorous actions of the newly liberated sons of Israel. Of what value, they scoffed, was the speculation of the sons of the no-gods, when all truth had been given to Israel? Was it not ordained that all men would one day seize the skirt of Israel? And who among the Pious had been able to determine how many heathen souls it would take to equal one son of Israel, since the abundance of them could be likened to a drop on a bucket?

The more the orthodox branch of a religion is obsessively opposed to change, the more conflict there will always be with the moderate branch of the faith that desires change. This is the root of the dissension that has raged within Judaism from nearly the beginning—and is raging in both Israel and America today because of the explosive "Who is a Jew?" issue. The Palestinian collision between the ritualists and the reformers—or, in more symbolic terms, the prophets and the kings—simmered and bubbled and expanded until it exploded into a crisis that forced the orthodox sons of Israel to fight for their Torah and their lives. The Letzim had finally concluded that Israel, constipated with a lot of ancient puerilities and conceits, needed the physic of Hellenism; ergo, they made the decision to become the activists who would change the nation from a primitive society of ceremonial-intensive fanatics, into a modern state.

The efforts of the Hellenizing party to assert their supremacy began shortly after Antiochus, known as Epiphanes (the Illustrious), ascended to the throne of Syria, circa 175 B.C. Their plan was to convince Antiochus to accept as high priest a Jew named Menelaus who was known to be corrupt, but who was Hellenized to the degree that he could be trusted. Next they would offer enough in bribes to the Syrian garrison in the Acra, a fortress situated not far from the temple, with its barracks, arsenal, granaries and its own water-system. With the garrison in their control, they would proceed to Hellenize Jerusalem completely, and then, Israel.

But the best laid plans of mice and men often slip through the cracks of history. Enter Mattathias, a priest of the noble blood, and the most important of his five sons, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon. They organized the resistance of orthodox Israel during what came to be called the Maccabean War of Independence. Under the command of the Maccabees (Maccabi, originally the surname of Judas Mattathias, can be loosely defined as "a hammer"), the Hasidim maintained their cause by fighting with a fury that defeated four successive Syrian armies—thus preserving the orthodox name and faith of Israel. By 164 B.C., the Maccabees had restored the temple-worship at Jerusalem.

Tragically, the war of the Maccabees resulted in the defeat of the reformers by the ritualists—of the kings by the prophets. Because Christianity is rooted in the fanaticism of the prophets rather than in the enlightenment of the kings, it is safe to say the long struggle to keep the rigid ways of the desert traditions for orthodox Israel eventually left an indelible and destructive mark on the institutions, customs and religions of the Western world. To be more specific, when our Gentile ancestors gave up the achievement of thinkers and scientists, of artists, philosophers, poets and statesmen, for the revelations of neurotic, wild-eyed prophets and a gospel of worldly renunciation, the best of the West succumbed to the worst of the East.

Regarding the contributions of the Israelites to the Western world, we are told that the remarkable moral and legal wisdom that supposedly exists in both the Christian and Jewish versions of the Old Testament, was originally transcribed at least 5000 years ago. Of all the absuridities that have ever been fabricated by a people desperate to improve their image throughout the world, this is the most fanciful. For hundreds of years after the Habiru journeyed to Canaan, the so-called biblical books of the Israelites were merely compilations of spoken oracles delivered on special occasions, first handed down orally with all of the changes that would naturally occur during that process, eventually to be written over and over by anonymous authors.

The first great step in the establishment of what the world would someday call a "Hebrew" text occurred around 280 B.C. with the preparation of the Septuagint, or "Version of the 70." Legend has it that King Ptolemy II of Egypt ordered Greek versions of the Old Testament to be written by a number of rabbis, each working separately to produce a full translation in approximately 70 days. The numerous versions would then be compared with the hope that they would all reflect God's miraculous assistance by being exactly alike.

Whatever happened as the result of those ecstatic endeavors isn't known. We do know that some version of the Septuagint turned up around 300 years later when a new messianic movement led by Saul of Tarsus and John the Baptist began using it to support their claims for a new Messiah. Significantly, the Septuagint was written by Greek-speaking rabbis, some of whom must have been aware of the vast gulf that existed between Greek democracy and Jewish theocracy. Undoubtedly, the writing of the more enlightened among them reflected attempts to liberalize and humanize, to some degree at least, the Jewish perspective.

The next significant step in the preparation of the Hebrew Bible involved the writing of the Masoretic text (the Masoretes were Jewish scholars after A.D. 70) in the established Jewish language, but in consonants only—probably to prevent the growing number of disciples who were following in the footsteps of the martyred Paul, and who were "whoring" after the same new god, from corrupting more of their sacred writings. In the meantime, those New Messianists, soon to be called Christians, were conspiring to create their own specialized version of the Old Testament—along with a New Testament which was being prepared for the sole purpose of demonstrating that their new cosmic Messiah was the same as the Old Testament Davidic Messiah. For a long time to follow, both Christians and Jews paralleled each other in the development of their respective Bibles, with each of them laboring to produce an "inspired" work that would not only spell out the tenets of each faith, but would also reflect the humanistic and legalistic values that were prevalent among the more enlightened peoples of the Hellenistic Orient.

From their predatory desert past, to their furious defense of orthodoxy during the Maccabean war, to present-day Israel where the spiritual heirs of Malachi are using a 14th century manual of religious instructions in secondary schools to explain why non-Jews ought to be the slaves of the Chosen People, Jews in general are revealed as a people strangely obsessed with themselves in a uniquely dichotomous way: first, as a superior people chosen by god; and second, as the possessors of the world's number-one inferiority complex.

Although they have never had a safe and/or well-established land or national home to provide them with a foundation in the obvious, Jews have always been taught from the cradle that they are destined by Yahweh to be the most important persons on earth, if not the actual rulers of the planet. But then they come face to face with the real world in which the only signs of Jewish national greatness can be found in the exaggerated fables of the Old Testament—an experience that is intellectually and emotionally traumatizing. No one knew better than the Letzim of pre-Christian Palestine that little Israel was a cultural wasteland: no art or architecture, no science, no respected philosophical speculation, nothing of a civilized nature.

What then did the Israelites actually have to offer the West? Vague and uncertain reminiscences, idle speculations, and fantastic exaggerations—but not one single tradition worthy of credence or regard. In addition, there isn't a single great moral or ethical idea in Judaism, or in the aberrant system that it spawned, that did not originate with Egyptians, Babylonians, Greeks, Romans, or Hindus. In other words, everything that could be called humane, enlightened or civilized had to begged, borrowed or stolen from their neighbors.

Out of the seething personal superiority/inferiority conflict have come the Sammy Glicks of the world, the intellectual legatees of the prophet Micah ("The Law shall go forth from Zion...to pull down, and to destroy..."), traumatized by a lack of ego-identification. Not all Jews are Sammy Glicks. In any society, however, in which Jews are numerous enough to make an impact on the culture, Sammy always exists out of proportion to the actual number of Jews as a whole. Desperate to be wealthy and/or famous—not just as Sammy the individual, but as Sammy the JEW—he always overcompensates in everything he does in his struggle for identification and recognition. It is for this very reason that Jewish historians like Artapanus, Philo, and many others have tried to prove that all the knowledge and institutions of the Egyptians had been taken from Israel; that Abraham had instructed the Pharaohs; that Joseph taught them better forms of cultivation; that all of the grand discoveries of the Greeks had been made by Israelites a thousand years before; that Moses with his ten commandments marked out the entire history of the Western world; and that the tiny fraction of humanity known as Jewry gave the world the concept of monotheism, the eradication of idol worship, and abhorrence of human sacrifice.

For just as long as our young people (white Gentiles) are indoctrinated with the notion that the Jews were ordained by fate to be "the most essential instruments for civilizing the world," we will continue to accept the myth that the moral heritage of the West originated with a primitive tribe of desert nomads in Palestine.

Meanwhile, back at the Palestinian ranch, Pompey, pushing the frontiers of Rome eastward, captured the country in 63 B.C. As the pressure of the Graeco-Roman life increased, Judaism grew sterner and more exclusive—more and more a rigid, aristocratic theocracy—as the scribes increased the number of cases in which any intercourse with a Gentile would defile a Jew. Hand in hand with these developments came more and more rebellious activity against Gentiles in general, and Rome in particular.

By A.D. 67, a major rebellion had broken out in Galilee because seventeen talents were missing from the treasury of the temple. Nero was in power then, so he sent Vespasian to put an end to that nonsense. The Roman general found that the city of Jerusalem had become a regular battlefield with three different factions of Jews—each determined to be the most Jewish—fighting for control of the temple; so he isolated the city and left the inhabitants to starve while he subjugated the surrounding countryside. Within three years Nero died and Vespasian, who ascended to the throne, delegated Titus to finish the job he had started.

After a lengthy siege and a great slaughter, the armies of Titus conquered Jerusalem, literally smashing and burning the city to the ground. The surviving Israelites were forced to leave, with nothing remaining for them but the Law and no temple in which a scattered people could make sacrifice and worship their "Man of War," Yahweh.

It was a long time before the Jews (many of them non-Semitic eastern Europeans who had converted to Judaism) made a triumphant but bloody "return" to Palestine. During the conflict involving the establishment of a national homeland for the Israelis, 900,000 Palestinians (approximately 80 percent of the indigenous population) were dispossessed and scattered to all points of the compass within the Arab world. Here, from a publication of the Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights in Jerusalem, are a few statistics describing the modus operandi of some of those essential instruments for civilizing the world with chilling precision:

> The plan to make Arab Palestine into a Jewish state has involved the total destruction of 385 Arab villages leaving only 90 of the original 475 villages. In the district of Bethlehem, for example, all 23 Arab villages were destroyed, leaving only Jaffa City. All 31 villages in Ramleh district have been destroyed since 1948. Former Defense Minister Moshe Dyan has acknowledged that "There is not a single Jewish village in this country that has not been built on the site of an Arab village. □

THE LATE GREAT BOOK:
THE BIBLE.

AN ACCOUNT OF CHRISTIAN AND BIBLICAL ORIGINS.

Nicholas Carter feels that it is time for us to sit down and do what many Christians rarely do: Study the Holy Bible. In doing so, we may discover whether or not the Bible is indeed "Holy" and the "Word of God." In strict biblical order, the author methodically, and scathingly, examines the various claims made in the "Holy Book" and shows how many of them bear no relationship to reality whatsoever. THOSE WHO WILL NOT READ HAVE NO ADVANTAGE OVER THOSE WHO CANNOT READ

Letters to the Editor

Please let me take this opportunity to thank you for the courteous and prompt service which you have given me in the past several months that I have been dealing with you and reading your excellent publications...

You have no idea how challenging and informative your various material has been to me; I've spent the last seven years mixed up in various "Christian" denominations, doctrines, and organizations, trying to find that elusive Truth that we all seek. But it took men like Dr. Oliver and others to show me how mislead I've been in trying to find that Truth in writings of men who have been nothing but pathological liars ever since they arrived on the world scene. How thrilling it's been to read about the really great Aryan men who carved civilization out of a once-disorganized world; and they didn't have to invent a god to threaten them into adopting a code of morality. Their morality came from their very bones themselves; they were to proud to lie, cheat, or steal from each other. Now if only this proud race of ours can find the courage to throw off the parasites who seek to destroy us. Perhaps these parasites will first realize that they won't last long at all without us. Things look very bleak these days, but there is always hope.

Sincerely, J.K.,PA

The Skinheads have two thing going for them. They are strong and they are courageous. An error of the Skins is their adoption of negro music as the expression of their culture.

Culturally, America is an off-shoot of Western Europe. Our musical heritage is Classical and Romance music of the eighteenth and nineteenth century Europe and its related forms. This culture period ended in 1900. We are now living in a time of advanced cultural decline.

Since 1900 our cultural heritage has been largely supplanted by a giant entertainment industry that is predominantly Jewish and negro. Today, young Whites are doing modified negro tribal dancing to the ear-splitting din of voodoo cannibal music. Calling it rock or disco only faintly disguises its true identity.

Social dancing for us should be folk dancing of which square dancing is an example. Our music should not have negro rhythms. A new militant music for our cause is needed. A suggested rhythm would be that used by marching bands.

Cleaning our stables of the enormous cultural pollution that has been dumped upon us will be a Herculean task, but it should be looked upon as a necessary effort as part of our survival.

Yours truly, J.M., Washington

I have a bit of good news on the AIDS front. I spoke to a worker in the morgue for the township of Hempstead. He revealed that they are getting 12-15 AIDS bodies per week there. This was the rate for 1988. Now Hempstead has about 1/4 the population of Nassau County, so the total deaths must be about four times that for the county or sixty per week. This figure is only approximate. Hempstead is blacker than the rest of the county. However, not all AIDS bodies pass through the public morgue either. Thus, sixty dead per week is a good figure. For a year, this comes to 3,100 deaths among some 3,000,000 residents of the county. This figure must be compared to the official figure of 386 AIDS patients, living and dead, given out by the government as of August 1988! Deaths alone are ten time the total cases acknowledged by the government. This accords well with the figure of fifteen cases of ARC for every case of AIDS which the Wall Street Journal revealed several years ago.

For Nassau County the AIDS death rate was thus 1 per 1,000 last year. If applied to the whole nation, this would make 240,000 deaths per year, but I doubt this. Nassau is close to Jew York, one of the prime centers of AIDS infection and also has more blacks, spics, and Jews than the average for the nation. For these reasons, I estimate that the national rate is about one third of the Nassau rate. That means there were about 80,000 AIDS deaths last year in the U.S.So far this is still being hidden but not for much longer. The scale of the disease is soon going to start distorting insurance mortality tables and other statistics.

I saw three obituaries of AIDS victims in the paper today out of 11 deaths listed so that is another indication of how things are going. My favorite AIDS story of the year was the account of all-nigger Belle Glade where 2,500 out of 30,000 inhabitants have the disease.

The problem of what is holding up the long planned Middle East war has now been solved. It is the Arabs' poison gas capability combined with their missile force. If the Jews attack the Arabs again, the Arabs will saturate their four jet airfields with missiles and gas thus knocking out the Jews' murder air force. If the Jews use their neutron bombs, the Arabs will strike back with nerve gas at the single Jew metropolitan area. This threat is what has delayed the war until now.

The Jews' answer seem to be to get the U.S. to attack the Arabs for them but this requires manufactured incidents and the permission of the USSR. Many indications lately show that they are making progress toward their goal of a U.S.-Arab war for Israel. The real force driving this crisis is the financial crash which is now, finally, upon us and made worse by all the delay. The war is needed to blame the crash on.

Yours truly, R.S., New York State

Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and the host of European settlers who came to America and founded an association of individuals for common ends stood the nation well—until! Until the British-American, French, Spanish, Black African chieftains, Arab-Jewish slave trade and its results overtook and smashed the Europeans' prospects for a magnificent New World Order, In retrospect, it is obvious that trouble lay ahead when the first African and, as Ben Franklin warned, the first Jew set foot amongst the Europeans on the American shores. It is interesting to note that all of the American negroes possess British-American surnames with the exception of a smaller number of Spanish and French. We are not aware of negroes with Polish or German names. These folks did not engage in slavery, but preferred to do their own tasks and labor themselves. In the town of Comfort, Texas, is a monument to a large number of German-Americans who were murdered because they would not support the importation of Africans. And indeed before the mad policies of the Democrats instigated America into European affairs in the 1940s, the German leader was asked his thoughts on the United States: "We do not want war with America," he explained, "the United States is a Jewish-Negro society—let it stew in its own juice." And it is stewing!! We had always believed when America ruined Germany they would ruin themselves. Until Anglo-Americans extricate themselves from the vicious, uncivilized smear, hatred, and libel directed at everything German by the Jews, the United States, like Britain, will descend into a backwater.

Germany, the heart and soul of Western Civilization, fought bravely against the Bolsheviks, and the West, for the sake of the future, should have been allied with them.

And what do we now see in America? Streets deserted of pedestrians. We only have a government of sorts when people are afraid to walk in the streets at night!

CHAPTER SIX

Holocaust Lore Recycled From Bible

Much of Holocaust lore is of course a direct lift from earlier accounts of Jewish sufferings. Since history began, Jews have been regaling us—and each other—with continuous narratives of their suffering and persecution. Today it is alleged to be "the Arabs" who seek to "drive the Jews into the sea." Before that, it was the German Nazis who sought to exterminate them in "gas/steam/electrocution chambers." Before that it was the anti-Semitic Czars of Russia, and their brutal Cossack soldiers, who liked nothing better than to skewer innocent Jewish babes on the ends of their lances. Before the Cossacks, it was the Spanish Inquisition. Before that, it was the Roman Nazis, who rolled up Jewish seminary students in their Torah scrolls, and set fire to them. Then there were the Greek Nazis, and before them the Persian Nazis, and before them the Babylonian Nazis. . .and on and on.

Jews, it seems, are always in the middle of a Holocaust; just recovering from a Holocaust; or bracing themselves for the next Holocaust. Despite their constant trumpeting about "equality" and "humanity" their world is not composed of human beings, but of Jews and non-Jews; of Semites and anti-Semites.

As the brilliant Dr. Howard F. Stein pointed out (Journal of Psychohistory, Fall 1978) "the Jewish script is the same as it has been for millennia: trials, endless judgements, judges, painful punishments, death and execution. . ." I explored some of these conundrums in my book Exiles From History (Truth Missions, 1982) which is now regrettably out of print.

In Chapter Five we noted that many of the images of the more modern anti-Jewish "Holocausts" (Arab/German/Russian/Spanish/etc.) appear to be simply recycled from the earlier "Holocausts" (Roman/Persian/Babylonian/Egyptian/etc.) described in the Holy Bible and its commentary, the Babylonian Talmud.

Although we have aerial photographs (The Holocaust Revisited, CIA, 1979) and ground level photographs (The Auschwitz Album, Random House, 1981) which show no chimneys "belching forth flames and smoke," still Holocaust survivors insist that they did. It may be that such survivors are drawing on the well of imagery in the Old Testament, where God is frequently characterized as having flames and smoke belching forth from his nostrils, eyes, and mouth. (See: Deuteronomy 4:23; Deuteronomy 29:20; Nahum 1:6; and II Samuel 22:9.) The Jewish image of "God" is probably best represented by the statue of "Yogurt" in the Mel Brooks' spoof movie Spaceballs.

Likewise, when Holocaust survivors testify that they witnessed Jews being thrown/pushed/lured/driven into a chamber/oven/pit, filled with flames/gas/smoke, we are immediately reminded of the Biblical tale related in Daniel 4:26, when King Nebuchadnezzar threw three of his disobedient Jewish advisors into a "gas-oven" (preheated to regulo 7) which they miraculously survived, because the Messiah magically appeared among the flames to protect them. As with so many other Biblical and post-Biblical fairy-tales, the dim-witted King was thereby forced to admit that yes, Jews are smarter and more blessed after all, and so he gratefully turned over his administration to them. Even today, Jews around the world annually celebrate one such Biblical coup d'état in the festival of Purim, when they gleefully chant "Blessed be Mordechai and all Jews; Cursed be Haman and all Gentiles." We are unaware of any "race hate" prosecutions in Canada or any place else, as a result.

Numerous Holocaust survivors are obsessed by images of torment and torture; most of which appear to be drawn not from reality, but from the Old Testament. Holocaust lore insists that the Nazis would bash babies' heads against the gas-chamber walls; just as related in Psalms 137:9. "Happy shall he be that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones." When pregnant Jewish women are sliced open by Nazi bayonets, or if they burst open in Nazi gas-ovens, we immediately recall the Old Testament's repeated accounts (Amos 1:13 and Kings 15:16) where they suffered the same torment. When survivors relate how the Nazis would hang a dozen Jews from one rope, one not only is impressed as to the Germans' knotting expertise (maybe they were all high-ranking Boy Scouts?) one is also reminded of the natty ten-storey gallows whereby the wicked Nazi Haman was despatched, followed by his ten sons, and 75,000 other "Jew-haters," according to Esther 9:14.

When survivors like Kitty Hart tell us that they used the same bowl for washing, eating, urinating and defecating, we recall the passage in Ezekiel 4:12 where God advocated that the Jews should eat barley cakes made from human dung. (However, three verses later, the fickle Yahweh changes the recipe to cow dung.)

The slaying and decapitating of babies is a common theme in both Holocaust and Biblical lore. We already mentioned the bashing of babies' heads against the wall. God had other treats in store for his creations: in Exodus 12:29 he killed every first-born Egyptian baby as punishment for their families' irreverence. In Isaiah 13:18 babies are to be skewered on swords. In II Kings 10:7, God ordered the murder of 70

Jewish children, and their decapitated heads placed in baskets at every city gate.

Plagues, infestation, and being eaten, are common themes also. II Kings 10:10 relates how God ordered Jezebel to be eaten by dogs. Mothers are ordered to eat their own babies in various passages, such as Leviticus 26:29, Deuteronomy 28:63, Jeremiah 19:9, Lamentations 2:20, and Ezekiel 5:10. In other Biblical passages, such as II Kings 6:29 and Lamentations 4:10, God's recipe requires that the children be at least parboiled (perhaps in Treblinka-like "steam chambers"?) before being eaten.

God frequently orders plagues and bizarre punishments for nonconformists. In Malachi 2:3 he threatens to spread dung on people's faces. In Exodus 7 God turns water into blood, thus polluting every river. Then he imposed plagues of frogs, mosquitoes, flies, hoof-and-mouth disease, boils, hail, locusts, and darkness, in that order. Finally, as a tenth plague, he kills off all the youngest babies. The author of Exodus forgot to mention one further plague, because in later passages we learn that God was also unkind enough to inflict hemorrhoids against the Egyptians (Deuteronomy 28:27), and also against those other anti-Semites, the Philistines (I Samuel 5:9). Apparently, the Philistines were so impressed with God's omnipotence in this regard that they immediately crafted five golden hemorrhoids—as well as five golden mice (another God-given plague)—which they deposited in the Ark they had stolen from the Israelites, and were promptly returning to its rightful owners. Ordinary folk would be somewhat less than impressed to have their holy artifacts returned from infidels with models of rodents and anal sores installed therein. But such is the Judaic mentality that apparently the ancient Israelites and their God Yahweh were so flattered by the Philistines' tribute to their magical powers, that such unpleasant afflictions were never again visited upon them; at least not according to the scriptures.

Recommended Reading

For further reading on these references, I can recommend The X-Rated Book: Sex & Obscenity in the Bible by J. Ashley Burke (self-published; 10502 Telephone Road, Houston, TX 77075.) Although the Biblical quotations are all accurate, care must be taken with the citations; some of the digits are transposed, due to typographical error.

Deceptions & Myths of the Bible by Lloyd M. Graham (Bell Publishing, New York, 1979) is quite good in drawing attention to the pagan origins of Old Testament mythology; including a favorable reference to swastikas on p. 254. However, the author laces his commentary with a heavy dose of pro-pagan propaganda, and he accords great praise to almost any "New Ager"—including Madame Blavatsky [!]—who dares to reject Judaeo-Christian "truth" in favor of its pre-Christian mythological antecedents.

The Late Great Book: The Bible by Nicholas Carter (Truth Missions, 1985) is a Biblical commentary—a kind of Gentile Talmud—drawing attention to many of the internal- and historical-contradictions contained in the so-called "scriptures." Carter, a former Los Angeles newscaster, and now a regular contributor to the Liberty Bell, writes in an irreverent, satirical literary style—so obviously his book is highly recommended by this author/publisher.

But probably the most scholarly debunking of Biblical historicity is that written by a Jew: Isaac Asimov's Guide to the Bible; originally published in two volumes by Doubleday in 1968-69, but reproduced in one hardback, economy volume by Avenel Books in 1981. Asimov is a prolific and popular writer on the themes of science and history. His works range from historical speculation, through biological speculation, to futuristic speculation ("Sci-Fi"). However, he always couches his theorizing in copious notes, caveats, and cross-references. His Guide to the Bible is no exception. There are detailed indexes; one of the subjects, and even another of Biblical verses discussed (somewhat redundantly since the book is represented in strict scriptural order). There is also a chronology of dates of interest in Biblical history, since so many events and accounts are historically anachronistic; so much so that much of the Bible reads like an episode of television's Meeting of the Minds (hosted by Steve Allen, a religious skeptic, even though his son became an ardent cultist) where historical figures from totally different eras would miraculously come together to discuss their varying philosophies, strategies and difficulties.

Asimov's specialty seems to be the highlighting of Biblical implausibilities, such as the accounts of plagues, battles, conflicts, and careers, which have no corollary support. For example, when "Yahweh" visited the ten (or eleven) plagues upon Egypt, one would have thought that such calamitous events would have featured in the historical accounts of the era written by the Egyptians, or their close neighbors. But there is nothing.

Likewise, the Biblical account of Esther's influence over her Persian husband, King Ahasuerus, seems to be drawn from pagan Babylonian legend. Asimov points out that although there is some evidence that "Ahasuerus" might in fact be the real Persian king Xerxes

I (a claim accepted by the Lutheran scholars of Christian News) unfortunately there is no independent evidence that the other characters of the book of Esther ever existed.

Asimov argues persuasively that in fact the other characters did not really exist at all, and were merely recycled versions of Babylonian (i.e. pagan) gods and goddesses. According to the Bible, Ahasuerus (Xerxes?) dumped his first wife, Vashti, in favor of the Jewess Esther. Esther then used her sexual prowess and influence over the king to persuade him to stop his prime minister, Haman, from inaugurating a pogrom against Persia's Jewish population. After Ahasuerus was "converted" by the new Mrs. Ahasuerus to being a Righteous Gentile, instead of the Jews decorating the gallows, it was Haman & Co. who received their come-uppance. Allegedly, the king then replaced his "anti-Semitic" prime minister Haman with Esther's uncle Mordechai; just as Haman's niece Vashti had herself been replaced by Esther.

Anachronisms At Work

The only trouble is that none of these names come up in any contemporary accounts. As Asimov points out, if we explore a little further, we find that "Vashti" was in fact a pre-Babylonian goddess from the Elamite era; and their main god was "Haman."

After the Babylonians replaced the Elamites, the Babylonian gods replaced the Elamite gods. "Haman" was replaced by "Marduk"—who sound awfully similar to Mordechai. "Vashti" was replaced by "Ishtar" or "Esther" or "Hadassah" depending on which dialect you prefer.

American Jews continue to recognize the holy significance of these mythical characters. Esther is a very popular Jewish name. One of its synonyms, "Hadassah," has become the name of the American branch of WIZO, the Women's International Zionist Organization. Another synonym, "Ishtar," was amazingly adopted as the title of a recent movie film, starring two neurotic American Jews, Dustin Hoffman and Warren Beatty. (The movie was a box-office flop.)

"Survivors" Influenced

All of these thoughts and more flooded through my mind as I sat listening to a Mermelsteinian character by the name of Arnold Friedman, testifying to his Auschwitzean experiences, at the Preliminary trial of Ernst Zündel in Toronto in June 1984. Friedman's Preliminary testimony was a neurotic monologue of imagery, hearsay, and "fishing yarns." Since Friedman was only 16 at the time he was interned at Auschwitz, he seems to have been highly susceptible to "bogey man stories" told to him by older inmates, as well as by unkind staffers and "trusties." When workers were being selected for the constellation of factories surrounding Auschwitz, mischievous comrades told him that the selections were actually being made for the "gas chambers." When incoming internees queued up at the Sauna building, he was told that they were lining up to be gassed. When he was placed in a teenagers' compound, and his parents in other compounds, he was told that they had been exterminated. When he saw smoke, he was told to "wave good-bye to the smoke" (p. 210) "because we knew these were our friends." The boys would even play guessing games, trying to figure out the nationality of the gassees' smoke. According to Friedman, skinny Polish Jews produced red smoke, whereas fat Hungarian Jews produced yellow smoke. (See: Prelim. p. 206; pp. 213-214; and especially EZ#1 p. 326.)

Adopting the Asimov approach to such tales, we are once again struck by both the similarity of such "Holocaust" claims to earlier Biblical torments, and also by the absence of any documentary or forensic evidence to support such wild allegations.

All of Friedman's yarns were based on hearsay: his testimony was peppered with qualifiers such as "we were told," or "we all knew" or "it was common knowledge." Not once did he—or the prosecutor—present a single documentary proof, in the form of an order, a plan, a blueprint, a budget, a photograph, an autopsy, or a forensic report, to back up all of this rambling testimony.

Just as the Jewish tales of the Old Testament are largely recycled from ancient Babylonian fables, so too are the Jewish tales of the "Holocaust" recycled from the Old Testament. Where the scriptures place Biblical figures way outside their historical eras, so too the Holocaust legend places demonic figures (Hitler, Himmler, Dr. Mengele) way off their documented itineraries.

According to an interview with Holocaust Expert® Raul Hilberg in the Jerusalem Post (International Edition) of 28 June 1986, p. 8:

> Much of personal [survivor] testimony is unreliable about names, locations or dates. . .What survivors speak about most is their suffering. Samuel Gringauz, himself a survivor, had harsh words for these personal histories. In the January 1950 issue of Jewish Social Studies he called them "Judaeocentric, logocentric and egocentric." For him, most of the memoirs were full of "preposterous verbosity, exaggeration, dramatic effects, dilettante philosophizing, would-be lyricism, unchecked rumors, bias, and apologies."

Likewise, according to the Wilmington, Delaware, Evening Journal of 27 August 1986 p. A10:

> A small story appeared in the Jerusalem Post [17 August 1986, p. 1], the widely-read English language newspaper, that must have floored thousands of Jews and their friends. It was to the effect that more than half of the 20,000 testimonials from Holocaust survivors on record in Yad Vashem are "unreliable" and have never been used as evidence in Nazi war crimes trials. . .The Jerusalem Post reveals that this comes from Shmuel Krakowski, director of archives in Yad Vashem. The Post quotes him as saying: "A large number of testimonials on file here were later proved to be inaccurate when locations and dates could not pass an expert historian's appraisal."

The late Holocaust historian Gerald Reitlinger warns us in The Final Solution (Sphere, London, 1971, p. 581) that:

> A certain degree of reserve is necessary in handling all this material. . .particularly [survivor narratives]. . .the Eastern European Jew is a natural rhetorician, speaking in flowery similes. . .Sometimes the imagery transcends credibility.

According to Hannah Arendt's account of Eichmann in Jerusalem (Penguin, 1978; p. 208):

> If Eichmann's name was mentioned at all, it obviously was hearsay evidence, "rumors testified to," hence without legal validity. The testimony of all witnesses who had "seen him with their own eyes" collapsed the moment a question was addressed to them.

Arendt's successor at Israeli war-crimes trials, Gitta Sereny, reports in the New Statesman (2 November 1979; p. 672):

> But it is true that, along with many authentic works, there have been books or films which were only partly true, or even were partly faked. And unfortunately, even reputable historians often fail in their duty of care. . .for instance Martin Gilbert. . .in Final Journey.

Despite her Exterminationist views, Ms. Sereny is not as dogmatic as many of her peers. This may have something to do with the fact that she is not Jewish. She was raised as a Protestant even after her mother married the Austrian Jewish economist Ludwig von Mises (an intermarriage tradition which she herself continued). She writes (London Review of Books, 21 April 1988, p. 83):

> A very disturbing thing has happened to journalism, to the writing of history, and even to justice. In anything to do with the Nazis. . .any attempt at detachment is considered suspect, any degree of objectivity reprehensible. . .I have battled in print against. . .men like Martin Gray (For Those I Loved) who use these appalling [Holocaust] events for self-aggrandizement. . .but attacking Gray causes wrathful indignation among Holocaust dogmatics.

I interviewed Ms. Sereny when I attended the Jerusalem show-trial of John Demjanjuk in February 1987. and some of my comments about the credibility of the "eye-witnesses" seem to have sunk in. In a lengthy color feature in the prestigious London Sunday Times Magazine (20 March 1988, p. 31) she writes:

> The shadow of the "gas-chambers-never-existed" cabal hovered over the trial. David McCalden: Absent from the Israel case is its basics: no murder weapon nor any forensic evidence to show there was one. . .no corpse or corpses, nor any. . .evidence that such ever existed. . .(and no) documentation of such an enormous program was ever presented. . .only recycled hearsay.

Ms. Sereny and I are not the only ones to express doubts about the credibility of the troupe of Fabulous Treblinka Testifyers. When the eye-witness team was summoned to sunny Florida to testify in the deportation of Feodor Fedorenko, the judge in that case condemned their evidence as "coached" and "least credible." Now, in the book Identifying Ivan (Harvard University Press, 1989) identification expert Dr. Willem A. Wagenaar reports that:

> I know of no other case in which so many deviations from procedures internationally accepted as desirable occurred. (p. ix)
> Every year on August 2—the day of the uprising in Treblinka—some of the survivors used to meet in Tel Aviv. Turowski, Goldfarb and Rosenberg all lived in Israel, as did the witnesses who identified Demjanjuk in September and October: Czarny, Boraks and Lindwasser. Their testimony can be accepted only after it is established that they did not meet with the other three.
> Some doubts on the matter are justified because. . .the witnesses traveled together in the same aircraft to Fort Lauderdale, where the Fedorenko trial was held. They also stayed in the same hotel, had meals together, but were still supposed to make fully independent identifications. Boraks—who was not in full command of his memory when he was questioned in 1987—declared, when asked about the journey to Fort Lauderdale, that he went there by train. (p. 110)

The testimony of Arnold Friedman was typical of the "preposterous verbosity" and "would-be lyricism" observed by Gringauz back in 1950, and uncovered by Hilberg in his Jerusalem Post interview of 1986. (Maybe his grilling at EZ#1 in January 1985 had got him thinking. . .?) The Preliminary transcript shows Friedman rambling for page after page in monolog, recalling anecdotes and gossip about camp routines, their significance and application. About the only factual, checkable claim made by Friedman was that his interment number was B14515. (Auschwitz and Auschwitz-Birkenau were of course the only camps which tattooed prison numbers on the internees' forearms; on account of their extraordinarily large internee population. Although an educated guess would be that the "A" Numbers refer to Auschwitz-1 and the "B" numbers to Auschwitz-Birkenau, in fact this was not the case; B numbers were used after the A's ran out.)

In cross-examination, Lauren Marshall did her best to pin down the garrulous Friedman with the use of some visual aids; in particular a plan of Auschwitz-Birkenau. Friedman implicitly acknowledged that his party had disembarked from their train, and marched past "gas chambers" Krema II and Krema III to the enormous Sauna building at the back of the camp, where he survived being showered and deloused (Prelim. p. 222). Unfortunately, Mrs, Marshall was not completely familiar with the plan herself—neither was I in 1984—and so when she read out some of the numberings, she misread Roman numerals as (Arabic) letters. But neither the witness, nor the judge, nor the prosecutor, nor her adviser (myself) picked up on this at the time.

Mrs. Marshall tried to ask the witness about his claims of "belching chimneys" when the Allied aerial photographs contradict this. However, Judge Wally overruled her question, since the witness was not in the cockpit at the time.

Friedman acknowledged that there were regular, non-homicidal, delousing programs (Prelim. p. 227), and that teenage inmates did not have to work (Prelim. p. 228), that Gypsy families were allowed to remain together (Prelim. p. 228), and that each compound had its own hospital block for the treatment of minor ailments such as toothaches (Prelim. p. 230).

When Mrs. Marshall began to tax Friedman on his "knowledge" of the "gas chambers" Judge Hryciuk began to intervene more vigorously. Although the witness appeared more than willing to admit that his "knowledge" was all based on hearsay, the judge continued to badger Mrs. Marshall with interdictions as to relevancy. Eventually, the judge became completely irritated with Mrs. Marshall's insistence on specific proof of "the Holocaust" and insisted that she terminate her cross examination.

Feeling smug that they had wrapped up their case against D6MRD?, the Crown prosecutor, Peter Griffiths, now turned his attentions to the other "offending" flyer, The West, the War & Islam.

As we know, neither pamphlet was written by Ernst Zündel. D6MRD? was written by one Richard Verrall (under the alias of "Richard Harwood") and TW,TW&I was written by Zündel's assistant, Eric Thomson. Thomson had had a colorful career around the world; having worked "both sides of the street" as both a United States Information Agency officer in South America, and later as a Nazi activist in southern Africa. Eric Thomson therefore is one of those unique individuals to have been expelled from South America for "CIA" activities, and from Rhodesia for "Nazi" activities!

Unaware of the true authorship of TW,TW&I, the Crown produced as their first witness against the flyer a Macluhanesque character by the name of Dr. Derrick de Kerckhove, a professor of linguistics at the University of Toronto. Griffiths ran through de Kerckhove's curriculum vitae in the same subservient manner by which he had previously groveled to Dr. Raul Hilberg, the American Jewish professor who claims Expertise® over the "Holocaust."

The Belgian-born de Kerckhove's answers seemed to be lifted from that scene in Annie Hall where Woody Allen (né: Alan Königsberg) produced Marshall MacLuhan from behind a panel to have him pontificate on "the meaning of language" to a cinema queue. Fortunately, Marshall MacLuhan died a few years before the Zündel preliminary opened: otherwise he might have substituted for the windbag de Kerckhove. . . .although, there again, maybe not. MacLuhan was a little too iconoclastic for that. . .

De Kerckhove flummoxed the court by announcing that his Expertise® was in neuro-cultural research, and that:

> neuro-cultural research is the impact of the phonetic alphabet on the nervous system and on information-processing on the brain. It is a very theoretical research; it involves collaboration with the neuro-sciences at the University of Toronto [Wow!] and it is in process still. However, it is definitely the kind of work that I am doing, yes. [That's reassuring!]

Again, the Ukrainian judge was reaching the end of his tether, and persuaded prosecutor Griffiths to terminate his examination of this windbag as quickly as possible. De Kerckhove wound up his testimony with a flourish, stating that the over-use of "adjectives" (Prelim. p. 243) in TW, TW&I and its mailing to the non-committed population of Canada, might constitute "junk mail."

It is little wonder that the crackpot de Kerckhove was not re-summoned as a "linguistics expert" to EZ#1 or EZ#2!

A Banker is Banjaxed

Next up was John Thomas Burnett, the Vice-President of the Royal Bank of Canada. Burnett acknowledged that the Royal Bank of Canada is the largest bank in Canada, and the 4th largest in North America. He testified that the Royal Bank has approximately 86,000 shareholders, and 48 directors. These directors, he claimed, are drawn from among the "captains of industry, etc."

Burnett admitted that the Royal Bank of Canada makes loans to East Bloc nations, but insisted that such loans were only made on a business basis. He claimed that there was no bulwark against his bank making loans to Communist, Islamic or Third World nations; his only criterion was profit.

In cross-examination, Mrs. Marshall attempted to grill the fatuous Burnett on the difference between consumer banks (like Royal Bank of Canada) and investment banks like Kuhn Loeb, Warburg, Rothschild, and Dreyfus. Unfortunately, at this point I had returned to California, and was unable to assist Mrs. Marshall's strategy. Judge Hryciuk again intervened, and insisted that she terminate this tack of questioning.

A Masonic Policeman!

The Crown's next witness was police Sergeant Roy Bassett, who was not to testify on behalf of the police, but on behalf of their alter ego, the Freemasons. To a jury, obviously it would be incredible that the Crown should produce a Masonic Police-officer as proof that there was no Masonic-Police conspiracy. But, since there is no jury at Preliminary trials, the issue was postponed until later.

Bassett—a British immigrant—admitted that the Canadian Freemasons owe allegiance to the British Freemasons. He also confessed that he had only read the flyer TW, TW&I that very morning—and even then not very well. (Prelim. p. 272).

Under cross-examination by Mrs. Marshall, he admitted that Freemasons have secret rituals and passwords. He insisted—incorrectly—that such knowledge is "available to anybody to read". The rest of his testimony was an exercise in circumlocution and evasion.

Yet Another Masonic Policeman!

Perhaps after being stung by the hearsay nature of Sgt. Williams' testimony early in the Preliminary, the Crown exhibited as their last witness Sgt. John Luby, who had led the interrogation of Ernst Zündel way back on 29 May 1984. Luby confessed that he and his partner Williams had "not recorded verbatim" the statements of Ernst Zündel, but that he recalled from memory that Zündel had indicated during his interrogation that he was tired of fighting this issue, and that he was ready to throw in the towel after 25 years (Prelim. p. 283).

Luby added that because of Mrs. Citron's allegations and laying charges, Zündel would now have to rescind his "retirement" decision, since Mrs. Citron had now "given him a platform."

With that, the Crown wrapped up its case, and the Court remanded the defendant to stand trial. Ernst Zündel was ordered to appear on 9 August 1984 at 9:30am to set a date for trial.

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?

SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the rôles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The books goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. For your copy of Which Way Western Man? send $14.50 (which includes $2.50 for postage and handling for the softback edition (Order No. 22003).

DOES THE WEST HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980—except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

THE FINAL SECRET OF PEARL HARBOR

I have just seen the disclosure of a crucial historical fact, hitherto kept profoundly secret by the rulers of the United States, which will force you, as it has forced me, drastically to revise our understanding of recent history. It is an article, entitled "Tigers of a Different Stripe," by Don McLean in Soldier of Fortune, January 1989.

I am convinced that it is not a canard. There is no indication that Yahweh's venomous race, the world's Masters of Deceit, contrived or inspired the article, which surely does not serve their purposes. Mr. McLean gives precise references to documents now in the archives in Washington, and even reproduces two of them photographically. It is likely that there are still in the United States, and conceivably even in universities, American historians who are more interested in establishing historical facts than in pleasing their paymasters; they will surely look for documents thus specifically and precisely designated and verify them. And finally and most cogently, the fact now disclosed fits so perfectly a gap in our present knowledge that it has the logical validity of a piece of a jigsaw puzzle put into its place.

I thought that I had disclosed in America's Decline, the ultimate secret of Pearl Harbor, the fact that the unspeakably foul energumenon called Franklin Roosevelt, in January 1941, almost a full year before the attack on Pearl Harbor, had incited the Japanese by informing "in strict confidence" the Portuguese Ambassador that his countrymen need not be concerned about their colonies in the Orient because the United States was going to attack Japan when her military forces were extended to the limit and most vulnerable, and would thus destroy Japan. The Ambassador naturally cabled the good news to his government in his most secret code, which the Japanese had compromised and were reading currently. And the success of the diseased monster's scheme was attested a few days later when the Portuguese message was quoted in Japanese diplomatic messages that American cryptanalysts were reading.[1] The Japanese were thus led to believe that the Americans would soon attack them, and that they should therefore gain the advantage of surprising the enemy that intended to surprise them.

I erred grossly in the conclusions which I drew from that fact. I assumed that the loathsome creature had been bluffing, and that the Japanese had blundered in being taken in by what was just another of his innumerable lies.[2] In America's Decline, again in "The Yellow Peril" and especially in Liberty Bell, April 1984, pp. 5-7, where I condemned the Japanese for ignoring their own best interests when they decided to attack Pearl Harbor instead of honoring their obligations under their treaty and alliance with Germany, thus precipitating the catastrophe in the West and the Suicide of Europe, I was thinking in terms of an American expeditionary force in hundreds of ships carrying thousands of American soldiers to the Orient to be killed for the delight of the monster and the ophidian race to which he partly belonged. I thought it was certain that the loathsome creature could not have sent such an expedition to attack Japan without preparations that would have alarmed even the dullest of the boobs in a nation that preponderantly wished to remain at peace.

I knew, of course, that when the diseased and blood-thirsty animal in the White House used the Portuguese Ambassador to incite the Japanese, he had been waging for more than a year a secret war of aggression against Germany, using his command of our Navy to attack German ships, in the hope that Germany would, in exasperation, declare open war on the United States to counter the sneaking war he was waging against her, and that he apparently turned to Japan only when he found that Hitler wisely was ignoring the provocation. I considered, of course, a comparable use of the Navy against Japan, but that, I thought, could not be kept secret from the American people who were eventually to be the victims. So I concluded that the great War Criminal had bluffed the Japanese.

1. Professor James Martin informs me that the parts of "Magic" that have been made public do not include the messages to which I refer. This would indicate that the Army is still trying to keep this much of the great War Criminal's treason secret, but after the disclosures in Soldier of Fortune that will no longer be worthwhile.

2. In Washington at the time, and especially among the "Liberal" bureaucrats who had to deal with the perfidious creature, there was current an epigram: "He has conscientious scruples against telling the truth."

I accordingly speculated about differences in racial mentality that prevented the Japanese from understanding the limitations of presidential power at that time. I overlooked the obvious and logical solution. Now that Mr. McLean has published it, I marvel at my obtuseness.[3]

I knew, of course, that a group of American mercenaries, who called themselves the "Flying Tigers" and were commanded by a Captain Chennault, had been hired by the Chinese to fight the Japanese, but I never guessed that they were a part of the War Criminal's plot.

Mr. McLean cites a secret memorandum from the Chief of Naval Operations, dated 17 January 1940, two years before the attack on Pearl Harbor and a year before the diseased monster used the Portuguese Ambassador to incite the Japanese, which, with complementary secret documents signed by Admiral Thomas C. Hart, conclusively prove that Roosevelt was then planning a devastating attack on Japan with bombers that would exploit the knowledge that "one of Japan's greatest fears rests upon [i.e., is of] bombing of the homeland." The crime was to be carried out with typical hypocrisy.

American aviators would be released from the Army, Navy, and Marine air corps to be hired as mercenaries through the Intercontinent Corporation, owned by William D. Pawley, which would hire them "under contract with the Chinese government" and with money supplied by the American government through the trick of guaranteeing loans ostensibly made by private bankers to supplement the secret loan of $100,000,000 made directly to China by Morgenthau, the Sheeny who was in charge of the American Treasury, obviously by agreement with the part-Jew in the White House. Japan would thus be unable to prove that the Roosevelt government's pretense of neutrality, which had been solemnly affirmed by the War Criminal, was odious hypocrisy. The Japanese would thus be kept inactive by American "neutrality" until the United States was ready to strike the final blow and contrive a pretext for open war.

3. I yield to the temptation to palliate my blunder and say that it seemed to be confirmed by one of the foul fiend's attempts to create a pretext for attacking Japan. He despatched a small naval vessel into waters in which the Japanese navy was operating, hoping that the Japanese would sink it. See Admiral Kemp Tolley, Cruise of the Lanikai, Incitement to War, (Annapolis, Naval Institute Press, 1973). One could add an inference from the anxiety, indiscreetly confessed by the Roosevelt female in her newspaper column, with which the monster was awaiting on the morning of 7 December news that the American fleet in Pearl Harbor had been destroyed. Why such anxiety, if the desired war was certain? (It probably wasn't anxiety: just impatience to get the killing and disasters started.)

The plan for the sneaking attack on Japan sketched in January 1940 was fully elaborated in the secret "Joint Army-Navy Board Paper 355, Serial 691," dated 23 June 1941, which described in detail the scheme that Roosevelt obviously had authorized no later than 15 April 1941, eight months before Pearl Harbor, when he ordered that American officers and servicemen on active duty should be encouraged to accept "leaves of absence" and take employment as Chinese mercenaries, with a guarantee that they could return to the armed services of the United States as though they had been serving honorably in them during their absence. The plan was to destroy first the "Japanese Industrial Establishment," thus not only halting the production of weapons and supplies for the Japanese army and navy, but also so destroying all other industry as to make the economic structure of Japan collapse. The bombers would use incendiary bombs to devastate Japanese cities and fry Japanese civilians, as was eventually done in the famous raid on Tokyo.

The plan called for diversion of armaments then being (illegally) sent to Britain. Two hundred fighter planes and one hundred bombers would go into operation against Japan by September 1941, and by December the pseudo-Chinese air force would have the full complement of five hundred planes with American aviators to man them and American technicians and mechanics as ground crews to maintain them. Thus the planned devastation of Japan would be well under way in December 1941.

Only difficulty and delay in diverting weapons promised the British prevented the plan from being carried out on schedule and enabled Japan to get in the first blow. Some American soldiers had been despatched to Chennault's secret base in China on 21 November, and more were to leave Los Angeles on 11 December. A production of Lockhead bombers destined for China was ready on 7 December, awaiting ships to load them.

These facts, of course, drastically alter your understanding of the situation. When the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor, they were not deceived by a bluff; they were defending themselves against an act of war, a war of unconscionable aggression. They are completely absolved of all guilt, even according to the criteria of International Law that prevailed among civilized nations before that law was repudiated by Britain and the United States in their catastrophic Advance to Barbarism.

There is only one item lacking to complete the terrible history. Did the Japanese know of the detailed plan set forth in the Army-Navy Board's document of 23 July 1941? I hope that some Japanese historians will be able to answer that question definitively. In the meantime, in the absence of proof, I think it highly probable that the Japanese were fully informed of the essentials of the plot.

Although it seems that the Japanese did not succeed in reading American codes of any consequence, except some operational codes used by the Air Force, they had great success in breaking Chinese codes and ciphers,[4] and they could have obtained some information from those sources, especially Chinese messages about preparations for reception of the American forces. Japanese espionage was always highly successful in China, and sometimes elsewhere. The planned attack on Japan, although secret, was necessarily known to a very considerable number of persons, including men given to indiscretion. But the further question imposes itself: Did the Japanese intelligence have to exert itself to learn the secret?

It is scarcely credible that the hypocrisy of the American scheme was intended to be successful and deceive the Japanese. When two hundred American bombing planes, some of which would inevitably be shot down, operated by officers and crew men detached from the American Army and Navy, some of whom would inevitably be killed and others captured, began to raid Japanese cities, even boobs would not have been deceived by the transparent pretext that the raiders were mercenaries hired by China. It must obviously have been intended that the Japanese would not be imbeciles and, recognizing the fact, would declare war on the treacherous Americans, with or without diplomatic formalities. Thus the monster would get his war with Japan, and Germany, honoring her obligations to her ally, would declare the war on the United States that the great War Criminal had been unable to provoke by the secret naval war he had been waging against Germany.

4. See J. W. Bennett, W. A. Hobart, and J. B. Spitzer, Intelligence and Cryptanalytic Activities of the Japanese During World War II (Laguna Hills, California; Aegean Park Press, 1986). The scope of this study is limited to the period after Pearl Harbor. It may underestimate the efficiency of Japanese espionage, since the authors may not have had access to highly secret information, which the defeated Japanese would prudently have kept out of the hands of the conquerors, who intended to murder some high-ranking Japanese officers after mock trials to provide a spurious legitimacy for the notorious murders at Nuremberg—both crimes, of course, in utter defiance of the International Law the United States had pragmatically repudiated and of the simple sense of decency and justice that is part of our now despised Aryan inheritance. We cannot palliate our guilt by blaming the Jews: they instigated our crimes, but we committed them, knowing that we were repudiating the ethics of our race and of civilized mankind to please our parasites.

Now if the wanton attack on Japan was intended to provoke a war, would it not have been reasonable to make certain that the preparations for it would become known to Japan, thus confirming the information that had been transmitted through the Portuguese? That could only hasten the yearned-for day and the marching of Americans to slaughter for the glory of the Jews and Roosevelt's colleague, Stalin. And it would in the meantime effectively prevent the Japanese from taking action in Siberia. I think it likely that that is what was done.

Soldier of Fortune has included, obiter, a consideration that is highly relevant in this connection. It is now accepted history that the clever Communist spy in Japan, Sorge, changed the fortunes of civilized mankind when he sent to his Soviet employers on 15 October his now famous message, "Japanese carrier force attacking United States Navy at Pearl Harbor probably dawn November six."[5] It is assumed that that message enabled Stalin to transfer to the defence of Russia the army of two million men he was having to maintain in Siberia to guard his eastern border against the Japanese. The two million were hurled against the Germans, who had already occupied the outskirts of Moscow and believed Russia already defeated, and thus produced the delay that mired the Germans in the unprecedentedly severe winter and so prepared the final catastrophe of Western civilization. But for that sudden flood of Soviet troops, the war would have been over before the great War Criminal who had planned it could have herded his hated American subjects[6] into Europe to fight and die for international Jewry.

5. Some Americans have expressed indignation because Stalin (as they assume) did not inform Washington of the impending attack. Why should Stalin have informed his American partner of what that partner already knew and, indeed, had contrived?

6. Even before Roosevelt got the war started in Europe, Lady Astor perceived the insane hatred that actuated the great War Criminal and

Now Sorge sent on 4 October a first report that Japan had decided not to invade Siberia and Manchuria—and the next day, on 5 October, the Germans were attacked by an unexpected horde of Soviet troops, some of them identified as from the Siberian Red Army. It was, of course, physically impossible for troops to have been transferred from Siberia to Russia in that time, and although the transfer of troops from Siberia had been delayed, according to the Soviet General Zhukov, the Siberian Army was attacking the Germans on 10 October. The transfer of two million men for two thousand miles over a single-track railroad simply could not have been carried out in that time. It follows that the transfer had been begun, and Stalin had been authoritatively informed that Japan could not invade Siberia long before he received Sorge's message. (It is furthermore obvious that no sane ruler would stake the survival of his régime on an uncorroborated message from a spy.)

It is obvious, therefore, that Stalin must have been informed of the American plan and preparations for a sneak attack on Japan long before 3 October. He must have been authoritatively informed from Washington. The article tactfully suggests that the information was sent by Lauchlin Currie, the notorious Communist agent and spy who was Roosevelt's closest adviser and associate, and who had acted for him when the document of 23 July 1941 was drawn up for Roosevelt's approval.[7]

If Currie, why not his principal? Even in his desperate situation, Stalin would have hesitated to stake everything on the report of a spy, however efficient, but he would have accepted the as-his British accomplice and stooge, but she reduced her observation to a quip: "Franklin hates everyone who can walk, and Winston hates everyone who is sober." Some apologists for Roosevelt argue that his mind was perverted by the disease, probably syphilis, which left him a cripple, but a Naval officer who had dealings with Roosevelt when he was Secretary of the Navy under Wilson told me that then, before he was crippled, "He was the same arrogant and treacherous son-of-a-bitch that he is today." It is possible, however, that the creature's native viciousness, partly hereditary, was augmented by the disease. The late Professor Harris Fletcher, distinguished for his studies of Milton, believed, on the basis of observation, that persons physically or mentally deformed naturally hate healthy men and long to see them suffer.

7. Soldier of Fortune prints on p. 71 a picture that shows Currie in fraternal association with Felix Frankfurter, the Sheeny and known Communist agent to whom Roosevelt gave the job of liquidating juridically the scraps of the American Constitution that were still left.

surances of his partner in Washington, the unspeakable monster who had contrived the war in the first place.

I need not expatiate on the conclusions to be drawn from the great clarification of the most sinister and tragic event in American history. Now we know, more securely than ever, on what infamous creature rests the guilt for our ruin.[8]

Now we know what happened and why. There remains one question, futile, to be sure, but posed by our minds' proclivity to ask whether a given result was inevitable. We all wonder what would have been the outcome, if Pickett had made his famous charge at Gettysburg earlier and Lee had been victorious. Likewise we ask ourselves whether Japan would have done better, and would have escaped eventual defeat, if, despite the dire menace of American aggression, she had honored her commitment to Germany and invaded Siberia in October or as much earlier as she knew of Roosevelt's plan. The Germans would have attained a decisive victory in October and destroyed the Soviet before the bombing of Japan could have begun, and after the German triumph, the foul thing that hoped to become the American Lenin would have been quite unable to persuade the American people to countenance an attack on either Japan or Germany. Our civilization and our race might have been saved from suicide. The question is tantalizing, but the hypothesis is only an inference from ambiguous evidence made in the light of subsequent events.

8. The author, to protect himself, has had to seem to acquiesce in the current form of the Big Lie about the most loathsome War Criminal of all history. Since it is now fairly well known that the diseased and part Jewish monster called Roosevelt contrived the catastrophic war that was the Suicide of Europe and induced the Japanese to destroy the American fleet that he had put in Pearl Harbor as tempting bait, the revised version now is that the foul anthropoid had to start the war to save mankind (i.e., the Sacred Sheenies) from Aryan civilization. That he promoted the catastrophic war is, as I have said, now established to the satisfaction of everyone willing to read and think, and will be even more generally known, now that the original text of David Hoggan's The Forced War has at last been published in English. I have not yet seen the new book, but I read and reviewed the German translation, Der erzwungene Krieg, twenty-five years ago. Much information has become available since Hoggan wrote, but none, I believe, as crucial as the article in Soldier of Fortune, which enormously strengthens Hoggan's conclusions.

THE NEW ORDER CHANGETH, TOO

Last autumn the Christian Science Monitor devoted a full page to what would have been a 'scoop' in the old days of independent and competitive journalism. It predicted that on the first of January 1989, William F.Buckley, Jr., would retire from active management of National Review and, dignitatis causa, move himself upstairs as "Editor in Chief," turning over the actual editorial responsibility to an imported editor named John O'Sullivan. It hinted that important changes in staff and policy would follow, and presented a "mock up" of an appropriate cover for the first issue in 1989, which would announce the abdication of the founder of the journal and Mr. O'Sullivan's ascension to the editorial throne.

In America's Decline I sketched the origin of National Review, as planned by Professor Willmoore Kendall of Yale, and its conversion into what he called "just another Liberal journal" when he severed his connection with it. The periodical, originally a weekly, became a fortnightly, survived heavy losses and the enforced liquidation of the original publishing company, National Weekly, Inc., and eventually survived the loss of the best mind ever associated with it, James Burnham, who (for cash) had lent his name to the masthead, given advice (sometimes disregarded), and written articles.[1]

The fortnightly eventually became a solvent, soundly established, and perhaps quite profitable business, and certainly the most literate representative of the kind of "conservatism" that was promulgated by old Ronnie Reagan's speech-writers, including, of course, slavish obedience to Yahweh's Master Race. Since

1. Mr. Burnham owed his reputation (and prosperity) to his Managerial Revolution (1941), in which he identified the fatal separation of control from ownership which has made our society hopelessly vulnerable. His greatest book is The Machiavellians (New York, Day, 1943; paperback reprint, Chicago, Regnery, 1963), in which he examines the real bases of politics in the traditional and favorable sense of a word which is now currently used to designate a form of criminal activity. His Suicide of the West (New York, Day, 1964) is a sequel, identifying clearly the intellectual and spiritual disease, the "AIDS" of civilization, that is called "Liberalism." Mr. Burnham died of cancer last year, and, sad to relate, just before his death, a pack of Christians invaded the sick room and harassed the dying man until they succeeded in splashing on him some holy water that would reserve for his ghost a comfortable apartment in old Jesus's famous retirement home up in the stratosphere. It is shocking that that indignity was inflicted on Burnham, who was a rational man and regarded Christianity as a crude fiction, which had been useful as a myth so long as it provided an effective means of social control (see The Machiavellians).

its primary objective was more or less subtle promotion of the Jesus-cult, preferably in the version vended in Rome at the time the journal was founded, it was exposed to acute embarrassment when the Papacy was made just another mouthpiece for the international socialism that is only nominally and superficially distinct from Bolshevism, but Mr. Buckley was able adroitly to avoid with editorial finesse commitment to either endorsement of or opposition to the ecclesiastical revolution.[2]

Given the position that National Review attained through the wit of its editor and two or three of its writers, the news in the Christian Science Monitor was of interest. It was not, however, entirely accurate. Mr. O'Sullivan did become the editor, and Mr. Buckley did move up to the journalistic penthouse, but that happened many weeks before the first of the year, and there has been no announcement of Mr. Buckley's retirement—not even a preparatory hint. The latest issue I have at hand is dated 24 February 1989. It contains, as usual, reprints of "Bill" Buckley's syndicated newspaper columns (in which he waxes sentimental about a performance by Ronnie and Nancy Reagan, even alluding to Philemon and Baucis, quoting the story, not from Ovid, but from Whittaker Chambers). There is a book review by him, and his dextrous hand is visible in the editorial section. If the Monitor was right about the eventual change, the transition is being slowly and cautiously prepared.

On the other hand, there has been a notable change in staff with the departure of William A. Rusher, the publisher (i.e., the man legally responsible for the contents of the journal). Rusher, who joined the staff as a young lawyer—"a Wall Street lawyer," he likes to say—had great influence on the conduct of the magazine, and some members of its large staff (just read the long column of names under the masthead!) believe that he was primarily responsible for the management that eventually made it unnecessary for him to write periodically letters begging for another $375,000 immediately so that National Review would not have to stop publication with the issue then in press. Some credit him with the very considerable improvement in typography and

2. The equivocation did not content Mr. Buckley's brother-in-law, Brent Bozell, the author of The Conscience of a Conservative by Barry Goldwater. He seceded and founded an admirably forthright journal, Triumph, which, however, was short-lived, since most Catholics have the American habit of refusing to consider or even perceive uncomfortable facts.

format that followed financial stability. The extent to which he influenced editorial policy is variously estimated.

Rusher is the author of The Rise of the Right, an oddly naive book that I reviewed in Liberty Bell, July 1984, pp. 7-11. In some ways it resembles the recent book by Donald Regan, For the Record, which leaves the reader uncertain whether the author is an ingenious propagandist engaged in sanctifying Ronnie at the expense of Mrs. Reagan, Admiral Poindexter, et al., or a simple-minded man who worked in a brokerage house in Wall Street and never thought seriously about politics or the world outside the stock market.

Rusher was given a farewell party on the Zoo City's excursion boat, and some pictures of it were reproduced in the magazine's issue dated 27 January. Since the party was given by lowly Aryans, it was doubtless a modest affair, although some dinner jackets were in evidence. The lower races never presume to emulate their masters, God's Own, who hire ocean liners or the Metropolitan Museum for a night's shindig that may cost a million dollars or more.

Rusher's farewell speech is printed in full, as is the witty toast to which he replied. Noteworthy is the complacent pride with which he affirms that National Review "contributed substantially to the success of the conservative movement."

The "conservative movement," we are given to understand, succeeded when the old ham actor was installed in the White House to consummate the bankruptcy of the United States while taxing his serfs to give every holy family in the Holy Land $5000 every year, provide God's Own with the weapons they need to beat into submission to God's Law the wicked Palestinians, meddle with the domestic affairs of every country in the world that has not yet become a howling wilderness of black or Bolshevik savages, create a legal basis for Jewish terrorism in the United States, and import into this country hundreds of thousands of anthropoid pests, in preparation for Integration, when the occasionally troublesome White people will have been replaced by a fetid mass of half a billion coffee-colored mongrels with the minds of rats.

Old Ronnie, you see, was a model of Conservatism because he adored the worshipful Sheenies and mumbled nonsense about Bible Prophecy and the Christians' ferocious god. That isn't what "Conservatism" meant a few decades ago, but Mr. Rusher is probably right in saying that is what it means now.

When Jewish murderers, financed by Jewish bankers in the United States and Europe, seized control of the Russian Empire in 1917-1920, a large number of Americans became confusedly alarmed. They did not perceive that they had already begun the Communist Revolution in their own country in 1913, when they threw away their personal liberty and subjected themselves to the White Slave Act, then commonly known as an Income Tax, the first step in the procedure for imposing Communist rule outlined by Mordecai, alias Karl Marx. They were still allowed to have real money, but did not understand that they could do so only so long as the Federal Reserve did not tighten the other noose they had put about their own necks. In a fit of righteousness they had imposed on themselves the tyranny of Prohibition, thus providing a precedent for every kind of Communist slavery that could be advocated in words that would stimulate the glands of do-gooders. But the Americans were nevertheless alarmed when they saw Bolshevik agitators at work in their own country, stirring up the niggers and the dregs of the proletariat.

The anti-Communists styled themselves, quite appropriately then, Conservatives, since their purpose was to conserve what was left of the American Republic, which the righteous had wrecked in 1861, and to conserve at least what freedom they had left as American citizens.

Like Hercules in the famous apologue by Xenophon, the Conservatives were faced with a choice between two widely diverging paths. They could base their opposition to the Bolsheviks on sound scientific grounds, recognizing biological reality and following the lead of Madison Grant, Lothrop Stoddard, and other rational and learned men. Alternatively, they could be taken in by the Communists' propaganda device of professed atheism and by the battered but still unbroken veneer that had been put on Christianity to make it acceptable to our race, thus following R. M. Whitney and other superficial journalists, and catering to the holy men, who had thus far been careful to conceal from their customers the proletarian communism implicit in primitive Christianity, which had been revived in the Marxian Reformation of their bedizened religion.

The Conservatives chose their road in the 1920s and now they have reached the dead end. On their downward path they surrendered, a little at a time, title to every real thing they had hoped to retain. They are now trapped in the cul-de-sac of their choice. They have no future. They had best sit down quietly and read their fairy tales or smoke opium while waiting for the Jesus in whom many of them never actually believed anyway. They have become irrelevant to reality. The only thing they can do for us is to stop squawking.

RELIGIOUS DILEMMA

I note the almost simultaneous publication of three books dealing with the same series of crimes: Salamander, the Story of the Mormon Forgery Murders, by Linda Sillitoe and Allan Roberts; The Mormon Murders, a True Story of Greed, Forgery, Deceit, and Death, by Steven Naifeh and Gregory White Smith; and A Gathering of Saints, a True Story of Money, Murder, and Deceit, by Robert Lindsey. The three books must naturally differ in the authors' approach to the subject, and probably differ in the report or interpretation of some events, but I have not taken the time to look at them and so cannot tell you which is the best or the most entertaining.

Mark Hoffman attained distinction as a forger, a blackmailer, and a murderer. As a forger, he was a man of genius: one of the two foremost experts on handwriting and old documents freely confessed that Hoffman had deceived him and that he had pronounced the forgeries unquestionably genuine. As a blackmailer, he was talented and shrewd: he forged quite plausible documents that, in one way or another, gravely compromised the reputation of Joseph Smith, and then sold them for large sums to the hierarchy of the Mormon Church, which was ready to pay handsomely to keep the documents secret. It was not his fault that information about them leaked out. As a murderer, he was an amateur and inefficient. He chose to use bombs to eliminate persons who were getting in his way, but sometimes the bomb removed, not the obstacle, but the innocent person who opened the package. Moreover, the bombs he manufactured were technologically defective, with the result that one of them exploded in his automobile while he was on his way to deliver it. That was what started the scandal and eventually led to his incarceration in a penitentiary.

One has to spare a little sympathy for the hierarchy of the Church, whose well-meaning efforts to avert scandal have now put them in an exceedingly embarrassing position and made their ecclesiastical empire vulnerable to the bitter and invidious attacks of their competitors and other enemies. It is even possible that the scandal may gravely impair the future of the Mormon Church that has its capital in Salt Lake City, the only one large enough and strong enough in its cohesion to be an important social force. The disintegration of that church would gravely disturb the precarious equilibrium of forces in the United States today.

There are only two major Christian denominations that are American in the sense that they had their origin in this country: the Church of Christ, Scientist, founded by Mary Baker Eddy,[1] and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, founded by Joseph Smith. It is an odd coincidence that both prophets began their careers by pretending to possess occult powers through which they could discover buried treasure.

I have summarily traced the career of Joseph Smith elsewhere. After narrowly escaping the consequences of a petty swindle, unworthy of his talents, he perceived, as many had done before him, that almost infinite treasure could be dug from the pockets of gullible persons by pandering to their yen for stories of the supernatural and a magical "salvation" that would prolong their lives after they died. He learned to write in the style of the King James version of the Jew-Book, which he supplemented with some of the best gospels ever written.

He based the plot of his Book of Mormon on an idea that, as I have remarked before, originated in the time of Cromwell, when Jews from Holland were flocking into England and many of the Marranos who had battened on the English people since the time of the great King Edward threw off their disguises. A Sheeny, either deceived by some chance linguistic similarities or working a hoax in the manner habitual to his race, professed to have encountered in South America fellow tribesmen whose ancestors had migrated from Palestine centuries before. The story was at once connected with the old myth about "ten lost tribes of Israel."

Smith's immediate source seems to have been a rather small and obscure book[2] which gave him only an outline of the notion that Chosen People from Palestine had colonized the Western Hemisphere in ancient times. There is a plausible theory that he used a manuscript copy of a suppositious romance by Solomon Spaulding now lost, but there is no trustworthy evidence to lend the slightest support to that conjecture. In his gospels Smith naturally imitated (and usually improved) selected incidents in the tales in both "Testaments" of the fabulous book he was supplementing and validating. But the composition and execution of the whole series of gospels in the Book of Mormon was almost certainly the work of Joseph Smith alone.

That is proof of talent of a high order, all the more remarkable because he was an uneducated man of humble origins. And, given his circumstances, there could have been no way to improve on the scheme by which he shrewdly launched his imposture, pretending he had, with the aid of his magic stone, translated his gospels from a "reformed Egyptian" text on plates of solid gold that he had been divinely inspired to find buried in a cave—precious plates which an angel took to Heaven for safekeeping after he had finished his translation. He also evinced no little talent in organizing and managing the Church which he founded and in which he enlisted a very large number of True Believers before he was murdered at the instigation of holy men in the older Christian sects, who were alarmed by the competition and rapid growth of a cult more attractive than their own.

The magnitude of Joseph Smith's accomplishment should not be underestimated. The collection of gospels in the Book of Mormon is the work of one intellect and therefore shows the consistency and doctrinal uniformity that is so woefully lacking in the congeries of tales and forgeries in the Christian Bible, produced by a large number of mediocre writers with diverse purposes and frequently revised or interpolated by other shamans to suit their own notions. Although the gospel-style of fiction is crude and generally tedious, in my youth I read both the Christian Bible and of this book on letter-sized sheets was published by the Modern Microfilm Co. in Salt Lake City, s.a. [c.1977]. The research and publication work of Modern Microfilms has been reorganized as the Utah Lighthouse Ministry (P.O. Box 1884, Salt Lake City) to secure tax-exemption as a religious organization. Since the reproduction of Ethan Smith's book is not listed in their recent catalogues, it is probably out of print.

Smith's gospels, and I found the latter distinctly superior in several respects.[3]

I have not read the Book of Mormon critically, but I rely on Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Tanner, who are passionately devoted to destruction of the Church from which they separated themselves, and who have given proof of high critical acumen by suspecting the falsity of documents, including Hoffman's forgeries, that perfectly suited their purposes. They made a minutely critical collation of the text of the first printing of Smith's Book of Mormon (1830) with the official text now published by the Church, and they listed all discrepancies under the title 3,913 Changes in the Book of Mormon. The impressive title is misleading. The greater part of the 3,913 changes are merely orthographic. The first edition, imitating the King James version, used the generally conservative spellings found in it, which the later Mormon editors changed to the spellings by which Noah Webster created differences between British and American usage. Smith, being uneducated, dictated his "translation" to amanuenses almost as ignorant as he, who misspelled some words, while he used some archaisms incorrectly and made many errors in syntax and even accidence. All these the Mormon editors corrected in a minutely critical revision of their holy book.

The diligence of the Mormon editors, seeking to perfect their religion, and of the Tanners, seeking to discredit it, discovered only one mistake by Smith in all his gospels. In the "Book of Mosiah," 21.28, he mentioned as living a character he had killed off earlier. Comparable oversights have been made by some of the most highly reputed and talented English writers,[4] and when one considers the large number of characters Smith had to manipulate in his gospels and the complexity of the involved, though repetitive, plot, I submit that his achievement entitles him to respect.

3. Gospels written in the first person gain in plausibility and are, even in Smith's stilted style, somewhat more vivid. (It is a pity he was so ignorant, but it would not be fair to compare his best effort with what might have been written by H. P. Lovecraft or Clark Ashton Smith.) There are no wildly absurd tales, such as fill Genesis, and there is no nonsense about cursing fig trees because they do not bear fruit out of season or being wafted to mountain tops by Satan. Although the principal characters are Chosen People, there is no disgusting Jewishness. There are no internal contradictions, such as offend even the most casual reader of the Bible, if he is awake. There are some well-imagined episodes; e.g., the sixth chapter of the "Book of Ether" describes a great war of extermination in which millions are slain before the final battle, in which two large armies meet and fight, day after day (honorably observing a necessary truce at night), until only one man on each side remains alive. And whether by foresight or by chance, Smith's gospels left him free to adjust the doctrines of his church by having a revelation from God, whenever that seemed opportune.

Persons who have not studied religious phenomena are apt to be exercised by the fact that Joseph Smith was a swindler, but that is historically unimportant. The only two possible sources of divine revelation are hallucinations and knavery, and there is little to choose between them. There is no reason to suppose that Joseph Smith was morally inferior to any of the many persons who composed, revised, interpolated, selected and made canonical the tales in the "New Testament," and if there were, that would be irrelevant.

The important point is that he and his successor, Brigham Young, founded what was the most solidly established and cohesive Christian church in this country. That is the cardinal fact for which we must account here. Whether you regard Mormon doctrines with sympathy or aversion is irrelevant.

II

One need not review the tribulations of the votaries of the new and distinctively American Christian sect as they were driven from New York to Ohio to Missouri by mobs incited by the holiness-hucksters in each locality,[5] whose efforts were seconded by apostates, who left the Church as a result of internal dissension and tried to avenge themselves on the majority of their former spiritual brethren, and by the fanaticism of the converts, who may have been a little too ready to answer violence with greater violence. The sectaries were at last welcomed to Illinois by ambitious politicians, who then needed their votes and offered them a favorable charter that protected them from aggression. In 1839 they purchased from land speculators the site on which they built a city which Smith named Nauvoo, which, he said, meant 'pleasant place' in either Hebrew or "reformed Egyptian."

It was probably at this point that the influence of Brigham Young, a man of keen practical intellect, began to guide Smith,

4. For some examples, see Liberty Bell, March 1987, pp. 19 f.

5. In view of recent events, it is a nice irony that in Missouri one charge used to incite antagonism to the Mormons was a claim that they treated niggers and mulattos as equals, and a suspicion they might even harbor fugitive slaves. There may have been a basis for this accusation or it may have been invented by the rival holy men; there is no valid evidence.

because the Mormons soon made Nauvoo the largest and most prosperous city in Illinois. They were made vulnerable to rabble-rousers, however, by their system of matrimony.

They performed permanent marriages, i.e., marriages that would continue in Heaven, thus violating both the express statement of Jesus in the "New Testament"[6] and what the other Christian sects of that time agreed to pretend he had ordained. Publication of the "revelation" authorizing polygamy, i.e., a legal and stable polygyny, gave the envious dervishes of other sects an opportunity to yapp in a deafening chorus.

Salvation-mongers have to be real twisters, and, as St. Clement told his friend, have to be ready to lie convincingly. Since they had presumably read their "New Testament," they well knew that nowhere in it is polygamy forbidden, and that it is even sanctioned by implication for all except bishops and deacons,[7] but they perjured themselves about that as readily as they did, when, trying to excite the fratricidal war that gave them such satisfaction, they denied that slavery is expressly and repeatedly sanctioned by the writings which they claimed to be their divinely inspired and infallible authority.[8] They also tried to conceal the fact that polygamy was not illegal in the United States under the Constitution and might even be authorized by the guarantee of religious freedom, since, under the rigorous separation of church and state, the state could only determine what marriages it would recognize as legal in.

6. Cf. Liberty Bell, January 1989, p. 11.

7. In the corpus of letters composed under the name of Paul, Ep. ad Timoth., I, 3.2 & 12, it is provided that bishops and deacons in the Church must each have only one wife, and the rule implies that polygamy was not regarded as a sin in other men. (It must be remembered that while in Roman law monogamy was the only legal form of marriage, the Romans never interfered with the religious beliefs and practices of their subjects, and early Christianity spread most rapidly in Oriental provinces in which polygamy was common among those who could afford it.) Polygamy is, of course, expressly sanctioned in the "Old Testament" and even made religiously obligatory in some circumstances.

8. To be sure, there were honest clergymen who tried to remind the general public that "New Testament" sanctioned slavery, but their voices were drowned out by the clamor of the rabble-rousers, who played a large part in bringing to a catastrophic end the Republic that had been formed by the Constitution.

governing the devolution of property.[9] The agitators also forgot, or may not have known, that in the time of Cromwell, only a few votes in Parliament prevented polygamy from becoming the established form of marriage in Britain.[10] The howling dervishes stirred up the rabble; politicians fearing a loss of votes rescinded the charter they had given the Mormons and enacted measures which made it possible to arrest Joseph Smith and his brother and take them to a jail in which they were murdered by a mob incited by witch-doctors determined to suppress the too successful competition.

9. After the failure of the Edwardean Conspiracy, it was never determined whether a state could enact religious laws; certainly no state, so far as I know, ever tried to set up an established religion within its borders, to make illegal Roman Catholic or Protestant sects, or to prohibit a religious institution, such as monasticism. Separation of state and church, as provided in the Constitution, makes a distinction between legal and religious polygamy. When the last Lord Baltimore visited Venice with his harem, the Venetian authorities said they were not interested in the status of the several young women; they wanted only to know which (if any) was his legal wife so that they could keep their records straight. Western countries enforce a legal monogamy, so a man can have only one legal wife and questions of inheritance will thus be determined. The other women in a polygynous household will therefore have the legal status of concubines (including, of course, freedom to leave the household whenever they are discontented with it), but that will not prevent a religious polygamy in which the parties concerned and presumably their god regard the women as equally the wives of their husband. It may be doubted whether a strictly secular state has a right to interfere with such an arrangement. Of course, the holy men, whose one great "outreach" is for more power over their flocks and everyone else, always try to use the state to promote their variety of the spook-business, but a civilized society without a state religion must ignore the noise made by howling dervishes.

10. I do not here consider the social aspects of polygyny, which many women in polygamous Mormon households then regarded, and now regard, as the most desirable form of marriage. Some have recently appeared on television and reduced the hags of the "Liberation Movement" to a screaming frenzy at the thought that women could be liberated enough to exercise that kind of preference. A realistic argument against polygamy must be based on our race's evidently instinctive code of monogamy: the Olympian gods and the Aesir, for example, are monogamous, and so were the Vedic gods. Monogamy is almost necessarily implied by the conception of romantic love peculiar to our race, as is obvious when it becomes tragic: Siegfried and Brunhilda, Tristan and Isolde, Lancelot and Guenevere, et al. This contrasts with the love stories in Sanskrit literature after multi-racialism was tolerated in India, e.g.,

The Mormons, despairing of religious toleration under the Constitution, determined, under the leadership of Brigham Young, to leave the United States and found a new settlement in Mexico. Young, who had succeeded Smith, planned the migration efficiently so that it involved a minimum of hardship and suffering, although there was inevitably much of both as the Mormons made an heroic trek across pathless plains infested by hostile savages, and settled in what is now Utah, where, by their industry and the then astonishing innovation of irrigation, they converted a desert wasteland into a flourishing state, which they called Deseret. They undoubtedly planned eventually to make themselves independent of Mexico, and they emphasized their separation from the United States by devising a phonetic alphabet and printing and writing in it.[11]

The Mexican War catapulted Deseret back into the United States and opened it to unwelcome visitors and even settlers. The Mormons however flourished and prospered, until the 1880s, when the howling dervishes, exalted by the aroma from the blood-drenched battlefields of the fratricidal war they had maliciously done so much to provoke, sought other subjects for lucrative or malevolent agitation, and incited the tyrannical, outrageous, and flagrantly illegal religious persecution of the Mormons by the U.S. Army of Occupation.[12] the romances in the Brhatkatha (the prototype of the later and better-known Kathasaritsagara). It is a nice question whether even toleration of a legal polygamy would have been fatal to the cohesion of the American Republic, had rival holy men ceased from agitation, and had the Republic not been dissolved in 1861.

11. Books and periodicals printed in the Deseret alphabet now command a high price. The alphabet was philologically sound (for the pronunciation then current in the northern states) and the new letters well designed, but, like all efforts to "spell words as they are pronounced" in English, it was, of course, hopelessly impractical.

12. The legality of the persecution is shown by the fact that Mormon men who had polygynous households were arrested and barbarously imprisoned for "lascivious cohabitation," which is not a legal offense in any civilized society, but the shamans, ever grasping for more power to subjugate the whole of society and prevent individuals from sinning by enjoying themselves, were already yearning for the time when they could make sexual intercourse a crime, except when performed by license from a fakir and then only for the purpose of engendering infants for him to baptize and eventually make paying customers of his business. Holy men want to supervise every act of their dupes, and when not

We all know how lawless and ruthless Americans become when they are drunk with righteousness, and since the Mormons lacked the power to make themselves independent, religious faith had to yield to tyrannical force, and the President of the Church had a revelation from their god that canceled the institution of religious polygamy. This did not seriously impair the cohesion of the sect, because everyone understood what had happened. Under coercion, the Church even executed a volte-face and excommunicated members who thereafter practiced polygamy too openly.

After the Mormons in Utah were admitted to their Constitutional rights under the part of the Constitution that had not been revoked in 1865, they greatly expanded their membership and became the most solidly established, cohesive, and patriotic church in superstitious themselves, talk about sin to cover their malevolence and greed. — I do not here consider the question whether a legally recognized polygyny could be considered as contrary to a sound public policy; there are arguments for prohibiting it, but they would more stringently require prohibition of religions that condemn men and women to celibacy in convents, monasteries, and rectories, and also of religions that try to undermine the nation's established social order, whatever that may be, or disparage the nation's dominant race.

It is estimated that among the Mormons in Utah, between 20% and 30% of the men practiced polygamy, which obviously required a considerable prosperity. Brigham Young's establishment of twenty wives was unique. The usual number of women in a polygamous household was from three to five. A Mormon widow, who survived her husband and her three co-wives, was recently interviewed on the radio and, I believe, television; she considered polygyny the ideal form of marriage for women, and four to five the desirable number of women united by their love of their husband. It must be noted that such arrangements are entirely voluntary, and that the first wife or wives normally select the women whom they will admit to the connubium. The periodical reason, in its issue for January 1987, estimated that between 30,000 and 50,000 persons now practice Mormon polygamy (although it is officially condemned by the Church), but did not estimate the number of households, i.e., the average number of co-wives religiously married to one man. It featured what must be an exceptionally large household, with pictures of the husband surrounded by his nine wives, all evidently happy and ranging in age from about sixteen to twenty-eight or perhaps thirty. What makes the polygyny of Mormons unusual today is that it is based on their religion and publicly admitted, now that they have a chance of escaping persecution. Everyone knows that there are in the United States polygynous households of persons who belong to other Christian sects, to Oriental cults, or have no religion, but they are discreet and no one could estimate their number.

the nation. The Mormons do not have full political control of Utah or even of Salt Lake City, but acknowledgement of the quality of the society they have formed comes from even unexpected sources. Douglas Reed in his Far and Wide (1951) reported on his visit to Utah, which enforced on him the conclusion that > However Joseph Smith and Brigham Young may appear at the final balance, the fact emerges that Mormonism has achieved something exceptional in this place, since 1847. Possibly God bestows his blessings on those who seek, whatever their leaders, the merit being in the search; the Mormon faith is Christian. Many parts of the West speak of the malevolence of nature or the decay of human schemes; in this desert spot is peace, confidence, sober living and the feeling of civilization.

> Salt Lake City, though small, is more of a city than many bigger ones; it has urbanity, a gentler way of life, and the belief that God is more than gold. These things show themselves in the kindlier manner of people, the unhurried traffic, the drinking fountains at every corner and the rills of clear mountain water that constantly freshen the gutters, and in the appearance of streets and homes, and in temperate habits.

The John Birch Society was established to combat Communism, not only the Soviet conquest of the world that Americans made possible, but especially the imposition of Communism on the American people under such hypocritical pretexts as "New Deal," "Democracy," "Liberalism," "Social Gospel," and other frauds. It soon felt the need to enlist specifically Christian support and made an intensive effort to find it. There were a few venturesome clergymen in both Protestant and Catholic sects who did support the Society's opposition to both open and covert Bolshevism, at least until they were slapped down by their ecclesiastical superiors, but the only church that as a church took an anti-Communist position was the Mormon Church of Salt Lake City.

The cohesion of that church was such that observers felt that when matters reached a crisis, Americans determined to regain their heritage could count on support from virtually all of the Mormons of the major church throughout the country, and could only hope for support from small groups within the other Christian denominations.

III

Now we must ask what accounts for the success of the church founded by Joseph Smith. It was founded, of course, during the great wave of religious hysteria that swept over the country, especially in the northern and border states that lacked even the rudiments of a cultured aristocracy, as professional holy men discovered how easy it was to scare the ignorant into fits with oratory about all the terrible things their ferocious god would do to them, if they did not do what the shaman told them to do—but so were many other odd Christian sects that soon faded into insignificance. The Mormons, indeed, had little to say about Hellfire and Damnation when they promised a unique salvation from death. Since they accepted the Bible, to which they added the Book of Mormon and two later gospels as a kind of Third Testament, they did not differ radically in most matters from the doctrine common to most other Christian sects. There was, of course, a certain pleasing novelty about the imaginary history that explained the Indians of the Western Hemisphere, but that cannot have exercised a decisive attraction. Persecution probably strengthened their convictions, but only after they had accepted their new faith. The doctrine of polygamy, when it was finally revealed, probably repelled as many potential converts as it attracted, and the Church's great growth in numbers followed the recission of that article of faith.

The Mormon Church, furthermore, was far more vulnerable to criticism than others. Smith's story about the golden plates, while the best he could devise in the circumstances, must have suggested doubts to even very ignorant persons. Hopeful Mormons carried specimens of "reformed Egyptian" writing to Professor Charles Anthon, the most eminent scholar in the nation, and he pronounced them a hoax, but did not impair their faith. The envious dervishes of other sects encouraged the publication and dissemination of every kind of scandalous story, true or false, about Joseph Smith and his associates, and defectors from the cult gladly profited from recounting their exaggerated grievances with probably fictitious embellishments.[13]

The Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints was the most vulnerable of all Christian denominations. Its new gospels

13. The best compilation of the iniquities of Smith and his associates is Mormonism, Shadow or Reality, by Jerald & Sandra Tanner (Salt Lake City, Modern Microfilm, enlarged edition, s.a. [c. 1982]). The Tanners have produced shelves of special treatises on aspects of the Mormon doctrine and church, e.g., Joseph Smith & Money Digging.— Archaeology and the Book of Mormon. — The First Vision Examined. — The Mormon Kingdom. — Did Spaulding Write the Book of Mormon? — The Negro in Mormon Theology. — The Bible and Mormon Doctrine. I mention only the books and booklets I have seen; there are at least a dozen more. To sharpen their attack on the Mormon Church, from which they defected, and to claim tax-exemption as a Lighthouse Ministry, the Tanners often write from the standpoint of other Christian sects' currently fashionable and distinctive doctrines were recent and their implausibility was therefore more apparent than that of myths that had been generally accepted for more than a thousand years and seemed validated by the consensus of many generations. The conduct of Joseph Smith and his coadjutors was known to contemporaries, while the conduct of the scoundrels who invented and peddled Christianity to the goyim had been concealed by assiduous destruction or falsification of documents and by wholesale mendacity and forgery, and had been further obscured by the erosion of time, so that it can now be ascertained only partly and often conjecturally by historical criticism. But with all these handicaps that Church became what other Christian denominations vainly wish they could become.

After prolonged consideration I have come to the conclusion that the Mormons' success depended primarily on a racial homogeneity that was more fortuitous than intended. Joseph Smith and his early associates were ignorant and rustic, but they were all Anglo-Saxons. Perhaps inevitably, as the cult expanded, it attracted persons to whom the ethnic characteristics of the first members were congenial: the converts were principally of English ancestry, with some Germans, Scots, and Scandinavians, all ethnically compatible. When the religion was established in Utah, the many converts who came from Canada and Europe and trecked long distances from the railhead to Salt Lake were predominantly English. There is in the Mormon Museum an excellent bronze sculpture depicting a pair of converts making the arduous trek: the wife walks beside her husband, who pulls a light cart containing their few possessions.

Since Mormon doctrine was based on the Bible, it retained the prevailing view, stated in some passages of the "New Testament" (and contradicted by others), that racial differences are canceled by a swig of Jesus-juice. In practice, however, the theory was modified by common sense. The obvious biological inferiority of niggers was recognized and generally explained as the Curse of Cain, and the superiority of the White race to all others was taken for granted. In keeping with religious theory, the Mormons always offered to other races a kind of second-class salvation and, astonishingly, made converts among them, but all positions of authority, even in small congregations, were reserved for White men.[14] And the Mormons anticipated the findings of genetic science in holding that a marriage between a White man or woman and a person who had "even one drop" of nigger blood was a crime as well as an inexpiable sin.

Thus, although the Church made converts of all colors, it remained essentially a church of men and women who were not only White, but of northern European descent. And that, I believe, accounted for its extraordinary solidity, which was superior to any doctrine and unmoved by the most hostile and cogent criticism of the Church's doctrine.

A visitor to Salt Lake City, even on a first occasion, when his host was a vehement enemy of the Church, had to agree with the verdict of Douglas Reed. However little respect the visitor may have had for superstitions about the supernatural, he was perhaps most impressed by the civilized Christianity of the Mormons, the serene confidence of their faith. Their religion forbids them to drink alcohol or smoke tobacco, but they urbanely tolerate friends who want cocktails and cigarettes, and they seem never impelled to the kind of do-gooding that consists in preventing infidels from indulging in pleasurable sins.

By 1960, a few disguised Sheenies had crawled into the Church and were evidently accepted without reservation, but if a visitor perchance encountered one of them in a group of Mormons, he was struck by the physical contrast. The Mormons were Nordic, and it is significant that among them one saw an astonishingly high percentage of women who were beautiful by nature, not by the art of expert cosmeticians.[15]

The present difficulties of the Church had their origin when the Presidency became vacant and it was necessary to select a dogmas, of which minds so keenly critical as theirs must see the fallacies and absurdity.

14. The intelligent attitude toward race may not have been clearly defined at the very first. The Tanners, in their assiduous search for scandal in Mormonism, discovered that in 1836, when the Mormons were hoping for toleration in Ohio, the priesthood was conferred on Joseph Smith's Negro servant, Able, who was probably a mulatto, and whose descendants embarrassingly remained in the church and, according to some scandal-mongers, were even given minor positions in it. In the Mormon Church, priesthood amounts only to first-class membership. Elders hold a higher rank.

15. For the biological significance of this fact, see Richard McCulloch, Destiny of Angels (s.l., 1986; distributed by Howard Allen Enterprises, Cape Canaveral, Florida), a book of which I hope to give an account in a future "Postscript."

successor. The obvious choice was Ezra Taft Benson, the only man of national prominence in the Church, who had been Secretary of Agriculture and was distinguished for his forthright opposition to all forms of Communism, but, as so often happened in Papal Conclaves, a coalition of self-seeking opponents procured the selection of an old man too weak to have rivals.

In 1978, the Jews' mouthpiece in the White House, a peanut-vendor named Carter, summoned the old man to Washington and bullied him by threatening to revoke the Church's tax-exemption if it didn't start cuddling niggers and working toward the new American ideal of Integration, when White Americans will have been replaced by coffee-colored scum.

From what I know of Ezra Taft Benson, his reply to the threat would have been the appropriate one, "Try it, you son-of-a bitch." The threat was obviously a bluff, for an attempt to deny tax-exemption to a church for any reason would have set all the holy men in the United States to screaming in chorus. Even the most unprincipled shaman would realize that once a precedence for denying tax-exemption to a religious body had been set, it would not be long before tax-exemption was granted only to what would be an Established Church, and that would result in massive unemployment among holy men, including, quite possibly, himself. He might envy the Mormons, "the fastest growing mainstream church in the U.S." at that time, but his sense of self-preservation would have been stronger than business rivalry.

But the weak old man didn't perceive how empty was the threat. As soon as his knees stopped knocking together, he retired to a room and conveniently got a revelation from his god that the Church must promote niggers to positions of authority. He thus inflicted on his Church a wound from which it may never recover.

The conveniently-timed "revelation" was too obviously a fraud, perpetrated (unnecessarily) for business reasons, and the "living prophet" was exposed as a salvation-huckster with his eye on the fast buck. Denials that the "revelation" had been dictated by (imaginary) expediency were patent lies that merely deepened the disgrace of the Church's official head. What had taken place was a drastic reversal of what Douglas Reed had observed: gold (or rather a worthless substitute for it) had become more than God in Salt Lake City.

Even if the "revelation" had not been so patently a shabby hoax, the change would have been disastrous. A religion, by definition, purports to be a revelation of divine and therefore eternal truth, and a god differs generically from a Cadillac, of which General Motors can bring out a new and supposedly improved model every year. When a church claims that its omniscient god made a foolish mistake in the past and has now learned better, or tries to replace that god with a new model, incorporating the latest improvements, it has merely discredited itself in the eyes of its own votaries, if they take their religion seriously and are capable of even rudimentary thought.

The silly old man aroused grave doubts in the minds of Mormons who had been impervious to all hostile criticism. There were convulsions within the Church, some of which became publicly known. A fairly well-known Mormon writer, Ogden Kraut, noted the absurdity of a "revelation" produced by a talk with Jimmy Carter, and stated the basis of all viable religion: "Fundamentalists believe that if a doctrine starts out one way, that's the way it stays; you don't just change in midstream." He appears to have been excommunicated for his common sense.

It is a simple sociological truth that all churches must be "fundamentalist" or confess themselves to being money-grubbing rackets. And no one can measure the silent resentment of Mormons who have not lost their racial sense of self-preservation, now that they see the Church in which they believed rescinding one of its central doctrines and approving miscegenation, biologically as well as religiously a crime. They cannot but have felt contempt for the dignitaries of their church who changed their minds over night, ate their own words, and told their followers to "get in line" with the spineless old man who was, by definition, a "living prophet" and might have tomorrow another divine revelation of what was good for business.

The Church was in a sufficiently parlous plight,[16] and its officials were trying hard to repair the damage it had sustained, when Hoffman began to blackmail them with his forgeries. I do not predict what the future will bring in Salt Lake City.

16. More trouble is caused by Mormon scholars who have the strange notion that the ascertainment and publication of historical truth will not be fatal to the religion. For a specimen of this folly, see the essay, On Being a Mormon Historian, by D. Michael Quinn, Associate Professor in Brigham Young University. It was gleefully reprinted by the Tanners in 1982.

WESTERN CHRISTIANITY

When our Germanic ancestors invaded and occupied the decadent Roman Empire, it was deeply infected with Christianity, a Jewish cult that had been foisted onto the mongrelized inhabitants of the great empire that had been created by Aryans. Thus our ancestors contracted the alien religion while they inherited, as best they could, the ruins of the civilization that had been created by their race.

Christianity has always been deleterious to our race, and if the Roman Empire had to succumb to an imported religion, one could wish in retrospect that the victor in the competition for political power had been the Mithraic cult, which was at least manly and which the Christians so closely emulated in many matters, though not in its virtues.

If the civilized world had to succumb to Christianity, one could wish that the sect that attained political power had been the Marcionist, which had partly emancipated itself from the rancours and myths of the Jewish proletariat and was, at least, sufficiently rational to see that the figure of the supposedly incarnate and universal god, Jesus, was incompatible with a ferocious tribal deity, the Big Jew of the "Old Testament." But that, too, is idle speculation about what (conceivably) might have been.

When the wily Fathers of the Church got their hot little hands on political power and began to stamp out the competition, they had to make some drastic revisions of the primitive cult to make it compatible with a society they now wished to preserve and enjoy.

When the Germanic invaders were infected by the religion, even more drastic changes were necessary to make the official cult accceptable to warriors. The changes were easily made, since all that the majority knew of the religion was what its dervishes chose to tell them. The pallid, pacifistic, ineffectual Jesus was, for example, represented as having been in some way an heroic figure, worthy of Vikings. Thus was formed what we call Western Christianity.

It retained for centuries the poisonous superstition that destroyed much of our race's best genetic heritage by diverting women into convents, where celibacy had often to be maintained by abortions or infanticide, and males into monasteries, where morbid and mentally perturbing sexual abstinence was the alternative to homosexuality or furtive promiscuity without living offspring. But the religion did not prevent the eventual establishment of stable states, did inspire some monumental achievements, such as the great cathedrals, and did provide a bond of union for foreign conquest, as in the Crusades. One must regret that when the genetically baneful function of the religion was eliminated by the Lutheran and Anglican Reformations, the bond of European unity was simultaneously shattered and the religion destroyed itself in the disastrous Wars of Religion it brought upon the civilized world.

Although we may regret its passing, Western Christianity was always an artificial composite of incompatible and indeed antithetical elements and so it always exhibited a duality of internal contradictions, which made a Christian nation, considered as a whole, seem schizophrenic.

Even within the clergy there was an ill-concealed conflict between two incompatible and indeed irreconcilable mental attitudes. The antithesis is succinctly and neatly illustrated by the first two selections in Professor Leo M. Kaiser's anthology, Early American Latin Verse (Chicago, Bolchazy-Carducci , c. 1984). The two are, I suppose, the earliest specimens of respectable Latin verse written in North America that the editor's diligent researches discovered, and both are by English clergymen who visited the colonies in the early Seventeenth Century.

The Reverend Mr. William Morrell visited Massachusetts in 1623-25 and wrote some three hundred passably smooth, if uninspired, hexameters, describing the land and the Indians he had seen, whose superstitions he remodeled in his own mind to interpret them in terms of Christian ditheism. He ends by enjoining on Christians their sacred duty to help the benighted Indians. He had the missionary's itch to crowd Jesus's Heaven with black, brown, red, yellow, and drab souls and to commit treason to our race by imparting to alien and necessarily rival races the arts and techniques on which depends the precarious superiority by which alone we can survive in a hostile world.

The second clergyman was the Reverend Mr. Philip Vincent, who, after the death of his beloved wife, traveled extensively in Europe and visited Connecticut in 1637, the year in which the Pequot Indians killed an English trader. The inhabitants of the little colony, under Major Mason and Captain Underhill, attacked the stockade in which the tribe thought itself secure, killed a good part of the Indians and then pursued the fugitives, overtaking and killing them. Some captives were taken and sold to slave-traders for export to the West Indies. A few Pequot escaped, and their enemies, Mohawks, took care of most of them. The tribe became extinct.

The Reverend Mr. Vincent succinctly celebrated the colonists' victory in well-turned elegiac couplets. There isn't the slightest hint of a mawkish wish to do good to the aborigines. The destruction of the Pequot tribe, he said, produced peace in the only possible way. It was an admirable example of effective action and it permitted conversion of the wilderness to the agrarian fertility of civilization:

Plaudite qui colitis Mavortia sacra nepotes, et serat incultos tutus arator agros.

And Vincent exultantly foresees the time when all of the New World will have become a new and more spacious England. Vincent was a clergyman, but he was also a realist, worthy of his race. He understood that whatever may be true in theological doctrine, we live in a world subject to natural laws, and that the first law of nations is that the strong and resolute survive, while the weak and fanciful go under. He was a clergyman, but his was the Christianity that had been adapted to Aryan civilization.

If Christianity today were Vincent's manly religion, free of sickly illusions and masochistic delusions, our race would not be committing suicide. And we would not have to overlook a very few honorable exceptions and bluntly denounce the religion in all its diverse cults as a spiritual syphilis that has now reached the tertiary stage, paresis and insanity.

CONFESSION OF GUILT

I have occasionally cited in these pages the Chalcedon Report, the journal of the hard-line Calvinist sect which its head, Dr. Rousas J. Rushdoony, calls Christian Reconstruction, although observers think it should be called the Puritan Revival. It is intellectually and morally far above the level of the babbling crowds that are lumped together as the "Moral Majority" or the "Christian Right." A good summary of the movement and its purposes by Anson Shupe appeared in the Wall Street Journal, 17 April 1989.

The issue for February 1989 contains an article by the journal's most distinguished writer, Otto Scott, an American historian to whom we must all be grateful for the meticulous and courageous research that is set forth in his admirable book, The Secret Six, which traces the bloody spoor of America's most admired homicidal maniac, John Brown.

Mr. Scott begins his article by quoting the "darling of the intellectual left," Susan Sontag: "The white race is the cancer of humanity." He notes that his god punished the woman by afflicting her with cancer. But he makes the astonishing blunder of supposing that the Sontag woman thought of herself as a Caucasian. She is a Kikess and would no more think of calling herself Caucasian than she would of calling herself a bitch or a sow. She belongs to Yahweh's Master Race, the race that now openly boasts in its own publications, "WE are the purpose of Creation."

Mr. Scott comments on the nasty punks who called themselves "Liberal intellectuals" and are forever yapping about our race's "injustice" toward niggers, mongrels, and other waste products of biological evolution. And he correctly observes that our race is precisely the only race that worries about the welfare of other races and even makes enormous sacrifices to help them.

He attributes our race's morbid concern for other (and necessarily enemy) races, not to innate imbecility, but precisely and specifically to its belief in Christianity. That is what I have so frequently argued, and I am pleased to have my view confirmed by so eminent an historian.

Mr. Scott's conclusion is one that I shall here quote in italics:

"Without Christians, there would be no chance for long-range survival of minorities in our midst."

Remember, please, that that is not an accusation that I have made: it is a confession made by an eminent Christian authority on behalf of one of the very few Christian sects that write honestly and mean what they say.

Nothing that I have written about Christianity is half so categorical and drastic as that damning confession of guilt—guilt for our ever multiplying misfortunes, guilt for our lunatic folly, guilt for our impending doom.

THE JAPANESE AGAIN

The Bulletin of the Committee to Restore the Constitution for May 1989 reprints an article from the newsletter of Hilaire du Berrier, which has the subtitle, "America in [the] Grip of New Japanese Co-Prosperity Sphere." M. du Berrier, who was in 1941 (and may still be) an agent of the French Intelligence Service, was captured by the Japanese but did not break under ingenious torture. He naturally remarks on the ruthlessness of the Japanese during the war—all of which proves only that the Japanese are not Aryans and were not what Aryans were in the Nineteenth Century.[1] His real point is that the Japanese, whom we prevented from imposing their "Co-Prosperity Sphere" on part of Asia militarily, have now imposed it on the United States economically.

He observes that, contrary to the predictions of American "experts," the death of the Emperor Hirohito did not cause Japanese economic activity and expansion to falter for even a moment. He does not comment on the current scandals in Japan, following the disclosure that members of the government had behaved like Judaized Americans. An observer who recently returned from Japan thinks that the scandals will strengthen the Japanese parties that intend to restore, so far as possible, the conditions that prevailed before the defeat of Japan in 1945. Much will depend on the ceremony that will take place in coming months after the new Emperor, Akihito, has united with his ancestress, Amaterasu, and thus become divine.[2]

M. du Berrier's article served to introduce an item of news you will not have read in your local bundle of daily propaganda. In Montana, a state senator named Al Bishop has introduced a bill that prohibits aliens from owning land in Montana for more than one year.[3] Mr. Bishop is alarmed by the speed with which the Japanese are buying up the United States. He noted that they already own about 30% of downtown Los Angeles, and that in the

1. What is interesting in this part of the article is M. du Berrier's implication that if Admiral Togo, whom the Americans murdered after the surrender of Japan, had not begrudged the expense, Japan might have had an atomic bomb in time to forestall the Americans and win the war. Hitler had refused to consider the possibility of using such a weapon against members of our race, but the Japanese, naturally, would have had no compunction about using it on White Devils.

2. Amaterasu, who, needless to say, was born of a Virgin, is the goddess of the sun. Her great-grandson, Jimmu, became the first Emperor of Japan in 660 B.C., which is the date at which the Japanese calendar begins. For the details, see the Kojiki, the official collection of myths, comparable to the Christian Bible; there is a learned English translation by Professor B. H. Chamberlain. While Akihito was growing up, he, at the demand of the Americans, was exposed to large doses of Christian hokum, but it is likely that he was immune to the infection. (Cf. "The Yellow Peril," pp. 18-25.) His first official statement, on the death of his father, was in terms of orthodox Shinto.

3. There was a similar provision in Illinois until 1970, when the nitwits replaced their state constitution with one designed to facilitate kicking them into their place in "One World." For years before 1970, an attorney

District of Corruption, Japanese own the three major hotels and dozens of office buildings, including, ironically, even the building that the Federal government rents to house the Justice Department.

The Japanese are naturally eager to invest in property the profits they made after the Americans destroyed their own industry to have lots of "Social Justice" and crime. They hold a vast quantity of the trading stamps the Americans use in place of money, and must convert it into things of value before the Federal Reserve reduces the value of its stamps to zero. In Montana, the Japanese are buying land on so large a scale that Mr. Bishop foresees the time when they will own all the productive land in the state.

Mr. Bishop also foresees that within a few decades the Oriental owners of the United States will herd the surviving Americans into reservations on waste lands, much as the Americans, before they succumbed to cerebral paresis, put the Indians on reservations. I wonder, however, whether the Japanese, who will never forget their defeat in 1945, will want to preserve White Devils, even as curiosities.

Mr. Bishop must be an highly intelligent man, for he perceives that the real problem is not the piecemeal sale of the United States to foreigners, but the suicidal destruction of the productive capacity that American industry once had, which makes selling off the country the last resort before the total collapse that is ahead of us. He also foresees that his attempt at legislative protest will fail and his bill will probably "die in committee."

Even the introduction of Mr. Bishop's legislative proposal set off a storm of protests from Americans eager to get rid of what is left of the country that once was theirs. There were cries that such a nasty proposal would deny them the right to sell to the highest bidder, would violate what the Jews call "basic human rights," would be counter to Ronnie Reagan's noble devotion to "liberal trade policies" and "free enterprise" [sic], and, oh horrors! might even encourage "racism" and the bigots who still believe that Aryan cattle are worth preservation.

whom I knew tried very hard to persuade various State's Attorneys to do their duty and enforce the law, but all of them, their eyes on the two gangs that entertained the boobs with political games every two years, refused. The attorney thought of applying to the courts for a writ of mandamus, but then realized that the courts were too corrupt to be interested in upholding the laws.

One can see the point of the objections. The Americans obviously have no use for the country they threw away, and do not want it back.

They aren't even interested in trying to guess whether the crafty Jews will be able to destroy the Japanese, as they have destroyed us.[4]

The Bulletin concludes with a fairly long excerpt from my Christianity and the Survival of the West. I permit myself to quote a few lines from that excerpt:

"Six years ago [in 1966] in my Conspiracy or Degeneracy? I asked the one crucial question: Have we, the men of the West, lost the will to live?

"Nothing, certainly, has happened since then to suggest a negative answer.... Nowhere can one discern the slightest indication that in the great majority of our people the racial instinct of self-preservation has not been lost."

I wrote that in 1972. Today, seventeen years later, although one still hears a few feeble voices of protest that have not yet been silenced by governmental terrorism, the question that I asked in 1966 appears to have been definitively answered.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING

Everyone has noticed the prolonged uproar over Satanic Verses, a book by a wog named Rushdie, who, in the published photographs, looks like a Kike.

The trouble started in a British provincial town, where a thousand or more Moslems rioted. Most of them, no doubt, knew enough English to read street signs, and many probably could make their way through a paragraph in a newspaper, but how many were likely to read almost six hundred pages of constipated prose by an "anti-Fascist intellectual"? How did they happen to hear about the book? Any enterprising publisher would have seen an opportunity to set off a firecracker that would make a "best seller" out of a schizophrenic tome that would titillate "Liberal" reviewers but was sure not to become popular and which he might otherwise soon have to "remainder."

4. Itsvan Bakony, in his little booklet, Jewish Fifth Column in Japan, which I cited and discussed in "The Yellow Peril," believed that Japan has a good chance to survive, since it was, when he wrote, "less infiltrated by Judaism than any of the other world powers." The Japanese have recently become aware of the nature and designs of old Yahweh's Chosen; cf. Liberty Bell, November 1987, pp. 7-9.

However that may be, the affair was scandalous, although no one seems to have noticed why it was. What were the thousand or more Moslems doing on an island that theoretically belongs to the British, who, presumably, are either Christians or rational? Why did not the police round up the rioters and escort them to the nearest port, where the English, if they wished to show their wonted generosity, could provide them with free passage to their homelands? Of course, one has only to look at Prime Ministress Maggie and her Kikish Cabinet to know the answer to that question, but that does not make the fact less scandalous.

Then in Iran the ruling Hajji Baba, in a real or simulated rage, offered a million for a quick assassination, evidently being so ignorant as to think that the book contained something remarkably derogatory to the Prophet whom he claims to represent on earth (although the majority of Moslems regard him as a vile heretic). If that book was enough to set him off, his enemies have an obvious opportunity. Just send him a dozen or so of the scores of sound historical studies of the origin of Islam now in print. He will explode apoplectically and the world might even be entertained by a real example of the spontaneous combustion described in Dickens' novel.

The warlock's conniption fit gave every pseudo-literary hack an opportunity to declaim about the horrors of censorship by goyim and the imprescriptible right of every writer to say what he pleases, so long as God's Race does not object.[1]

I was sufficiently curious to find a copy of the book whose author old Khomeini unintentionally endowed with at least the better part of a million dollars, and I glanced at a few pages. Yes,

1. Big-brained "intellectuals," busily engaged in defacing and sapping Western civilization, know that, if they are members of the lower races, they must fawn on the Master Race and frantically wag their tails. It is simply apodeictic to them that no Aryan can be permitted freedom of speech to defend his own race or question Yiddish hokum, so, naturally, the loud-mouthed gabblers who made themselves conspicuous with bombastic (and supererogatory) defense of Rushdie never even thought of protesting the vicious censorship that Jews now excise over almost all publishing. The contrast is so glaring that even in the pages of The Nation, a periodical whose readers must often wonder to what nation the title refers, Alexander Cockburn was permitted, in the issue for 20 March 1989, to point out how the Jews use incendiary bombs or corrupt courts to persecute Aryans who dare question their absurd Holohoax; how they used financial finagling to suppress even a book by Noam Chomsky; and how the pavid editors of The Nation insisted on censoring from one of his articles a mildly approving reference to Professor Israel Shahak of Hebrew University, whose veracity offends the rulers of his just a few pages, for I remind you of William Dean Howells' aphorism that it is not necessary to eat all of an apple to learn that it is rotten.

Even if there had been no screaming, The Satanic Verses would probably have set "literary circles" in New Jerusalem-on-the-Hudson atwitter for a whole week, as each "intellectual" tried to show that he had read the latest masterpiece (or a review of it by a wise guy) and hastened to get in a word about it before it ceased to be the latest thing and no fellow littérateur would remember it. It will delight people who mistake incoherence for sense and think profound anything that is incongruously grotesque. It will fascinate the kind of nitwits who are enraptured by a piece of canvas that has been dirtied by Picasso, Chagall, or some comparable exploiter of feather-weight poseurs.

This is not to deny that the author may have been sincere in some part of his painfully long and disjointed book. I may have chanced upon the most significant passage, somewhere near the end, but it raises a problem.

The author may have read Carl Sandburg, a passable folk singer who passed for a poet long ago, when vers libre was the dernier cri, and did put a few good phrases and similes in his scrappy prose. If my recollection has not been dimmed by many years, Sandburg, enlarging on an earlier author, once wrote that he had a whole zoo inside himself. Since I know nothing about his ancestry, I cannot comment; he may have done no more than find a startling hyperbole for what is commonplace.

Every sane Aryan who had passed the age of six knows that he has conflicting desires and will have always to choose between alternatives that are equally attractive. He will have to decide whether or not he will trade his prized jack-knife for the neighbor boy's skates, and comparable dilemmas will confront him in all of his ten thousand days under the sun. He will have to decide whether to marry some lovely girl and perhaps burden himself with children or retain his social and economic freedom as a bachelor. He will have to decide whether to buy a new suit or a new overcoat; whether to spend a small inheritance or a bonus for race. But all that suppression of intellectual integrity, to say nothing of freedom, never evoked a squeak from the intellectual lions who roared so loudly for Rushdie's freedom of speech, when they pretended it had been endangered by a vain threat that probably will net him a million in royalties.

a fine automobile or travel in Europe. Every virile man wants to seduce every very attractive woman he encounters (although few confess that as freely as did Thomas Wolfe), but, assuming that he can easily do so, he may have to choose between that strong desire and the conflicting desire to observe obligations inherent in his personal situation or in the code of gentlemen.

Hercules, in Xenophon's well-known apologue, had to choose between two divergent paths; every man is confronted by less drastic but equally perplexing choices between antithetical desires almost every day—perhaps until at an advanced age he makes the final choice between liberating himself from intolerable burdens or unbearable pain by suicide and continuing to live in the hope of fulfilling some obligation of honor he has assumed.

Sane men know this aspect of the human condition and take it for granted. Only in schizophrenia can a man's mind and personality become so disintegrated as to make it seem that he is more than one individual —that he is not a man but a zoo.[2]

The author of The Satanic Verses, with or without imitating Sandburg, wrote (I correct spelling and punctuation):

> Oh, the dissociations of which the human mind is capable!... Oh, the conflicting selves jostling within these bags of skin! No wonder we are unable to remain focused on anything for very long; no wonder we invent...channel-hopping devices. If we turned those instruments on ourselves [!], we'd discover more channels [within us] than a cable or satellite mogul ever dreamed of.

Assuming that Rushdie means what he says and finds "conflicting selves" (something quite different from conflicting desires) within himself, the most likely explanation is obvious. He is some kind of hybrid, a living example of multi-racialism,[3] and, like many such unfortunate persons, he may be scatter-brained and suffer from mental strabismus and the conflict of the incompatible in-

2. Schizophrenia is especially common among "mental health experts" and psychiatrists. I remember one who, hoping for support in taking over a "right-wing" operation, wrote me hundred-page letters, in which he explained at length how his Id was always fighting with his Ego and how hard it was for the third piece of himself to keep peace in the rough-house inside his skull. This psychotic condition is probably the result of incompatible genetic strains, although it may be exacerbated by morbid introspection or the use of hallucinatory narcotics.

3. Islam, more than Christianity, promoted mongrelization and there is little pure Arabic blood left in the world, most of it in Saudi Arabia. The danger to the race seems to have been perceived only by 'Umar (634-644), the second and greatest of the Orthodox Caliphs, who, when he saw the long line of captives taken by his army at Jalúlá (on the edge of stincts of the different races that contributed to the unnatural and unstable mixture that his conscienceless parents made of him. But you may be sure that the twittering intelligentsia of "literary circles" will think the passage profound instead of pathetic, and will claim it refers to some constant of human nature to avoid recognizing in it the consequences of the crime of miscegenation, which they strive so hard to promote.

the Persian highlands), most of them not even Semites, is reported to have exclaimed, "O Allah! I take refuge with thee from the children of these captives of Jalúlá." Islam cannot be entirely blamed for the disastrous miscegenation that followed; there seems to be no reason to doubt the tradition that 'Antara ibn Shaddád, one of the pre-Islamic poets of the Mu'allaqát and also renowned as a warrior, was a mulatto and slave of his father until his arm was needed to resist a foray on his tribe. That need not be inconsistent with the aristocratic contempt for slaves and the low-born expressed in his poetry. As a pagan hero, untrammeled by the religion of later times, he was remembered for having risen from slavery to sheikdom, and the little that is known of his life was elaborated into a very long romance, the Síratu 'Antar, which cultivated Arabs prefer to the Arabian Nights. The Arabic text, which I have not seen, is said to occupy thirty-two volumes. There is a charming condensation of the basic story by Gustave Rouger, Le roman d'Antar, Paris, Piazza, 1923.

DOES THE WEST HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 – except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. THE GREEK CONNECTION

Nicholas Carter

"No man is an island," some idiot once wrote (I'm sure the reader knows which idiot)—a simplistic proposition that I categorically deny. Each human being is an island, cognitively alone, not linked to any other living entity, with some individuals being more isolated than others. Regardless of those evangelistic social scientists who preach that human beings are little more than sophisticated primates who in time can be trained to accept a form of socio-political collectivism that will prevent them from achieving any more or less than their fellow citizens, the conscious choice—however shallow or other-directed—of each individual to activate the reasoning process results in a character and personality that makes that person distinct from all others—with each human being possessing a philosophy, or integrated view, of life.

Admittedly, many of the philosophical viewpoints that "people this little world" have something in common with the proverbial Texas river in that they are considerably wider than they are deep. Nonetheless, thinking—the mental activity we use to direct concepts acquired by the process of learning toward some goal and/or object—is the name of the game of life, not only for geniuses, but for all individuals who are not mentally ill or deficient. We cannot live without reasoning; nor can we fake our nature or the nature of reality. Consequently, it is not always easy to find kindred spirits within the diverse and culturally chaotic human zoo; and the more eclectic and purposive the thinker, the more difficult the quest.

What are the ties that bind, to some degree at least, the human animal to his fellows? Family, community, religion, race, work, and the myriad number of cults, clubs, and associations that range in diversity from the first church of Satan to the lyceums of gurus like Baba Ram Dass (formerly Dick Alpert, aide to Timothy Leary) to the Men's Crisis Center of Columbia in Northern California—an organization established to "restore masculine pride by encouraging traditional activities like playing poker, smoking cigars, drinking beer and watching football on TV." It can be safely assumed, I daresay, that purposive thinking has never reached a high point among the respected values of the rhythm & blues, country & western, soul, funk, rock and rap social spheres of the majority of the American species.

Regardless of the emphasis on education in the modern world, there is no emphasis on the fact that we are cognitively independent of each other. That would conflict with Marxist and Christian doctrines. Nor is there sufficient emphasis on the value of thinking for the purpose of helping the individual to expand his ability to deal with the world around him, and to increase his efficacy as a person capable of establishing emotionally mature relationships. What of the arena of higher education? Are there any spectacular activities occurring "in the quick forge and working house of thought" on today's campuses? Not bloody likely—considering the hordes of hidebound collectivists and minority racists (the preachers of egalitarianism in the U.S. who never seem to be concerned with its practice in Russia or Israel) who labor in the vineyards of akademeia.

Perhaps, like the character of Socrates in Aristophanes The Clouds, I'm an island adrift in a cloudland of fantasy; but I often find myself envying those noble thinkers, the ancient Greeks, and the intellectual milieu in which they found themselves. They were unique in all the world because they sought philosophical wisdom in speculative cosmology outside of the realm of mysticism—i.e., sacred traditions, infallible sources of authority, and unquestionable dogmas.

At least 600 years before construction began on that dungeon of superstitions known as Christianity, Greek physicists in Asia Minor started the world on an orderly, naturalistic interpretation of the origin and nature of the cosmos—including the constitution and construction of the primordial substance or substances of all things, and the harmony and balance of physical forces; and in just a few centuries they achieved more in the fields of mathematics, astronomy, physics and medicine than had been achieved in all previous history.

What a thermonuclear explosion of mental activity! As the world's first towering colony of objective eyes, they were responsible for the world's first intellectual orgy. What glorious times they must have had plumbing the depths of logic, ethics, politics, epistomology, metaphysics, theology, and aesthetics. What ecstasy formulating principles, unraveling causes, identifying elements of each aspect of reality. What wonderful fun, not only thinking, but also being able to interact with kindred spirits, their intellectual peers.

Who were they?

Thales, Aristotle, Anaximander, Anazemines, Parmenides, Heraclitus, Empedocles, Anaxagoras, Democritus, Diogenes, Euclid, Xenophenes, Protagoras, Epicurus, Socrates ("the enchanter of Greeks"), and countless others.

From the noun philosophia, meaning "the love of wisdom", comes the word philosopher to describe a person who loves or desires wisdom. It is said that Pythagoras coined the word because he didn't want to be known simply as a "sophist" or wise man. Admittedly, the Greeks weren't crazy about practical knowledge for its own sake—how to build a better mousetrap, as it were. Commanding most of their attention instead was theoretical knowledge: to understand for the sake of understanding; to know for the sake of knowing. And so, for several incredible centuries—without priests, bibles, sacraments, sacrifices and savior gods capable of tripping the light fantastic on water—they proceeded to turn the world of religious myths and fantastic legends upside down.

While the Israelites were studiously preparing to "civilize" the world by preaching that the rainbow was Yahweh's promise to the Pious not to drown them. . .that the supernatural world was peopled with an endless supply of demons. . .that the children of the wicked should be forced to eat bread made of human-dung. . .that a dead carcass found by the road might be sold to Gentiles, but never to Jews. . .that the Jews got nine of the ten measures of wisdom the Ancient of Days gave the entire world. . .and that Israel would stand upon his enemies, making a footstool of all men—the Greeks were teaching that the rainbow was caused by light from the sun shining on wet atmosphere. . .that education was the basis of virtue and that only ignorance was evil. . .that all life evolved from lower forms of life. . .that the cosmos was an ordered system wherein worlds are born, grow, decay and perish. . .that the brain rather than the heart was the seat of intelligence. . .and on and on in geometry, physics, physiology, acoustics, geography, pneumatics, etc., as they opened up the world of thought in numerous and startling ways destined to transform the modes of thinking and living for much of the human race.

But then, like a thunderclap of doom, the emergence of and the adoption of Christianity by the White race traumatized the Western world and virtually halted (in many cases, as with the great library at Alexandria, even destroyed) the brilliant advances of Western man. In one fell, fanatical swoop, stagnation was substituted for progress, theology for science, rigidity for flexibility, and intolerance for humanization.

Christianity began as a messianic movement of disenchanted Jews who believed the time had come to choose a Messiah who would lead them back to Yahweh. This distinctive cult was then taken over by Saul of Tarsus (Paul) and other Jews influenced by Greek learning and taste who believed that the faith could be transferred from its original home in the Semitic culture of Palestinian Judaism to the Gentile culture of the Roman Empire. That meant assimilating an orthodox Jewish rabbi to the savior gods—Mithra, Krishna, Osiris, etc.—of Asia, thereby transforming him into a virgin-born, murdered and resurrected, Son of God. It took several hundred years to fabricate, mold and forge this new religion into an eventually realized state-sanctioned faith.

It was Neoplatonism, however, that enabled Christianity to not only blend more thoroughly and quickly with the Gentile world, but to also assist the Graeco-Romans in doing to the Paulist cult what Paul and his confreres had done to the original messianists: appropriate the faith and dominate it.

To the mystical philosopher Plato, the "apparent" world of sense was more important than the "real" world of ideas. The material world, he declared, was only an imperfect appearance of true reality, a semi-real reflection or projection of it. Any investigation of nature was to be disdained and avoided. As for human beings, they were not ultimately real. Thus, no man by himself was metaphysically autonomous; all men ultimately comprised one unity. "We must be free of the body," preached Plato, "and use the eye of the soul alone to behold the actual realities."

This blind faith in supernatural absolutes was the element of Academic philosophy that by way of Neoplatonism was transmitted to the early Christian Church via non-Jews from Origen to Augustine. Contempt for the world of matter, belief in the liberation of the soul through asceticism and mystic revelation, the subordination of reason to faith, and a blueprint for turning human beings into beehive drones, made this philosophy congenial to the mystics who were building the new religion.

It was during that chaotic period of time that our Gentile ancestors traded the maturity of the Rational Age of Greece for the emotional illiteracy of the Hebrew holy books on the one hand, and the anti-mind, anti-body obsessions of Plato, on the other. . .when our people gave up the achievements of thinkers and scientists, of artists, philosophers, poets and statesmen, for the revelations of fanatical Jewish prophets and Plato's gospel of worldly renunciation. . .that fateful interlude in history when the West rejected the greatest champion of the human mind who had ever lived—"the father of logic"—Aristotle.

Concomitant with the creation of the Jewish/Gentile savior god called the Christ, the new Christ-folk claimed the Jewish Scriptures as their own for the purpose of providing a historical foundation and a prophetic warrant for the existence of their Messiah. The next step was to produce a New Testament blending OT writings with NT gospel accounts to be used as the final and definitive sacred record of the birth, death and resurrection of the new savior god—with Jesus Christ being the tie binding the two testaments together.

To this essentially Jewish base were then added innumerable tenets and beliefs held by the Gentile peoples of the Hellenistic Orient. Among them: The Christian Eucharist was copied from the sacred Mithraic meal known as the "Last Supper;" from the Stoics came the "brotherhood of all men" and "equality" doctrines; the hope of "Salvation of humanity" could have been inspired by Egyptians, Babylonians or Persians; the Hindus provided the story of the prodigal son and the Talents; the idea of the logos was Platonic; the doctrine of the incarnation came from India; the concept of a new birth originated with the Chinese and the Eleusinians; the sacramental value was Pythagorean; the belief in the Trinity was common to East and West at the time, as were the rites of baptism, and the use of the cross, in its many variations, as a representation of an intensely masculine or male phallic symbol; and out of the teachings of the Stoics came the most pernicious doctrine of all: original sin. Combined with the Jewish notions that Adam and Eve betrayed God. . .that because of the sowing of the grain of evil sin in Adam, all people were guilty. . .and that moral scars could be inherited from one's forbears—original sin soon became the very first principle in the Christian faith. "If the diplomacy of Christian life is to be workable," proclaimed the theologians, "it must rest on the assumption of universal guilt."

And thus it was that Christianity became a melange of the more primitive and superstitious doctrines prevalent in the Semitic and Gentile religions of the time. For reasons that should be obvious, several centuries following the enthronement of the Christian system by Rome, and including the rapid spread of the faith to Europe to the tune of the words "Baptism or death!", came to be known as the most repressive ages in the history of mankind: the Middle Ages. Logically, the theologians who achieved fame during that "perpetual spiritualistic nightmare," devoutly interpreted Plato's definition of philosophy as a search for wisdom about the transcendent world. In the tradition of Attila the Hun who declared that wherever he walked, grass would never grow again, they were convinced that wherever they walked,

"pernicious individualism" would never rise again. And they weren't alone. The philosophical thinkers outside of the Catholic Church were enamored of Plato almost to the point of believing that the combined philosophical speculations of the rest of the Western world were merely extended footnotes to his literary works. Ringing like death knells throughout the thinking of many influential Western philosophers are salutations to altruism, collectivism and statism, beginning with, "Rights must be eliminated, for such a notion rests on individualism," and ending with, "The state is divine."

It should be obvious to any objective Western thinker that the traitors among our people have been the power-hungry theologians, philosophers and politicians who sold their souls to collectivism and statism; who commandeered the messianic system that came to be known as Christianity from the Jews; and who then developed and perpetuated it for the purpose of "saving"—or even enslaving—the world. Fortunately, they failed. But the West has paid a terrible price for hundreds of years of Christian/Judaic/Platonist totalitarianism.

And so, with the destructive spread of Christianity among the most innovative and productive ethnic group in the world, the Gentile West chose the pathological past—a world pervaded with spirits, ghosts, demons, devils, myths. . .a world of shrines and altars and wailing walls. . .a world of witch doctors representing the primitive savior god of Galilee and the vindictive Yahweh of the Jews. . .a world of believers fleeing before the specters and illusions of their own creation—over a world of intellectual curiosity, scientific discovery, flexibility, tolerance and decency.

Eventually, the rebirth of Greek rationalism in Europe and the beginning of the Industrial Revolution motivated Western man to create, build, invent and produce in an explosion of innovation that led to all of the great technological developments of the 20th century: miracle drugs and fabrics; remarkable food production and distribution; miraculous means of communications, travel, and entertainment; and from the cue-tip to the computer, and endless array of products and concepts that make the world a better place for more people.

We must never forget, however, that Greek thought paved the way for all rational thought to follow. We are standing on their shoulders.

SATURATING THE AIR OF OKLAHOMA WITH THE EXTERMINATION THESIS

Charles E. Weber

On the evening of 1 May 1989, the Oklahoma Educational Television Authority, which is partly supported by the taxpayers of Oklahoma, broadcast three programs purporting to portray the plight of the Jews in Europe during the Second World War. The first film dealt with the Wannsee Conference, which is supposed to have been held in the Berlin suburb of Wannsee on 20 January 1942 (8:00 to 9:30). The second film was entitled "The Triumph of Memory," which consisted of alleged recollections of inmates of German concentration camps (9:30 to 10:00). The third film dealt with the march of some 1,500 young Jews from Auschwitz to Birkenau on 14 April 1988 and was entitled "March of the Living" (10:00 to 11:00).

The second film included the claim that there were selections for lethal gas chambers in Mauthausen, a lie which has been disproved long ago; even Simon Wiesenthal has had to admit that Jews were not killed in lethal gas chambers within the Reich itself. The third film asserts that 2,000,000 Jews were exterminated at Auschwitz. It also speaks of "pits were bodies were burned" at Treblinka, an absurdity, because if bodies were to have been burned they would have been burned above ground in order to provide a better supply of oxygen and thus save scarce fuel. The assertion that 2,000,000 Jews were exterminated at Auschwitz was made even after this lie has been disproved by the Leuchter Report, which recently provided analyses of the cyanide contents of fragments of building materials taken from buildings in Auschwitz where mass gassings of Jews are claimed to have taken place (see Bulletin 35 page 3).

The second and third films hardly need detain us further here. The most important of the three films was undoubtedly the first one, which purports to portray the Wannsee Conference of 20 January 1942, which is claimed to have planned the murder of 6,000,000 Jews. Without having seen this film, we commented on it briefly in Bulletin 20 (December 1987), page 4, on the basis of reviews of it we had seen. Now the Oklahoma Educational Television Authority finally provided us the awaited opportunity to view the film, which was made by Infafilm in Munich. The OETA showing included English subtitles. The film is presumably based on the minutes of the Wannsee Conference, the text of which is reproduced on pages 39-53 of Wilhelm Stäglich's Der Auschwitz Mythos. This text was presented as evidence at one of the postwar Nuremberg trials. The film portrays Reinhold Heydrich directing the Conference. (Heydrich was murdered in Prague only a few months later than the Conference, in June 1942, while he was Deputy Reich Protector of Bohemia and Moravia.)

The Wannsee Conference film is, in part, a phantasy based more or less on the minutes of the Wannsee Conference and even quotes verbatim this questionable document here and there, most notably the passage on page 7 of the minutes which envisages the use of interned Jews in building roads (in areas where, as Stäglich quite appropriately points out, there were already roads). The statistical compilation of Jewish populations on page 6 of the minutes is also quoted, including the claim that there were 165,000 Jews in the occupied part of France and 700,000 Jews in the unoccupied part, although it has been estimated that only about 150,000 Jews were living in France around 1930. The statistics in the minutes of the Wannsee Conference are highly questionable and in themselves are a strong indication that the alleged minutes are possibly spurious. The purported minutes of the Wannsee Conference contain on page 8 the very important phrase ". . . bei Freilassung . . ." This phrase refers to the eventual release of the Jews but there is no reference to it in the film. On the other hand, there are quite a few matters in the film which are not contained in the minutes. Heydrich, for example, points out that since the entry of the United States into the war, the Jews no longer had any value as hostages. Heydrich is portrayed as using his position to attract the pretty female secretary taking notes at the meeting to work for him in Bohemia. There is also mention of the use of trucks for executing Jews by gas in Serbia, also something completely lacking in the minutes, as is any plan for the physical extermination of Jews. Voluntary sterilization of half-Jews in exchange for their being allowed to remain in Germany is mentioned on page 11 of the minutes as well as in the film, but there seems to be no evidence that such a plan was ever put into effect, if, indeed, it ever existed. Much of the 90 or so minutes of the film is devoted to the discussion of the status of persons with partial Jewish ancestry, as is the case in the minutes of the Conference (pages 10-14). Some of the high-ranking officials present at the Conference are portrayed as being uncomfortable with the plans presented by Heydrich, who had been ordered to deal with the Jewish question by means of "emigration and evacuation" in a letter from Göring dated 31 July 1941, the text of which can be found in Stäglich's book, page 32.

This film is a propaganda phantasy, probably made primarily for the on-going reëducation of the German people, but it is particularly dangerous and effective because it purports to be based on documentation, but documentation which in itself is highly questionable. Of the tens or even hundreds of thousands of viewers of the film in the United States, could more than a dozen have actually have read the text of the document on which it was primarily based? It is doubtful that even just the journalists who wrote laudatory reviews of the film ever took the trouble to read the purported minutes of the Conference. (For further details, see Bulletin 20 and the detailed discussion of the minutes of the Conference on pages 54-65 of Stäglich's Der Auschwitz Mythos.)

THE CONCLUDING PARTS OF WAR AND REMEMBRANCE

We published a seven-page discussion of the American Broadcasting Corporation series, War and Remembrance, in Bulletin 32, which was republished in the Liberty Bell of January 1989. Several aspects of this series seemed important to us and in need of analysis and reply: The huge cost of the series (estimated at $110,000,000.), its shrewd distortions of history, its portrayal of the Second World War as if it revolved essentially around Jews, its relative indifference to the suffering of the untold millions of Aryans who had been caught up in the war, its simplistic portrayals of the Allied side as absolute good and the anti-Comintern side as absolute evil and, above all, an intensely hostile portrayal of the German leadership as well as Germans in general without any regard to the deeper origins of the war.

War and Remembrance is the continuation of an 18-hour series shown in February 1983, the Winds of War, likewise based on a novel by Herman Wouk. The production of The Winds of War is reputed to have cost around $40,000,000. A review of it was published in the May 1983 issue of the Liberty Bell. The Winds of War portrayed the Second World War up to the time of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. The earlier parts of War and Remembrance, also with a total length of 18 hours, were broadcast during 13 to 23 November 1988, but these showings did not complete the series, perhaps as a result of production or scheduling difficulties. The concluding parts were finally shown on the evenings of 7, 8, 9, 10, and 14 May, with a further total of 11 1/2 hours, thus making a grand total of 47 1/2 hours for the two series. We shall be concerned here with the contents of these concluding parts. Let us first summarize the action of the parts shown in May 1989:

7 May

Aaron Jastrow, the aging Jewish scholar, and his niece Natalie are now in the concentration camp at Theresienstadt. Jastrow is mercilessly beaten up because he refuses to be a member of the Council of Elders, after which he tears up a document recording his earlier conversion to Christianity. Plans for "Overlord," the Allied invasion of France, are made at Teheran. Slote, the American diplomat who as strongly concerned about the plight of Jews, but whose concern was frustrated by his superiors at the State Department, resigns from the State Department in order to join the Office of Strategic Services. On 17 February 1944 a new commandant of Theresienstadt is concerned with the beautification of the camp for a coming Red Cross inspection, but many of those interned there are being deported to the east. As of 11 May there are 35,000 Jews in Theresienstadt. Jastrow gives the commandant diamonds and promises his coöperation in exchange for the cancelation of the scheduled transport of his niece to the east.

8 May

Although the German people are still fanatically supportive of Hitler, General Halder and other officers decide to kill Hitler. The officer to carry out the assassination of Hitler, von Stauffenberg, is shown in Hitler's headquarters on 24 May 1944. After a doubtful weather situation, the invasion of France finally takes place on 6 June 1944, but Hitler considers the initial landings to be a feint. Slote is dropped in France to work with the French resistance but is soon killed thereafter. Natalie, who has been accused of some sort of subversive activities against German authorities, is cruelly tortured.

The Red Cross inspection of the Theresienstadt camp takes place on 22 June. The Americans are now bogged down in Normandy and the Russians are not moving. By 18 July the Gestapo is on the trail of the men conspiring against Hitler. The attempt against Hitler's life takes place on 20 July 1944 at Hitler's headquarters. Stauffenberg, who has left a time bomb near Hitler in a briefcase, has stepped out of the headquarters building and leaves after the bomb explodes. He has a difficult time in getting past several checkpoints on his way out of the headquarters area but finally manages to get through and travels to Berlin. The aftermath of the failed attempt on Hitler's life results in a bloodbath of some 5,000 people, including "the last remnants of the old aristocracy." On 26 July 1944 Roosevelt, Admiral Nimitz and General MacArthur confer. MacArthur wants to liberate the Philippines. General Rommel, who has been accused of involvement against Hitler, commits suicide. On 25 August Paris is captured by the Allies and on 3 September Brussels is taken. By October, 12,000 internees are left in Theresienstadt and 20,000 have been transported away. Now Jastrow and his niece are also transported to Auschwitz.

The train transporting Jews passes through Görlitz and Liegnitz. A Christian Pole brings a large sack of apples to the thirsty Jews on the train. After the arrival of the train in Auschwitz a selection of Jews for the gas chambers takes place at night, accompanied by much brutality. After Jastrow recites the Twenty-Third Psalm he is gassed to death along with many other naked Jews. The bodies of the victims are cremated and their ashes dumped into a river to float eventually into the Baltic Sea. Admiral Henry's son, in command of a submarine, carries out a successful attack on a Japanese tanker.

Rhoda Henry, having divorced the admiral, is shown moving into an apartment. Pamela Tudsberry is with her and they learn of Roosevelt's death, reported on a radio. Rhoda is sad about Roosevelt's death and remarks that "Truman is a nobody." By 22 April 1945 the Russians have penetrated Berlin. On 25 April the western Allies meet the Russians at Torgau. Concentration camps at Dachau, Sachsenhausen, Flossenburg, Bergen-Belsen, Mauthausen, Ravensbrück and Nordhausen are overrun by Allied forces. Hitler declares to General von Roon, "I did not make a single mistake." and appoints Admiral Dönitz as his successor. By 30 April von Roon reports to Hitler that the area around the bunker can no longer be defended and Hitler commits suicide along with Eva Braun after he has married her. Admiral Henry and Pamela Tudsberry are married in Washington. The admiral is summoned to the White House, where President Truman requests that he be his naval aide. Truman complains about the Russians' not keeping their agreements. Rhoda learns that Natalie has survived the war. The atom bomb is exploded at Los Alamos on 16 July 1945. Byron Henry goes to Natalie in Paris, where she is recovering at a sanatorium from an impaired memory. Natalie condescendingly says of Slote, who sacrificed so much for Jews, that his heart was in the right place, for a Gentile. After a protracted search Byron Henry finds his little son in England. During the course of the search he was told that toward the end of the war the Germans simply threw children into ovens without gassing them first. The son was found amongst bodies of the dead in Prague. The series concludes with the son's running into his mother's arms.

There is little in the way of general comment that we have to add to our extensive discussion of the first 18 hours of War and Remembrance which were shown in November 1988, but a number of specific comments might be made on some of the action in the concluding 11 1/2 hours shown in May.

The producers of the series boast that it is the "most monumental achievement in motion picture history." In some senses that boast is no doubt correct. It was the most expensive production, but its financial losses might also have been "monumental." It would be interesting to know what sort of popularity rating it had, especially in the case of the concluding 11 1/2 hours shown in May. (Alas, we have learned from the April issue of VHO-Nieuwsbrief [Postbus 483, 2000 Antwerpen 1, Belgium] that War and Remembrance has been broadcast in Belgium.) The series is also a "monument" to Jewish hatred of and contempt for host populations. Note the arrogant, condescending remark of the Jewess Natalie on the death of Slote, who had sacrificed so much for the Jews, finally his very life. Although earlier parts of the series showed the hatred Poles had for the Jews, this was discontinued in later parts and the Christian Pole with the big sack of apples seems to have been introduced to atone for earlier digs against the Poles. Hitler, of course, is portrayed as an almost constantly ranting maniac, although such intellectual giants as the Scandinavians Knut Hamsun and Sven Hedin had the highest praise for Hitler after his death. There is only the slightest hint of the postwar behavior of the USSR that has cost the world so much during the decades following the war. One of the most prominent advertisers associated with the series was Ford. Old Henry Ford, who supported the publication of The International Jew during 1920-1922, a work which had a strong influence on Hitler, must have been turning in his grave. One aspect of the earlier parts of War and Remembrance, the indifference of Allied authorities to allegations of ongoing mass murder of Jews, was toned down for some reason or another in the concluding parts. The figure of 5,000 persons executed in the wake of the attempt of Hitler's life seems quite doubtful. In Verschwörung und Verrat um Hitler, which we reviewed in Bulletin 11 (republished in the June 1987 issue of the Liberty Bell), General Remer lists 161 conspirators who were executed, shot or who committed suicide. The statement (9 May) that the "last remnants of the old aristocracy" were destroyed in the aftermath of the attempt on Hitler's life is absurd, of course, but it is typical of the historical distortions and inaccuracies in the series. The claims of mass murder of Jews in gas chambers at Auschwitz are beginning to look ever more absurd in view of the important evidence presented in the Leuchter Report.

The Winds of War and War and Remembrance deserve to be forgotten and disdained. Let us hope that financial losses from them were painful enough to prevent them and similar productions from ever polluting the airwaves again. May Heaven forbid that they ever be used to "educate" American school children! □

Anthony Modernicus

I come not to praise Hitler, merely to compare:—

Compare him with those honorable men of state who were his contemporaries.

These men, Churchill, Stalin, Roosevelt, all of them, so it is said, were honorable men, and Hitler was anything but honorable.

It is certainly true that Hitler was no Churchill; Hitler never programmed and initiated the means to incinerate entire cities. He never—even once—rejected peace proposals. Still, the world claims that Churchill was an honorable man.

After the fall of Poland, Stalin saw the need to murder 15,000 Polish officers for future security reasons. Hitler saw no such need, nor did he ever even contemplate such a monstrous deed. But, Stalin having done so, and the other "statesmen" knowing about it and trying to keep Stalin cloaked as an honorable ally endeavored to blame Hitler when this atrocious crime became public knowledge. And thus Stalin was duly called 'Uncle Joe," and this by the honorable Truman, President of the United States, who later was to incinerate Hiroshima and Nagasaki. So was honor and integrity compromised in the case of Stalin.

THE STRUGGLE FOR ULSTER

by David McCalden
Founder: Institute for Historical Review
Director: Truth Missions International

Many Revisionists are confused abut the true nature of the ongoing strife in Northern Ireland. In particular, German patriots often display a sympathy for the Irish Catholic viewpoint, because of (southern) Ireland's neutrality during World War Two, and the message of condolence on the death of Hitler, submitted to the German embassy in Dublin by Prime Minister DeValera. Sometimes it is pointed out that the Ulster-Loyalist people have a six-pointed star on their official flag, and that their influential Orange Order is basically a version of Free Masonry. However, we should not allow mere symbols, and their alleged or real significance, to distract us from the true nature of the struggle.

Historically, it is a myth to talk about the "re-uniting" of Ireland. The island of Ireland never had one government until it was conquered by the Normans and annexed to Britain, during the 12th century. Up until that time, Ireland was "governed" by various, competing chieftains, who each had their own "turf."

The Norman conquerors of Britain and Ireland gradually melded in to both populaces. Because Ireland was very poor and remote, there were repeated rebellions and uprisings against British rule. During the 17th century, the British government decided to import the more industrious Scots, to colonise the north-eastern province of Ulster. The "Plantation" of Ulster as it was called, was very similar to the "Drang nach Osten" whereby German pioneers colonised the fertile areas of the lower Danube, and the Volga. Nowadays, we look critically at colonisation programs—such as the Jewish colonisation of the West Bank—but 400 years ago, successful re-population projects were highly regarded. After all, that is how the USA, Canada, Australia and New Zealand were established! (The Scots have been the majority in Ulster four times longer than Americans have been the majority in California!) However, the Scots in Ulster were treated as second-class citizens by the English rulers (the Catholic Irish were treated as third-class citizens) and soon there were a series of Scottish uprisings in Ulster. Although the Ulster-Scots tried their best to recruit Irish Catholics to the rebellion, the ignorant Irish peasants usually turned each uprising into a bloody massacre of all non-Irish. Eventually, many Ulster-Scots gave up on Ulster, and emigrated to America, where this time they were successful in throwing off the chains of English domination. The U.S. system of government is substantially predicated on Scottish Presbyterianism (although in very recent years the U.S. government has of course been corrupted by Zionist influence).

Because of emancipation and increased educational opportunities, eventually by the Victorian era Catholics evolved their own intellectual class, and began to make more reasonable demands for self-government. However, there was—and is—always a conflict between the enlightened Irish idealists and intellectuals who sought true freedom, and the reactionary elements of the Catholic Irish establishment, who merely sought to replace British tyranny with Vatican tyranny. The imminence of Vatican-rule caused great anxiety among the Protestant Ulster-Scots. Consequently, before and during World War One there occurred several incidents of illegal gun-running from Imperial Germany, which mischievously armed both the Catholic-Irish insurrectionists, who sought independence from Britain, and also the Ulster-Scots Loyalists, who armed themselves to stay British, and not be absorbed into the proposed Vatican-ruled "independent" Ireland. It must be stated that the German gun-running to both the Ulster Loyalists and to the Irish nationalists was sheer pragmatism for all parties. Both the Ulster-Scots and the Irish-Catholics desperately needed weapons. The Kaiser merely took up an opportunity to cause mischief at Britain's "back door" while genocidal trench-warfare was raging at the front.

After the end of World War One, Britain was caught in a dilemma. Southern (Catholic) Ireland desired independence. But Ulster province in the north-east sought to stay British. As with India, the British solution was partition. The 26 southern counties were allowed to secede from the United Kingdom, while the 6 north-eastern counties remained British as "Northern Ireland." (The Irish secession was mostly peaceful; only a few hundred lives were lost on both the Irish-rebel and British-government sides; far more were killed in the subsequent southern-Irish civil war between rival factions. Compare this record to the 1861 secession of 11 southern states of the USA: 360,000 were killed in the brutal suppression of the secession!)

Unfortunately, just like in India/Pakistan, the border was extremely arbitrarily drawn, and left large minorities marooned on the "wrong" side of the border. However, in Ireland this did not result in any large-scale population transfers. Instead, the minority problem has been a serious issue for Northern Ireland ever since the southern secession of 1921. There have been sporadic outbreaks of minority-Catholic rioting and uprising, culminating in the current "20-year war." Despite an open border, very few Catholics have relocated themselves from "oppression" in Northern Ireland to "liberty" in the southern Irish republic. Initially, in 1968, the minority-Catholics (35% of the Northern Ireland population) agitated on a platform of alleged "civil rights" grievances, and reforms were rapidly initiated. However, it quickly became clear that no amount of reform would satisfy their major grievance, which was sovereignty. The Irish Republicans feel that the Ulster Loyalists (about 1,000,000 people) have no right to determine their own destiny as a distinct people, and that they should—willingly or unwillingly—be absorbed, governed and dominated, by a Catholic-Irish Republican government.

As with the 1914-1916 period, both sides in this on-going territorial dispute solicit funding and weaponry from whoever will supply them. The (Catholic) Irish Republican Army (IRA) uses mostly East-bloc weaponry of Soviet or Czech manufacture, supplied by Libya, but financed from donations collected among the strong Irish community in America. The Ulster-Loyalists recently sought weapons from South Africa; but it turned out that these arms were also of Soviet origin, sold to the PLO, captured by Israel, and then given to South Africa! Again, it is illogical to make political conclusions from such pragmatism.

IRA propagandists like to portray the struggle in Northern Ireland as a rebellion of the "oppressed Irish" against the "oppressive British government." Absent from this formula is the majority population of Northern Ireland: the Ulster-Scots Loyalists. Time and again, they have voted overwhelmingly against being absorbed into an all-Catholic Irish republic where their civil rights would be abridged; they prefer to remain British where civil rights are better protected (although not perfect). Most of all, the Ulster-Scots—like the Palestinians—desire to determine their own destiny and to preserve their own heritage and culture, which is quite distinct from the Irish-Catholic culture. Ulster observers point out that since the secession of 1921, the Protestant population of southern Ireland has deteriorated from 10% to less than 2%—mostly due to inter-marriage and emigration.

The Scots are very stubborn people; hardworking, honest, industrious, and straightforward. Many Revisionists are of Scottish or Ulster-Scots descent: Robert Faurisson (France), John Bennett (Australia), David McCalden, and James J. Martin (USA). More than once, Ernst Zündel in Canada has paid eloquent tribute to the disproportionate Scottish element among his supporters, especially his courageous lawyer Doug Christie.

But while the Scots are busy creating inventions, building roads, healing the sick, etc. ("manual" professions) the Irish Catholics are excelling in "verbal" professions, and they tend to become reporters, politicians, musicians, poets, lawyers, etc.—all areas where they can impress their historical mythology onto an unsuspecting populace. Thus, the Irish-Catholic position appears (to the unenlightened) to be more "romantic," and the Ulster Loyalists seem to be dour, Puritanical and tyrannical.

The truth is that the Ulster people want nothing more than to be left alone to get on with their lives in peace and tranquility. The IRA and its supporters seek to force them—at the point of a bayonet—into giving up their self-determination. The IRA does this through violence, intimidation and murder, usually against civilians. The British government long ago could have quashed this Mafia-style terrorism; instead they have let it drag on for 20 years. Most recently, they indicated a penultimate act before final surrender to the IRA: the inclusion of the Irish government at Dublin in discussions of Ulster's internal and sovereign affairs. The Westminster regime deliberately ignores the self-determination rights of the Ulster people. So the people of Ulster need the support of our comrades around the world, in the on-going struggle against IRA terrorism on the one hand, and Westminster betrayal on the other. □

And Hitler was no comparison to the "honorable" man who took over the helm of the United States the same year that he started to lead the people of his Germany. Roosevelt was never able to solve his country's problems without a war, as Hitler did, but still, Roosevelt was considered to be an honorable and efficient man. Even when he planned for war while running for re-election on a platform of peace, and while relentlessly baiting Hitler, he was considered to be as honorable as a man can be.

How can one compare a man like Adolf Hitler, who, constantly proposing peace plans, to Churchill, Stalin, and Roosevelt who, instead of even considering such Hitler's peace plans, were aiming at nothing but war?

No such camparison is possible.

Hitler stands out. He is the only one who longed for peace. And as he so often stated, he wanted to protect his people from the destruction that he knew modern warfare could cause. His contemporaries did just the opposite. They, through their criminal actions, showed no such concern.

There is the picture of a raving Churchill cursing the peaceful skies over London because Hitler was not retaliating in kind. There is the picture of Roosevelt with the knowledge of an impending attack and doom for thousands at Pearl Harbor and never informing the soon to be dead. And then there is Stalin with the erasing of churches and monasteries, and millions of peasant farmers on his conscience. Where, in all of history, was honor so sullied and misrepresented? There was only one of these men who was indeed honorable, truly honorable. That man we celebrate on his 100th birthday, 20 April 1989: the Leader-Führer of National Socialist Germany—Adolf Hitler.

Please renew my subscription and also please send the books I've listed. I don't think I could live through the withdrawal symptoms! Several weeks ago (February 1989) my family was watching the "Daytona 500" when my eight-year-old son came up to me and said, "Dad, you'd better come look at this!" The #27 car driven by Rusty Wallace, the "Kodiak Special," had a Red (K) Kosher symbol on the driver's side rear spoiler.

If race cars are kosher, and therefore edible, could one of your Jewish readers please tell us how to prepare one for next Thanksgiving? Unfortunately, the kosher blessing didn't help the "Kodiak Special" win. The race was won by the "Tide Special". Tide laundry soap is also kosher and could explain why Jews are always foaming at the mouth!

I am writing to you in response to your renewal notice. I have found your magazine to be one of the most informative and well-written to which I have ever subscribed, however, I can not at this time renew my subscription.

Although the bulk of your articles are right on target, I cannot suffer through the frequent verbal abuse hurled at my Father Yahweh [Our italics]. I realize that your writers must wake up the sleeping goyim immersed in JUDEO-Christianity, but the Kingdom-Identity truth can answer every criticism put forward by your writers that I've ever read, yet never is our movement mentioned as an alternative for these lost sheep. If you would only, as the editor, insert some type of disclaimer after an article in which Mr. Oliver or one of your other authors bashes the modern Judaism called "Christianity," referring the reader to investigate the Identity viewpoint in the spirit of honest intellectual debate, I would renew in a minute. The problem for me is that it seems like your publication and those who write for it avoid dealing with the subject. I wish you well.

Sincerely, K.Y., Pennsylvania

Agree with your Aryan Warrior views but not so easy when one is a half-breed (German-Irish).

Am undecided about Hitler since reading Hitler and the 20th Century Hoax by Kenneth Goff. This makes a lot of sense. Especially in view of the fact that Hitler had Jewish blood himself [Are we ever so glad to finally hear the truth!!! —Editor]. Can't help but wonder when more Christians than Jews ever thought of died in WWII. Jewish Communism has surged forward and Christianity declined. Hitler certainly dealt white Christians a lethal blow. Jack Mohr, a Christian patriot, also agrees with this [Brig. Gen. Jack Mohr, as a former member in good standing and a former member of its Speakers Bureau, also agreed with a lot of other silly things the John Birch Society peddled, and still peddles, to its suckers! —Editor]. The fact that Christ died, not Jews, makes me wonder!

The Jews of the Bible, except maybe Judas Iscariot, were of the tribe of Judah, not the false Jews of today and of whom we are warned in Revelation 2:9 & 3:9 and II John 7. I believe God Almighty created all and he uses the wicked to punish us, His people, when necessary. The lost tribes of Israel are the Anglo-Saxon, Scandinavian and Celtic tribes; Judah is Germany ["Heaven" forbid! Just the facts, please, ma'm! —Editor]. We have all been brought to this great land to make it a great Christian nation [Oh, I see!! —Editor]. It is New Jerusalem—"Jer(USA)alem". [On this point I agree with you, madame, that is as far as Zoo City is concerned: it should be properly named Jerusalem-on-the-Hudson! —Editor]. The false Jews are the Canaanites, Kenites, Mongolians, etc.

Abraham, the father of the White race, was not a Jew [he, then, must have been one of those stupid, un-human goyim Abraham's tribesmen so contemptuously talk about in their Talmud! —Baloney! No matter what way you slice it! —Editor].

I hope you reconsider that God Almighty and His Son, the Prophets, and the Disciples were not Jews. Anyway, I know who the Christ-haters are and I hate them who hate Him, as I am told to do.

I would like samples of your leaflets to distribute. Enclosed is $3.00 to cover. Thanks much. For an Ever-Free America,

Mrs. P. G., Minnesota

I was introduced to your magazine by way of article reprints of Jim Taylor's writings and I subsequently have now obtained my first copy of Liberty Bell magazine. I am shocked and disheartened to say the least, by the first two article, "Postscripts" and "Christian Enigmas" in the December 1988 issue. I acknowledge much blindness, stupidity and deceit on the part of those who call themselves Christians, but I had thought your writers and you as editor were more discerning and knowledgable as to the Truth of the Scriptures.

Firstly, something you, authors Oliver and Carter study in depth is that the Jews of today are not nearly at all the descendants of the Israelites of the Scriptures. As noted in your own publication, Behind Communism, today's Jews are a hodge-podge mixture of Khazars, Edomites, Canaanites and relatively few if any true descendants of the patriarch Judah from whom the "Jews" claim to derive their name. In Revelation 2:9 & 3:9, our Saviour refers to "those who say they are Jews but lie and are the synagogue of Satan"; by studying the Talmud and comparing it with the Hebrew Scriptures one can readily see that Yahshua (the proper name of the Messiah) is very accurate (as always) in calling them the synagogue of Satan.

As many students of the Scriptures and history know, the real Israelites of today are the Anglo-Saxon, Germany, Scandinavian and kindred people scattered throughout the world who, for the most part, identify with the Saviour of man, Yahshua the Messiah (know to most as Jesus Christ). It is quite likely that you and both writers previously mentioned are actual flesh and blood descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and are therefore recipients of the blessings pronounced upon those descendants!

Specifically and especially, Yahweh said that in the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, all of the earth would be blessed. And so it has been that the whole world has been blessed by the prosperity, ingenuity, and dedication of the "white" Israelites who established civilization and exalted the truth among the darkened pagans of the world.

It is a travesty and shame that your magazine, which broadcasts so much truth, should be stained by the writings of atheistic slop that your contributing writers have swallowed. I thought you yourself knew better, since I observed some wise statements in your editorial notes of Mr. Taylor's articles. I believe in guilt by association, and even if you don't (and are merely publishing the atheistic drivel for the sake of other truths the same writers bring out,) you should be aware that a house divided against itself cannot stand. Every plant which the heavenly Father has not planted shall be rooted out and cast into the fire. This includes all "anti-Christs", not just the Jews.

It is quite a life-long exercise and effort for us natural men to attain to spiritual understanding. I know there are many discrepancies, inconsistencies, and outright errors in the bulk of "Christianity," yet we are to exercise our sensibilities to discern between good and evil. We are to prove all things and hold fast that which is good. Mr. Carter, author of "Christian Enigmas," stumbles over mostly Catholic/paganistic perversions and traditions of men and then shows forth the typically ignorant, atheistic arrogance of mocking his creator, as does Mr. Oliver. I solemnly warn you, Yahweh will not be mocked.

If you men would study the history of His dealings with His people and consider Yahweh's work in your own lives and see the great promises He has made to work wondrously on our behalf, you would soon have the comfort of victorious life over all the evil of the Jews. You would also then have the assurance for guiding your own life and efforts against evil with the help of the Almighty, the only one who can give you the Love to overcome evil with good. You would then also have the wisdom to hate His enemies with perfect hatred (Psalm 139:19-22).

I hope that you pass this letter on to Oliver and Carter and Mr. Taylor and any of the workers of your organization who labor under the hopeless doubt and darkness of unbelief. I hope the best for you all—it would be an awful shame to see you fail because of impractically overlooking the Source of Truth. (Incidentally, the name Adam means "one who blushes red in the face" thus identifying him as white, which is backed up by the fact that scientists have never found a white man's fossilized skull more than 6000 years old. Negroid and other skulls have been found much older, which were pre-Adamite races (see the Hebrew reading of Genesis 1:1,2 that indicates this pre-Adamic civilization.) Adam was created 6000 years ago to have dominion over creation. Only with Yahweh can we, his descendants, succeed.)

Enclosed check for a continuation of my subscription to Liberty Bell—window of sanity in this Orwellian world.

You might be interested in hearing that the first attempt by Irv Rubin of JDL infamy to sue Dr. George Ashley for "slandering" Irv's good name (sic) failed miserably.

Rubin and his lawyer, Posner—cousin of Vladimir Posner, a New York Jew and mouth piece for the Soviet Union—really put on a pathetic performance. The two of them looked like Abbot and Costello in one of their more bumbling skits!

After Ashley's house was bombed three times in addition to three separate vandalizings by Gods Chosen cowbirds it seems that more punishment had to be doled out. Their entire case centered on Ashley's affiliation with the Institute for Historical Review which apparently justifies any kind of violence a member might suffer. The jury didn't buy it—probably and especially the minorities present—several Mexicans who are infinitely more knowledgable about the cowbirds than are Euro-Americans. Also, Ashley had a Jewish lawyer who exhibited courage and tenacity. The "other" lawyers were afraid to take the case. The judge left a loophole for the forces of darkness to appeal, so they may. These people with their melodramatic "histories" and sanctions against "racism and anti-Semitism" are running out of gas. Aside from their coercion and the fear they try to instill they have little going for them. They really skate on very thin ice.

Their liberal followers look more and more ridiculous and they violate their own principles of "academic freedom." If only more Americans and Europeans would demand to get to the bottom of historical and political events, these people would be swept aside like yesterday's dust.

You are certainly doing your part. Keep up the excellent work and we will prevail.

The book, The March Up Country...I found to be the most rewarding one I have read in a long time. While many have assumed the roles of 'educators' in recent years, I can think of no one since Cmdr. Rockwell's assassination who has really shown a desire to effect a change in some finite span of time. Mr. Covington accurately portrayed my relation with the 'racial right' for the last 25 years. Periodically I would look at the selection of 'leaders' and 'organizations,' gag, and return to political hibernation. After reading several laudatory letters in Liberty Bell, I ordered the book, fully expecting another 'mini-Führer'. This one seems to be the real thing. In fact, I think he actually read Mein Kampf and understood it, and is attempting to apply the wisdom to be mined from that book, rather than stumbling into every cul-de-sac that very book warns against...

Thanks again for doing the job you're doing. We need more Covingtons to get the movement moving, but without the publishers and book distributors there wouldn't be a movement. The physical size, and the geographical diversity of this country are its greatest asset and glory, but it certainly spreads our people thinly. In comparison, Berlin and Munich are almost twin cities.

Sincerely, W.B., Arizona

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigous academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congolds unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

GREEN POLITICIANS

Quite a few Americans were pleased when a comparatively new political organization in Germany, commonly called the Green Party, obtained so many votes in the municipal elections in Berlin that it supplanted the older parties in the coalition government of that city.

It may be worthwhile to remark that the Green Party in Germany has no connection with the International Green Guard, which publishes a periodical called Green March and is Colonel Qaddafi's attempt to gain international support for his variety of socialism, which, like so many others, is to create "a new man," a "new society," and a "new age." The Lybian colonel's movement has nothing to do with ecology; it is "green" because that is the sacred color of orthodox Islam. While it doubtless appeals to the Semitic mentality, it would have no chance of success internationally, even if it were not persecuted by the governments the Jews have installed in Western nations. His variety of socialism has no appeal to Mongolians and is alien to the temperament of Aryans, except, perhaps, a few twittering "intellectuals" in search of exotic novelties.

The Green Party in Germany is based on what is now called ecology. It demands abatement of the "acid rain" that is destroying German forests and gnawing the stones of the nation's most venerable monuments. It would prohibit the defilement of rivers and oceans with the waste of industries. It seeks preservation of the German countryside and would halt the sacrifice of land, whether cultivated or in a state of nature, to factories and the acres of jerry-built housing that accompany them. It is also apprehensive about the possible consequences of the present type of nuclear power-plants.

All these are laudable policies, but Americans were especially pleased by the electoral defeat of the party of the present shabbatgoy government of Germany, which is most conspicuously represented by its Chancellor, Helmut Kohl, who spews forth every week the verbiage about "progress" and "negotiations" and "world peace" with which the thugs who rule a "democracy" entertain and confuse their victims. The one noteworthy item in Kohl's drivel is his insistence that "human rights" must take precedence over a nation's laws and the wishes of its people; in this he is doubtless sincere, since he must know that, as stated in the Holy Talmud, only Jews are human and have rights, whereas the members of all other races are merely animals, like sheep and hogs, and can have no rights.

Kohl brazenly jabbered in honor of "Simon Wiesenthal, Champion of Humanity [i.e., Sheenies]" in a disgraceful speech printed by the Embassy in Washington in its propaganda sheet, Statements and Speeches, 16 November 1988. He beats his hollow breast in simulated remorse for the imagined horrors of the "Kristallnacht," when some Germans, enthusiastically foreseeing liberation from their parasites and indignant because a Kike had openly assassinated a ranking German official in Paris, broke a few windows of shops owned by their domestic enemies. Kohl pretends he believes the Yids' crude Holohoax, although he must be sufficiently intelligent to know what a fraud it is, and he rolls on the ground in fits of simulated horror at the wickedness of Germans who killed millions or billions of Yahweh's masterpieces in ways that are chemically and physically impossible. For a specimen of his obscene grovelling, see the propaganda sheet, The Week in Germany, 18 November 1988. Although superlatives are dangerous when there is so wide a field of selection, I nominate Kohl for the distinction of being the most disgusting lickspittle in a position of political power in the world today.

The electoral achievement of the Green Party in Berlin must have encouraged many Germans, as it encouraged thoughtful Americans, to entertain a hope that the new party might flourish and soon be in a position to supersede the nauseous régime of Kohl and his accomplices in treason.

The new party, despite some ecological hyperbole in its pronouncements, could not well be suppressed by the alien government in Bonn, which, with the wonted tyranny of "democracy," used its police powers to prevent a newly founded party, the Nationale Sammlung, from competing in elections in Hesse, where it was likely to obtain a small but numerically significant number of votes. The pretext was that the leader of the new party had been guilty of "ideological crimes," i.e., had had thoughts that were not kosher. The Green Party was already too large to be eliminated in that way, and persons concerned for the future of Germany and of our race could hope that it, whatever its defects, would at least clear the way for a German government of Germany.

Alas, for the human propensity to invent delusive hopes! According to The Week in Germany, 26 May 1989, the Green Party, at its national convention, yelled for "a policy of open borders," which would permit and encourage enemies and human refuse from the whole world to enter Germany and reside in it as "refugees" whenever they wished and without restrictions of any kind. And when a mass of anthropoid garbage had been parasitic on the Germans for five years, it was to be given the right to vote in all German elections! The party that objects to the chemical pollution of the atmosphere and waters of Germnay is the most rabid advocate of biological pollution of the captive nation.

Not content with this exhibition of hatred of civilized Germans, the Green rabble made their convention a comic sotie by accusing Kohl's Christian Democratic coalition of "turning racism into government policy" by a shocking failure ruthlessly to suppress the horrid "extreme right-wing," who hold the damnable belief that Germany should belong to the Germans and should not become a stinking compost heap of human offal.

So now we know why Kohl so ostentatiously tolerated "opposition" from the Green Party.

The ideological spokesman for the Green Party is an individual named Ralf Fücks. The personal name is Nordic; the family name suggests conjecture about the man's race, which might explain a great deal. He opines that his Green Party, in coalition with the Social Democrats, may win the elections to the Bundestag next year and so replace Kohl and his accomplices in Bonn. Perhaps we were wrong in assuming that there could be nothing worse than Kohl.

SMALL VOICES

The few who are seriously interested in preserving our civilization and race have frequently observed that the local weekly newspapers will often print letters and even small articles that could never appear in the jewspapers, i.e., the daily press of large circulation.

An interesting example is the issue of the Post Eagle for 12 April 1989, of which a copy was recently sent me. The Post Eagle is a weekly, published, almost entirely in English, for Poles in this country. Letters to the editor are published as though they were signed articles.

One letter begins with a description of the way in which a hatchet man on one of the television stations ganged up with a rabbi to interview a young white man, "a twenty-year old skinhead," who was not ashamed of his race. Using the technique of the Spanish Inquisitors, who often trapped their victims by verbal trickery, using a word in several different senses, thus confusing them and making them make inconsistent statements, the rabbi and his goy hunting dog were able to make the Aryan youth seem somewhat ridiculous.

The author of the letter then deplores a doctrine of "White Supremacy," the term now applied to the wicked notion that even creatures so self-degraded and abject as White men and women have rights. He gives a list of major crimes committed by Whites, among which one especially notices, e.g., "The Jewish traitors, Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, were white." "The Russian and Jewish KGB agents who murdered...Polish officers and intellectuals at Katyn were white." "The Russians and Jews who starved 8 million Ukrainians in the 1920's and 30's were white." "The violence and filth televised into American homes is done primarily by white people. Fifty-nine percent of them were raised in Jewish homes (from statistics)." I do not know what was the writer's purpose, but I am sure he must have incited serious reflection in some readers.

"Anti-Semitism Phrase by Jews a Fraud" is the title in large type before a good letter that exposes one of the sneaking tricks, the pollution of language, used by God's People to stultify their victims.

In English, the term 'anti-Semitism' must mean opposition to or antagonism toward Semites, the race now most fully represented by the Arabs and the Arabic-speaking Semites in the Near and Middle East. The Kikes have contrived to make the average reader understand the word in a sense that it cannot have, if language is not to become mere babble. If the word is used correctly, it becomes obvious that the Yids, a hybrid race that contains some Semitic blood, are now the most violently and viciously anti-Semitic people in the world, since they are now engaged in an effort to liquidate the Palestinians and eventually all the Semitic nations.

In the Post Eagle Wladek Zierkiewicz observes that, "The Jews are always wailing about Polish antisemitism, their biggest fraud. Poland is 100% pro-Arab...which equals 95% pro-Semitic and 5% anti-Zionist." He then comments on "Jewish antisemitism against Palestinians" and concludes: "Anti-Semitism... refers to...'hostility to Arabs' and is racial. Jewish anti-Semitism (hostility to Arabs) is the only one in the world.... Anti-Semitism, signifying 'hostility to Jews' as printed in U.S. dictionaries is a fraud, a falsehood, and should be removed from all editions."

What Mr. Zierkiewicz says is, of course, obvious to everyone who respects the English language and believes in the use of words as a means of communication, rather than as noises made to excite emotions in the mindless rabble. The constant misuse of the word by the Jews and their stooges has made many otherwise intelligent persons accept it without thinking about its meaning. What makes the letter in the Post Eagle so valuable is that, by exhibiting one crude Jewish hoax, it will make intelligent readers aware of the systematic dishonesty and perfidy of the parasitic race, and that is the first step toward understanding the dark age in which we now live.

Weekly newspapers, addressed to the residents of a county or to a White ethnic group, have circulations that are trivial when they are compared to metropolitan liepapers, but although some are being bought up and formed into chains, most of them, I believe, are still independently owned. Their editors, although they have not been openly intimidated by the Jews, probably share the general ignorance created by the Communist-"Liberal" control of schools and the media of communication, but may still retain our racial sense of logic. They would probably be made incredulous or frightened by sweeping statements such as readers of Liberty Bell take for granted, but they can see logic when it is applied to a single specific point, such as the absurdity of the catachrestic meaning now generally given to the term 'anti-Semitic.'

Weekly newspapers, I believe, offer the only outlet still available to persons who hope to accomplish something by writing letters. If you send a letter to one of the large daily papers, it will, barring the unlikely chance of a blunder by an inexperienced underling, end in a wastebasket or be printed so mutilated or rearranged as to make it innocuous. If you write to a member of the den of thieves in the Capitol of the District of Corruption, his secretary's secretary's assistant will either toss it in a wastebasket or press a button that will make a computer churn out a letter thanking you for your advice and promising that it will be given "due consideration." That usually means that your name and address will be transmitted to the Defamation League for addition to the Jews' watch-list.

Many editors of small weeklies are still simple folk, unsophisticated and holding the illusions about the United States that you had before you began to doubt what you read in the big liepapers or saw on the boob-tube. Write to him the kind of letter to which you would have given sympathetic consideration in the days before you had to face the terrible realities of the occupied country in which you now live.

CHRÉTIEN MALGRÉ LUI

I have received a photocopy of a little book that is more informative than its author knew. The typography suggests that The Call of Our Ancient Nordic Religion was first published anonymously in Australia, s.l.& a., and then reprinted with the name and a portrait of the author, A. Rud Mills, c. 1958 or later. He is evidently the leader of an Odinist cult in Australia, for among his other writings is a Guide Book for the Anglican Church of Odin, which I have not seen.

The booklet by Mr. Mills is a clear example of the residue that Christianity leaves in the minds of persons who imagine they have emancipated themselves from it. He is an intelligent man, and I sympathize with his position and endorse his purposes, so I shall criticize his booklet with all good will. (Typographical limitations will prevent me from spelling Norse words correctly; I shall replace the thorn letter with th, and its voiced counterpart with d.)

Mr. Mills is a highly intelligent man. He perceives that Christianity is a Great Lie, a deadly poison that is destroying our race. As he says in his Chapter IX, "Christian nations move on towards a breed of people unable to discharge the functions necessary to living,...on to human mongrelism,...on to Equality." Thus men who look up from the feeding troughs and endeavor to understand the world about us "have seen the death ahead of us."

A man who has perceived that Christianity is just an elaborate system of make-believe has two alternatives: he may reject all superstitions about the supernatural as idle fantasy or he may, for either of two reasons, elect a religion that is not patently deleterious to our race. He may choose the latter alternative because he himself wants the emotional comfort of disguising the terrible reality of our place in the cosmos—James Branch Cabell once observed that "five minutes of clear vision of man's place in the universe would suffice to set the most philosophical gibbering" — or he may believe, perhaps correctly, that the great majority of our people could not bring themselves to dispense with pleasant fiction and cozy illusions about a Big Daddy somewhere, and must therefore be offered an innocuous substitute for Christian hashish.

We, of course, cannot know which was Mr. Mills' motive; he elected the Odinism of our ancestors, and, we may suppose, founded the Anglican Church of Odin, for which he wrote a guide book.

The choice of the religion of our Germanic ancestors, most clearly exhibited in the Norse pantheon, was a logical one, but Mr. Mills then proceeds to misrepresent and distort it until it is almost unrecognizable. Since I refuse to believe that he behaved as do Christian holy men, who make their religion into whatever bait seems best for coney-catching at the moment, I assume that he was confused by what little he had read about the Norse religion and misunderstood even that in terms the residue left in his mind by the spiritual poison from which he thought he had recovered. And so much has been written on Norse religion by imaginative enthusiasts that it would require prolonged research to determine how much of his Odinism he derived from such sources and how much he imagined for himself.

He begins by deriving the name of Odin (Ódinn) from the Norse form of the Germanic word for a 'god' (god). This is extremely doubtful. The word 'god,' which appears originally to have been neuter, is derived from one of two Indo-European roots, one of which means 'that which is invoked,' while the other means 'that to which sacrifice is made,' but the etymology of Odin's name is obscure: there have even been suggestions that it was not originally Indo-Germanic.

Mr. Mills, furthermore, refers to Odin as 'God,' with a majuscule, thus using the Christian trick of implying that the god thus designated is the only one. It is true that Odin was generally regarded as the chief of the gods (ásabragr), comparable to Zeus, and, as the god of war, he seems to have been particularly the divine patron of the aristocracy; for landowners and territorial magnates, however, war was less important than the seasons and the fertility of the soil. Thus we often find Thor (Thór) described as the 'most worshipful of the gods'(arwurdose) and in the great temple at Uppsala, devoted to worship of the trinity then regarded as the senior gods, Thor was the chief, superior to both Odin and Freyr. And there were individuals who regarded Freyr, the god of the sexual force, as the primordial deity.

The author proceeds to elaborate a conception of Odin as a father-figure, much as Christian theologians created such a Yahweh by ignoring the "Old Testament" and using their imaginations to iterpret some references by their Jesus to the god of whom he was supposedly a part. For this Mr. Mills does have some basis in the epithet, 'All-Father' (Alfadir/Alfödr), given to Odin, although it is hard to see what was meant by it, since Odin was not the father of most of the gods and certainly was not regarded as having created the world. The epithet may be no more than a condensed form of the epithet, 'Father of men' (*Aldaföd*r), given to Odin because he either fashioned Askr and Embla, the first man and woman, from ash trees or when the bodies of the first mortals were put together by other gods, he breathed life into them. He was also regarded as having been, like Zeus and other Greek gods, the ancestor of kingly families by intercourse with virgins.

If one is to describe Odin with reference to the epithets given him, one should take into account the score of other epithets equally representative of the personality of the god as conceived by his votaries, e.g., 'the worker of evil' (Bölverkr), which presumably refers to what he does to his enemies, and 'god of the hanged' (Hangagud), presumably because persons condemned to death were sacrificed to him by being hanged from oak trees.

With the omniscience of the Christians' god in mind, Mr. Mills makes Odin 'all-wise,' ignoring the myths about the ways in which Odin, who was 'Much-Knowing' (Fjölnir), not 'All-Knowing,' acquired knowledge of the past and knowledge about the world of the dead and magic rites.

We are told that the votaries of Odin "believed that all men and all nations...comprised a unity"! There is no 'One-World' hokum in Norse religion; on the contrary the gods are constantly at war with their and our implacable enemies, the giants of Jötunheimr, a land that lies to the east of our world, the 'middle land' (Midgard), i.e., the lands occupied by the Germanic peoples of northern Europe, which are also menaced from the north by the frost-giants, and from the south, by the alien and hostile races of Muspelheim. There is no faintest hint of 'peaceful coexistence' in Norse thought; the future is one of perpetual war, which will end in defeat and the ruin of Asgard and the world in the Ragnarök.

From these misunderstandings, Mr. Mills soars into absurdity, telling us that "the architects of the great temple at Karnak dedicated their souls 'to Odin and Thor.'" He has probably seen some fantastic attempt to equate some of the Egyptian gods to totally different Norse deities. Even that is less ridiculous than the statement, "Roman governors and judges claimed....they expressed the Christus spirit[!]. Later Christians claimed that Jesus was the Christus." This is utter nonsense. Roman officials had only contempt for Jews. The Latin christus is simply a transcription of the Greek word χριστός, which means 'ointment, salve,' and was used by the Jews to translate their word MSYH, whence English 'messiah,' i.e., a divinely-ordained King of the Jews, especially one who will come to subjugate or exterminate the hated goyim. And since Jesus was supposedly the son of Yahweh, and Thor, by most accounts, was the son of Odin, Mr. Mills can even speak of "the Christ-Thor"!

Like many other theologians, Mr. Mills has created his own religion, compounding it from the débris of his repudiated Christianity, a smattering of information about the Norse religion, and a perfervid imagination. There could be no better example of the effect produced by the residue of Christianity in minds that imagine they have freed themselves of the Jewish poison.

The best single source of information about the religion that Mr. Mills imagined he was restoring is E. O. G. Turville-Petre's Myth and Religion of the North (New York, Holt, c. 1964), which should be supplemented with Gwyn Jones's History of the Vikings (Oxford University Press, 1968). On the spirit of the sagas, I suggest, with reservations, The Saga Mind, by M. L. Steblin-Kamenskij, translated by Kenneth H. Ober (Odense University Press, 1973); he sadly underestimates the various skalds' freedom to invent mythological ornament. On the religion in terms of Aryan mentality, there are available in English translations the excellent work of Prof. Hans Günther, Religious Attitudes of the Indo-Europeans (London, Clair Press, 1967), and Georges Dumézil's Gods of the Ancient Northmen (University of California Press, 1973).

There are, to be sure, some problems in understanding correctly much of Norse myth. Almost all of our information comes through Christian sources, who may have misunderstood or misrepresented the stories, failing to distinguish between religious belief and mythopoeic fancy. A major source is the Prose Edda of Snorri Sturluson (1179-1241), who was a Christian, although a heretic by the Christianity of his day, since he denied the existence of the Norse gods instead of fearing them as colleagues of Satan. He was interested primarily in the myths as a source of poetic ornament, and since he regarded the myths as fictions, he, much as he respected the achievements of his ancestors, did not take their religion (as distinct from their mythology) seriously.

If you have grown up in the belief that Christianity was a model of religion, even if you recognized its falsity, you will have to make an intellectual leap before you can understand an Aryan religion. Chistianity depends on the 'inerrancy' of its scriptures: it tells you, for example, that Jesus was born of a divinely fecundated virgin, and that he rode into Jerusalem on the back of an ass. If either or both statements are false, the whole structure of revelation collapses like a house of cards.

Aryan religions have no revelations and hence no stories about the gods which votaries of the religion are required to believe. Even if a völva or a pythoness was thought to be divinely inspired and to prophesy in an ecstasy, it did not follow that what she said was necessarily true, and there were no scriptures of "revealed truth."

Aryans who believed in the religion (as by no means all of them did), believed in the existence of gods who, for the most part, were personifications of natural or social phenomena, so that their existence seemed indubitable, but no one presumed to write their biographies. It was generally believed that Sigurd's grandfather was born of a virgin, because virgin births are normal for the ancestors of heroes, but no one would have twitched an eyebrow if a skald made a better story of it by denying the miracle. (I am quite prepared to believe that the author of the Thidreks Saga invented the story of the heroic babe who was found drifting over the sea in a glass boat—invented it just because it seemed to him a pleasing fancy and he saw no reason why he should not change a tale about an event of which no one knew or could know the facts.

The Greeks thought the story of Antigone probably true, but no one denied Sophocles the right to invent a sister for her in his drama, because there was no 'inerrant' record of her life. Euripides invented a husband to whom Electra was married before her father's return from Troy. If a modern writer were to depict Jesus as having a wife, Christians would howl about blasphemy and sacrilege, but an ancient writer who gave Achilles a wife would have been criticized only for artistic impropriety.

Manuals of mythology are often written as though Aryans had no sense of humor. The tale of the adventures of Thór—Thór of the forked beard and mighty muscles—as he made his way into Jötunheimr disguised as a beautiful bride must have evoked wild guffaws as it was told over the mead.

Possible Christian influence is often problematical. In the Norse pantheon, Loki represented the spirit of thoughtless mischief so commonly seen in children and sometimes in adults, but in some tales he seems evil. Now Aryan religions never posit gods that are malevolent (as distinct from gods who, like the forces of nature, have no concern for the wishes and welfare of human beings). Did Snorri Sturluson or men like him, accustomed to the Christian (Zoroastrian) belief in an evil god, misunderstand or distort the tradition, or were the later pre-Christian skalds influenced by what they had heard of the strange beliefs prevalent in Christianized Europe?

These considerations may be of some use to you, if you undertake a study of the religion of your ancestors.

THE DEVIL TO PAY

Satanism, a recognition of the existence and power of the god of pure evil imagined by Christians, is best known today because it offers a pretext for motion pictures of spectacular pornography and horror, and a pretext for the crimes of sadistically insane degenerates. It is unlikely, however, that either the Jews in Hollywood or the degenerates actually believe in the reality of Satan.

In the late 1920s, young men of college age or near it who wanted to shock their elders often professed Satanism as an alternative to Communism, which they disdained because the Communists whom they knew were either vulgarians or perverts. That Satanism was, of course, an extended jeu d'esprit, good fun at a time in which men could still be optimistic about our civilization.

Apparently serious consideration of Satanism belongs to more recent decades, and accompanies the astonishing increase of general ignorance and belief in the supernatural that is one of the most ominous manifestations of our race's abdication from the future it once had. In the dwindling minority who are aware of our approaching doom, quite a few attribute our plight to the machinations of a conspiratorial continuation of Weishaupt's Illuminati, and this opinion is commonly accompanied by a belief that the conspirators are Satanists, who worship the god of evil and are protected and abetted by him.

Although witchcraft is traditionally associated with worship of the Devil, he is conspicuously absent from the organized cults of witchcraft today, of which the most noteworthy and perhaps largest is oddly called Wicca, although that Anglo-Saxon term means 'a wizard, warlock,' while a witch (female) is wicce, witchcraft is wiccecræft, and the body of persons practicing it is wiccedóm. This cult, which is said to have a large number of True Believers, practices astrology and a kind of magic that is much older than Christianity and was until recently common among Anglo-Saxon and Celtic peasants, professes "a religion of joy and love," and is perhaps best represented by The Witch's Bible, by Gavin and Yvonne Frost (Los Angeles, Nash, 1972; paperback, New York, Berkley, 1975). Among the plethora of other books on this kind of occultism, I shall mention only The Witch's Workbook, by "Ann Grammary" (New York, Pocket Books, 1973), which is full of up-to-date talk about Psi-powers and other currently fashionable fads, and The Do-It-Yourself Witchcraft Guide, by "Luba Sevarg" (New York, Universal-Award, c. 1971), which you may find nearer your notion of witchcraft.

One hears astonishingly little these days about Black Masses, whether celebrated for fun, in the manner of Lord Francis Dashwood, or with faith in supernatural evil, as in Huÿsman's well-known Là-bas. But an organized church of Satanism was established around 1969.

The issue of Christian News dated 17 April 1989 is devoted entirely to Satanism. The immediate occasion was a lecture given at Westminster College by a High Priest of the Satanist Church, which has already shown itself an authentic church in the Christian manner, since it has been split by a schism, on which it is needless to dwell here, since that would entail a long exposition of what the heresiarch did not know about Egyptian religion.

That naturally leads the editor and his several contributors to discussion of the crimes that are ostensibly or presumably occasioned by Satanism, and that in turn brings the writers to an estimate of the actual power of the Christians' anti-god in the world today.

Since Christian News represents the authentic Lutheran Church, the editorials and numerous articles by contributors assume the existence of Satan as a mighty deity and adversary of their god. They thus differ radically from most of the Christian churches today, which have killed off Satan, thus repudiating the authority of the holy book that is the only basis for their creed and involving themselves in a theological muddle from which the only escape is to the Marxian Reformation of their religion, called "the Social Gospel" by dervishes who think that sounds better than "Communism."

That brings us to a subject of great historical importance.

II

The theological dilemma was the subject of a book by a rather distinguished French theologian, Jean Turmel, who prudently concealed his identity under the pseudonym, Louis Coulange, when he published his work in an English translation, The Life of the Devil (New York, Knopf, 1930; the French original, which I have not seen, was later published under the title, Histoire du diable).

Father Turmel rightly attributes the eclipse of Satan in modern Christian sects to rejection of the belief in witchcraft and magic, and he wittily concludes that "Satan, cast out from the refuge which, formerly, he found with the possessed and the sorcerers, and the witches, is like the Son of Man, of whom the Gospel tells us that He had nowhere to lay His head."

Father Turmel traces the history of belief in the Devil from the standpoint of Roman Catholic theology. What is now the fundamental work on the subject is the series of four volumes by Professor Jeffrey Burton Russell, published by the Cornell University Press: The Devil (1977), Satan (1981), Lucifer (1984), and Mephistopheles (1987). (If you are especially interested in the meaning of the Hebrew word, STN or ŚTN, which the Jews translated into Greek as διάβοκος, you may find one interpretation in Peggy Day's An Adversary in Heaven, published by the Harvard Semitic Museum.)

Professor Russell writes in a time in which the Jews have made the facts of race as unmentionable as were the facts of sex in Victorian literature, and he even takes some illustrations from their vicious fictions about a "Holocaust" and assumes, as do well-trained Americans, that God's Race are persecuted innocents, by definition incapable of the crimes they are known to have committed. This concession to the inculcated ignorance of the American public is a blemish that should not make us underestimate the authority of his historical scholarship.

He begins by identifying evil as the conscious infliction of unnecessary pain on sentient beings, including, of course, the animals to whose suffering Christians were made hard-hearted by the notion that Yahweh created soulless dumb brutes for the use of talking anthropoids.

The crucial point is that the infliction of suffering must be intentional, i.e., malicious—a point often obscured by a refusal to recognize that the suffering of beings whom we Aryans compassionately pity (e.g., a caribou pulled down by a wolfpack, a wounded wolf, a starving child in India) is simply a fact of nature, and that, if you, like sentimental "Liberals," find that fact distressing, all that you can do is lament that you got yourself born in the wrong universe.

Evil, therefore, is limited to human beings, for no other species of animal inflicts unnecessary pain on the animals it kills to nourish or defend itself, or finds satisfaction in their suffering. And if Professor Russell had not been limited by the reticence imposed by our Jewish masters, he would doubtless have noted that the moral perception of evil is, for all practical purposes, limited to our race—not all persons of Aryan ancestry, but those whose genetic inheritance we, if intelligent, would strive to perpetuate.

The delight that Congoids and American Indians find in the suffering of persons of their own or other races is notorious. Mongoloids, although they recognize suffering as something an individual should avoid, except when demonstrating his superiority to it, as in choosing the most painful form of suicide, seem not to consider unnecessary infliction of pain on others as morally reprehensible. The same moral indifference is found in Semites; the atrocious cruelty of the Assyrian king, Ashnur-nasir-pal II (883-859 B.C.) is cited as a shocking example of evil by Professor Russell, but there is no indication that it ever excited reprobation from members of his race, and the ingenuity of Arabs in torturing prisoners in recent times is famous. The sadistc delight of Jews in the suffering of other races is obvious from the "Old Testament," and both history and archaeology have shown they were equally ferocious toward members of their own race who were dissidents or suspected of sympathy for goyim.

The Aryans' instinctive perception of evil is related to his equally distinctive compassion. Only Aryans, I believe, are capable of the rationality which shows them that mortal enemies must be destroyed, combined with regret, even sorrow, at their suffering. A concise illustration of this is a stanza by Mayūra, an early Sanskrit poet, in honor of Śiva, the terrible god of ruthless destruction. The short hymn is preserved in the Saduktikaṇāmṛta, a relatively late anthology. I quote my translation:

I sing the god of world-destroying might,
Siva, who smote with bolts of quenchless flame
The triple city of the anti-gods:
For when he saw the molten walls decay
And fall, the thund'ring bow fell from his hands
And his immortal eyes were touched with tears.

In inner rooms the demon-women stood;
He saw the fire cut away the hems
Of their embroidered robes and lave their hair.
He saw the flame upon their bodiced gowns—
He saw its fingers stroke their girdled loins
And pluck the silver apples of their breasts.

The "anti-gods" of the poem are the Asuras, implacable rivals of the Devas, the gods of Hinduism. They had to be destroyed to give the gods of Indra's Heaven security, but the terrible god weeps for the brave enemies whom he had to annihilate, and the poet emphasizes that pathos by describing the supernatural courage and dignity with which even the women perish.

In Mayūra's time, miscegenation was blighting irretrievably the civilization of the conquerors of India; his date is uncertain, but his race is not. The poem proves that he belonged to the race that many centuries before had, in the noblest of epics, treated the Trojan enemies of the Greeks with respect and admiration—the race that many centuries after Mayūra produced the American naval commander who destroyed a hopelessly inferior and hopelessly outnumbered and outgunned Spanish fleet during the United States' war of aggression against Spain in 1898. He understood enemies who, without possible hope of victory or escape, fought for honor, and as the Spanish ships sank or burned, he reproved his men, "Don't cheer, boys; the poor devils are dying." He belonged to the race from which the Jew-crazed Americans of today have defected as they stumble blindly and ignominously toward the doom they have brought upon themselves.

Milton tried "to justify the ways of God to man," but he was an Aryan, an accomplished Humanist, and a great poet, and therefore, despite the creed he professed, the hero of his Paradise Lost is Satan, a celestial being far nobler than the tyrant from whose despotism he has revolted.

> What though the field be lost?
> All is not lost: th' unconquerable will,
> And study of revenge, immortal hate,
> And courage never to submit or yield.

No Aryan man can read or hear those lines without a thrill of admiration as he recognizes the spirit and glory of his great race. Milton's Satan, indeed, is an Aryan of the Aryans and. whatever the poet may have intended, he will be the hero of the epic for all male Aryans who have not lost their manhood. through narcotics, superstition, or degeneracy. He represents the peculiarly Aryan pride and self-mastery seen again, for example, in the imperious will of Byron's Manfred, who, in his last moments, defies the infernal god of Christian belief:

> II knew, and know my hour is come, but not
> To render up my soul to such as thee:
> Away! I'll die as I have lived—alone.

That characteristic of our race is one reason why we are the primary targets of the Jews' unappeasable hatred, and why the religion with which they poisoned us perpetually admonishes its dupes to be humble—to have no more pride than earthworms. But even that degrading superstition could not change the nature of the Aryans who adopted it, as Landor, who understood the pious Christians of his time, recognized in the long and brilliant poem which he composed in Latin and of which he then made his own

English version: "Humility,| A tatter'd cloak that pride wears when deform'd."

Evil is peculiarly and exclusively human, but what is bizarre, to our minds, at least, is a god of evil.

Although Professor Russell had to write within the limitations that the Jews impose on their subjects, two facts emerge clearly from the historical and almost philosophical discussion in his first volume.

1. No Aryan religion conceives of a god of evil. Our religions are relatively rational and polytheistic, recognizing the diversity of the forces that govern human life and are often in conflict with each other. There are gods who personify the forces of nature and, like storms and tidal waves and earthquakes, reck nothing of the convenience, safety, or wishes of human beings. There are gods who represent the tropisms that are inherent in human nature, such as sexual attraction and ambition, which are often opposed to each other. There are gods who, in their youth, exhibit children's pleasure in mischievous sport. There are gods who, like mortal kings, protect and aid their favorites, and, when angered, strike down the insolent and insubordinate. But the Aryan does not conceive of divine malice and sadism, for their gods are not unnatural. Fire is not evil when it destroys a city and perhaps accumulated and irreplaceable treasures.

2. It is astonishing, therefore, that a god of pure evil was first created by a man who seems to have been an Aryan, the prophet whose name, of obscure etymology and variously spelled in the original texts, usually appears in English as Zarathustra or in the form it was given in the time of Hellenism, Zoroaster.

So far as is known, it was he who, probably while having hallucinations excited by the sacred mushroom (Amanita muscaria), invented the grotesque conception of a world dominated by two great gods, one of good and the other of evil, whose powers are equal as they fight each other for suzerainty over the world, for they are so evenly matched that each needs the trivial help that can be given him by puny mortals. The two gods are engaged in perpetual war for possession of the universe, although Zarathustra's religion, with an almost pathological disregard of simple logic, absurdly knows that the ultimate victory of the good god is assured, no matter what happens.

Zoroastrianism may be the delusion most pernicious to our race ever excogitated by a human mind, but in the form presented by its prophet, it was, if one accepted the absurd premises of his "revelation" (i.e., hallucination), a coherent doctrine. As every impartial student knows, Christianity is basically a Judaized and vulgarly muddled rifacimento of Zoroastrianism, as is even symbolically shown by the myth that the terrestrial birth of its incarnate god was foreseen and attended by Zoroastrian priests.

These two facts have an odd corollary. The Jews' adaptation of the Caananite god Yah was not evil by Jewish standards, for he aided and abetted them in their thefts and depredations and pleased them by sadistically inflicting suffering and destruction on innocent peoples to appease his pets' insatiable hatred of civilized mankind. But to Aryans, as is obvious to everyone who reads the "Old Testament" with a mind unnumbed by superstition, Yahweh is a vicious and repulsive being and the thought that such a deity could exist excites horror. Some early Christian sects, not dominated by Jews, logically concluded that the Jews' savage god must be Satan under another name. But nevertheless, our race was somehow induced to worship and revere an alien and ineffably monstrous god, and acceptance of subordination to such a being necessarily blunted our race's moral sense as well as intelligence. How can you explain that spiritual abasement?

IV

Professor Russell's thorough analysis of the concept of a god of evil makes it obvious that, as simple logic would teach you anyway, a bipolar religion depends on the existence of opposites. There could be no Ahura Mazda without Angra Mainyu (Ahriman), his great antagonist. And in Christianity, a tawdry Jewish imitation of Zoroastrianism, there can be no God without Satan, anymore than there can be a magnet with only one pole.

That, of course, is patent to any Christian who thinks about his religion, and the learned and honest editor of Christian News recognizes that fact, that the faith of Luther, as well as the doctrine of every Christian sect that is not a mere fraud, depends on the existence of Satan, without whom a belief in the existence of his divine adversary would be preposterous.

(I am reminded, by the bye, of the Anglican bishop who, when I was a youngster, back in the days when the Anglican Church was not a mere sham and device for subsidizing perverts and vicious apemen, such as the infamous Tutu, told me, "It is impossible to prove the existence of God, but easy to prove the existence of the Devil." If you think about it, you will see his point.)

Recognition of Satan exposes, of course, the Christians' pretense that their religion is a monotheism, a claim made possible only by the shabby trick of calling Yahweh "God," to the exclusion of all the other gods, Mars, Jupiter, Venus, et al., in whose existence the early Christians firmly believed, and now even of Satan, whose existence is indispensable to a religion based on their "New Testament".

Even if we accept the bizarre Christian claim that the three partners in Yahweh & Son, Inc., form one person, much as the three heads of Cerberus belong to one praeternatural canine, it is obvious from the "New Testament" that Satan is a mighty supernatural being, not only independent of Yahweh & Son, but an antagonist of that firm, with powers on earth so great that he could kidnap one-third of it, carry it to a mountain top, and try to bribe it by offering dominion over the earth, which, it is assumed, Satan could have delivered at once. Satan, therefore, is obviously a god opposed to the tripartite god Christians prefer to worship, and the equal, if not the superior, of that god, at least on earth.

The Jews, after they abandoned, in the fifth century B.C. or later, their original conception of Yahweh as chief among the five or more elohim they thought it expedient for their tribe to worship, and after, probably late in the second century B.C., they had the colossal impudence to claim that their tribal deity and accomplice was the animus mundi posited by the Stoics, can claim to be monotheists, for in the tale about Job Satan appears as the bailiff of his cruel lord and torments the old Jew for the amusement of Yahweh and, no doubt, himself. There is no problem of theodicy, for Yahweh is the admitted source of evil.

Christianity, on the other hand, is, like its source, Zoroastrianism, necessarily a ditheism, for a theos is a superhuman and divinely powerful person, regardless of your attitude toward him. The world is a battleground between two theoi—and, indeed, one on which Satan seems to have achieved a victory, even if Christians hopefully believe it is temporary. for he is often recognized as the Lord of this World, Jesus and his allies having beaten a strategic retreat to their citadel in the stratosphere.

Christians, having chosen to worship and assist the god they disingenuously call God, can properly claim to be monolaters (granting their claim that 3 = 1 in their Trinity), but they cannot, without absurdity, deny the existence of the other god. Satanists are also monolaters, for they have elected to worship the other god, but at least they do not have the impudence to claim that they are monotheists.

No Satan, no Yahweh. Such is the dilemma of Christianity today, and the editor of Christian News has taken the only position that will preserve the religion as a faith instead of a racket.

One may regret the decline of Christianity, as one regrets the labefaction of any established and imposing structure, but the process is irreversible, except, perhaps, in the new Dark Ages planned for us. So long as our race retains rational minds, they will not indulge in opium to efface their perception of unpleasant realities. It is often said that Christianity as a viable religion was doomed by the De revolutionibus orbium caelestium of Copernicus and the ensuing discovery that the universe is so vast that the earth and all its inhabitants and history is far less than a drop of water and the animalcules in it. But the religion was equally and earlier doomed by the short and concise little work of Laurentius Valla, De libero arbitrio, which demonstrated, with irrefragable logic, that no god can be at once benevolent, omniscient, and omnipotent. An imagined god may have two of those qualities, but he cannot have all three, any more than he can be both round and square. And no matter which two of the possible attributes you select, no Christian will be content with such a deity. Vale, Jesu!

HEARING ABOUT JESUS & CO.

I have received from the Ignatius Press a catalogue that astonished me. The press publishes the book on the African Plague ("AIDS") by Gene Antonio, which I recommended in Liberty Bell, April 1988, p. 8, and a book of intellectual and historical significance, The Restoration of Christian Culture, by Professor John Senior, which I have long intended to discuss in these "Postscripts" as soon as I could find space and time.

The Press was doubtless named in honor of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits. He, in turn, was given the name of the saintly hero of one of the martyr-stories the Christians began to concoct near the end of the Second Century, although wholesale production of such fictions belongs to the time of Jerome. According to this tale, Ignatius was a Bishop of Antioch who hastened to Rome around 115 in joyous expectation that the wicked Romans would throw him to wild beasts in the arena and he, thus martyred, would not have to wait for a natural death to become one of Jesus's buddies up in the clouds. The silly story was probably imagined to provide a pious author for a group of letters about the proper organization and conduct of Christian communities, written in imitation of the series of letters by various hands attributed to Paul, of which a selection was included in the "New Testament." The seven letters, which are extant in several conflicting versions, were composed before the Fourth Century, when holy forgers produced other screeds to which they attached the name of Ignatius, much as their predecessors had done for Paul.

Although the Press does publish some books worth reading, its staple product is books in which Roman Catholic holy men exercise their imagination and rhetoric to provide soothing-syrup for Catholics who want to be told, over and over again, how much Jesus and his mama love them, and who need to be told how assiduously they must obey and finance the shamans who alone can get them reservations in Jesus's famous hostelry for devout ghosts.

The catalogue which came to me is of such devotional works now orally recorded on tapes for the benefit of Catholics who can't or won't read. There are 240 sets of such recordings, each set comprising from four to twenty-six tapes. Just imagine! Assuming that the average set consists of ten tapes, and that each tape is only sixty minutes long, you could, for almost a year, spend your days listening to practiced and smoothly insidious voices tell you glowing fantasies about imaginary gods and saints, and you wouldn't need opium, hashish, or alcohol to keep you in a trance and oblivious of reality.

It is not easy to choose anything from this welter of oleaginous gabble, much of it with affectedly quaint titles, e.g., Living Bread, a series of "inspirational meditations on the greatest of all acts of love," the Eucharist, the Christian imitation of the theophagous rites of various orgiastic Oriental sects. The presiding holy man miraculously converts bread into the flesh of Jesus, which is then decorously devoured by well-bred cannibals, who believe they will absorb mana from the psychic meat.

Another amusing set of tapes is entitled Woman Clothed with the Sun. The splendidly dressed female is, of course, the Egyptian goddess Isis, whom the Christians took over and converted into the mother of one-third of their god when they saw the need to add a feminine interest to their cult. The tape recordings are "classic accounts of eight authentic appearances of Our Lady by great authors." One of the authors may be Harry Daly, whom I mentioned in Liberty Bell, October 1986, pp. 23-25, with reference to his report of an incident in which the Virgin, with the furtive manner that seems characteristic of the shy quasi-goddess, sidled up to some adolescent Spanish girls and confided world-shaking secrets to them.

I have mentioned two titles that caught my eye as I glanced through the catalogue. You can obtain from the Ignatius Press 238 other sets of tape recordings. Is there not something impressive and almost fearsome about that proof of the insatiable human appetite for dulcet illusions?

THE TRUTH SEEKER, R.I.P.

In Flanders fields, and in all the cemeteries behind the long battle lines of the First World War, the crosses, row on row, each bore the letters R.I.P., followed by the name of the dead man (if known). The letters stood, of course, for the pious wish, Requiescat in pace. But in a war fought with high explosives the corpses were often so mutilated or even fragmentary that soldiers at the front sardonically said that the abbreviation on the cross indicated the burial of the dead man's Remains In Pieces.

I was reminded of that cynical quip by the death of the once excellent periodical, The Truth Seeker, of which the corpse has been ripped into two pieces, which have not yet been buried.

I became aware of that small monthly publication in 1958 or 1959, when I read the monumental work by its editor and proprietor, the late Charles Smith, Sensism, the Philosophy of the West, (2 vols., New York, Truth Seeker, 1956). Despite some superficial defectsawkward neologisms, such as 'sensism' and 'immechanism,' and an excessively diffuse stylethe two handsome volumes, written with both keen perception of the parlous plight of our endangered civilization and the optimism that thorughtful men could still feel in 1956, are a fundamental analysis of our culture and its chances of survival. It is a book that will never become obsolete, and, if I am not mistaken, it remained in print so long as the Truth Seeker was published.

I soon became acquainted with Charles Smith, for whom I had a high regard, although my public expression of it was limited by my position in the John Birch Society, which had adopted a policy of conciliating Christians who were willing to subordinate their private emotions to the urgent task of recovering control of our subverted nation. He was a thoroughgoing atheist, and, of course, did not recognize the special sanctity of Yahweh's Peculiar People or of the enervating religion they had foisted on the hated goyim.

For legal and tax purposes, Truth Seeker Publications was a corporation, which Smith had founded and of which he owned almost all of the stock. He sometimes gave a share of stock to persons of whom he approved, much as some organizations make "awards of merit" which have no monetary value. I probably still have somewhere in a mass of unsorted papers the share he gave me.

I inferred that the corporation had always operated at a loss and with deficits that were absorbed by Smith or his friends. And I surmised that the losses were becoming greater each year as the number of subscribers who preferred cold realism to verbal narcotics declined and the cost of printing increased. The last book published by Smith, so far as I know, was the handsomely printed and bound reprinting of Francis Parker Yockey's Imperium (New York, Truth Seeker, 1962; a paperback reprint is avaiable from Liberty Bell Publications, $10.00 + postage).

Smith's enterprise was naturally the target of harassment and privileged crime, including arson, in New Jerusalem-on-the Hudson, and after some heavy losses, he decided to move the entire operation to San Diego, California, then a more civilized community, where he had an ally in James Hervey Johnson, the author of a booklet that was sold through the Truth Seeker Co. and is a frontal attack on superstition, Superior Men (San Diego, the author, 1949; kept in print as long as the Truth Seeker was published).

The booklet consists of 120 pages of trenchant text followed by seventy pages of letters and short articles by men and women who cured themselves of superstition by their own study and reflection. I have been told that Johnson had a brief political career: elected Assessor of Taxes for the county, he proposed that churches should be taxed on the same basis as private clubs or theaters, race tracks, dance halls, and other places of amusement. He thus excited frenzy among the salvation-mongers and panic among corrupt politicians, who found some way to remove him from office.

Shortly before his death in 1964, Charles Smith gave his publishing company to Johnson, who became its proprietor and the editor of the periodical.

I never met James Hervey Johnson, but I had some correspondence with him and spoke with him over the telephone two or three times. When I wrote Christianity and the Survival of the West in 1969, I knew from the annual statements that subscriptions to the Truth Seeker had constantly declined, and, drawing a not unnatural inference from the use of a typewriter to replace linotype composition, I wrote that the periodical was being forced to the wall. I was mistaken. Johnson had refused to pay exorbitant charges for printing a comparatively small number of copies, and he assured me, as he several times assured his readers in print, that the Truth Seeker was eminently solvent and would continue publication so long as he lived.

Unlike almost all other "right-wing" publishers,

Johnson never solicited subventions from any source, for reasons which did not become apparent until shortly before his death. He seems to have made no effort to promote the Truth Seeker through any of the few channels open to a publication that offended Yahweh's Master Race. He apparently took the attitude that he would publish the periodical; let those who wanted it come and get it without being urged.

So far as I know, he did all of the work himself, from bookkeeping and typing copy to mailing issues and wrapping books, except the actual printing by photo-offset. He repeatedly adverised for one or more assistants who were convinced atheists, fully literate, and addicted to neither tobacco nor alcohol, but evidently had no applicants whom he was willing to employ. He asked subscribers to renew their subscriptions on a certain date each year, but I doubt that he kept a list of those who did. As the quality of the periodical declined, some sent in their annual renewals for old time's sake, but I know that those who did not continued to receive it. It seems clear that Johnson soon began to publish the journal at his own expense and to neglect bookkeeping that thus became irrelevant.

The Truth Seeker's impious treatment of the Kikes and their superstition, and its rational perception of race, naturally aroused resentment, and arsonists, probably the same holy crew that burned down the offices of the Istitute for Historical Review in Torrance, set fire to the building that was the periodicals office and warehouse. Mr. Johnson had an apartment on an upper floor of the building and its was doubtless intended to cremate him, but he escaped the flames. Shortly thereafter he was run down by an automobile while he was crossing a street. He again escaped death, but was severely injured and immobilized in a cast for months. An old man's broken bones knit slowly and often imperfectly.

He never entirely recovered from his injuries; he remained partly crippled during the brief remainder of his life, and, I am told, irascible, particularly resenting well-meaning inquiries about his health. His typing became even more erratic, and issues of the Truth Seeker became a grotesque hotchpotch.

As I recall, it was after his partial recovery that he began to extol the dietary system to which he attributed his longevity, and to advertise a booklet of financial advice, by which, he said, anyone could gradually accumulate a fortune by following certain rules of prudent investment. I have not seen the booklet, but a man who has tells me that the recommendations were more suited to 1930-1950 than to the present.

It soon transpired, perhaps through Johnson's indiscretion, that he was going to leave an estate estimated at $17,000,000. (The estimate was conservative; according to latest reports, the net worth is $22,000,000.) That news was electrifying.

Several persons, who, beween them, possessed ten or twelve shares of the stock that Charles Smith had distributed as compliments, held a "stockholders' meeting" of The Truth Seeker, Inc., and simultaneously resurrected two other defunct corporations of which I know nothing. They proceeded*incredible dictu!*to fire James Hervey Johnson as editor of the Truth Seeker, and began legal proceedings to recover the $17,000,000 which he must have embezzled from the vast profits that the little publication must have made.

This wonderous litigation is still in the courts, but its net effect was that Mr. Johnson, shortly before his death, added to the will by which he left his entire estate for the promotion of atheism a holographic codicil in which he specifically excluded from benefit the organization which he, rightly or wrongly, regarded as instigators of the lawsuit.

James Hervey Johnson died in his eighty-eighth year shortly before his body was found in his apartment on 6 August 1988, having appointed as executor of his will a banker who is said to be one of Jesus's lambs or rams. As soon as Johnson was dead, a woman who claimed to have been "like a daughter to him" suddenly appeared and became the executor's favorite as successor to Johnson and new "President of the Truth Seeker, Inc."

There are now two Truth Seekers, each of which purports to be the legitmate continuation of the periodical James Hervey Johnson edited for so many years, and is principally devoted to denouncing the other.

What is strange is that the two reciprocally hostile publications are in almost complete agreement about all other matters. That is significant, and that is why I have devoted so much space to my reminiscence about the antecedents of what would otherwise by a commonplace and sordid affair.

The antagonists agree that Charles Smith was a very wicked man. He did not believe in a god, and professed atheists cannot object to that, but he actually disbelieved in God's Chosen People! And he must have been bribed to become so vile as to speak irreverently of God's Own. He believed in biological evolution, and that is permissible to atheists, provided, of course, that they add the proviso that God stopped the evolution of anthropoids a hundred thousand years ago to make sure that all anthropoids are equal (except God's Race, which is infinitely more equal than the others). Smith, horrible dictu, was a "racist" and he impiously and in defiance of God's Will claimed that Aryans were somehow superior to Congoids and Astraloids, instead of recognizing that Providence appointed Aryans humbly to work for the savages.

There is a slight difference in the rivals' attitude toward James Hervey Johnson. The group which denounces him as a thief and embezzler regards his "racism" and disrespect toward God's Own as only natural in so depraved a criminal. That would be an embarrassing position for a woman who has ddiscovered she was "like a daughter" to Johnson, so her group claims that the old duffer was only misguided and stupid. Sale of the famous "Protocols of the Elders of Zion," which describe with damnable accuracy the techniques employed by God's People for the destruction of our race and civilization, was immediately stopped, so if you want a copy of that unspeakable document, you must now order it from Liberty Bell Publications ($8.00 + postage).

Both groups have plastered on the title of their Truth Seeker the slogan of the French Revolution, Liberté, Égalité, Fraternité.

It is a disagreeable fact that some atheists seem to have derived little intellectual benefit from their atheism. In one of the northern statesMinnesota, perhapsa band of atheists has appealed to the courts to prohibit hotels from keeping copies of the Gideon Bible in their rooms. In their missionary zeal they overlooked two facts.

Hotels are the property of their owners, so far as property still exists in the United States under crypto-Communist rule. The serfs who own them are no longer permitted to decide whom they will admit to their hotel or whom they will employ in it, since Americans seem resolved that all hotels must be slums and must promote equality by providing equal opportunity for disseminating diseases, but the owner is still allowed to decide with what color the walls of his rooms are to be painted and what furniture he will put in them. If he choses to place copies of the Bible or Penthouse in the rooms, he is still permitted to do so without permission from the commissars who now herd the American boobs.

Whether the Gideon Bibles in hotel rooms are ever opened is another mattter. The only use of them that I recall was by a man of scientific attainments with whom I was acquainted many years ago. He would smoke only the black, almost powdery tobacco that was used in good Russian cigarettes in the time of the Czars. He had, of course, to roll his own cigarettes, using a special kind of paper, and one night, when he returned from a bibulous party to his hotel in the early hours, he found that he had lost his packet of papers. Being a resourceful man, he tore pages from the Gideon Bible and found them an acceptable substitute.

An important consideration overlooked by the crusading atheists was pointed out by David McCalden, who has written for Liberty Bell. In a letter to Christian News, he observed that the Bible had probably produced as many atheists as any book ever published. He may have been right.

Several persons have told me that their rejection of all superstition about supernatural beings began with a reading of some part of the Christians' holy book. I do not recall a specific mention of a Gideon Bible in that connection, but some may have opened one in an idle hour.

A gentleman once told me that he, like most Christians, had accepted the religion because it was generally supposed to be a Good Thing and so many people attended churches and professed to believe what they were told by their dervish. Once, having nothing better to do—possibly in an hotel room—he opened at random a Bible that was at hand and read an account of how the tough old Jew god had beaten up a Semitic god named Dagon. Unwilling to believe in the existence of Dagon, the gentleman found that the existence of many rival gods, including Satan, was affirmed in both parts of the "inerrant" collection of tales, and, on investiagtion, he found that the Fathers of the Church, including Augustine, required belief in the existence of "pagan" gods, and that in the Middle Ages disbelief in the existence and power of those gods was deemed a pernicious heresy. His rational powers having been thus stimulated by a chance look at the Bible, he quickly came to the inevitable conclusion that stories about Jack and the Bean Stalk, Jesus and Lazarus, Aladdin and his lamp, Mahomet and Allah, and innumerable similar tales were merely childish fictions that should not impose on a mature and educated man or woman. □

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?

SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful ana-lysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. LIBERALISM: DESTROYER OF WHITE MAN

'WHITE AFRICANS': A BIOLOGICAL FAILURE

BY N.A. HUNT

Many leaders and supporters of the present National Party have long ceased to regard themselves as Europeans but as "White Africans." The more selective ones such as Dr. Anton Rupert, Afrikanerdom's "wonder boy" and multi-millionaire, prefer to regard themselves as "pale skin Africans."

The following article by N.A. Hunt is a salutary reminder to those who have lost, or are in the process of losing, their racial self-respect as White men.—Editor, S.A. Observer.

If any History is written after the disappearance of the White race, it will record that the evolutionary attempt to create a "White African" was a failure.

This is surprising, because central and southern Africa are admirably adapted to the needs of the White. The climate is, on the whole, healthy and temperate. The soil is fertile. The mineral wealth of sub-Saharan Africa is beyond computation.

With flanks secured by the Indian and Atlantic Oceans, and with the immensely important Simonstown Naval Base, southern Africa should have been a bastion of the White race.

Nor can any fault be found with the White stocks which populated southern Africa. These came from the British Isles, Holland and France in the main. The admixture of Semitic and Mediterranean stocks was small.

There never were more than a quarter of a million Rhodesians. Yet such was their energy, ability and determination that even today what they built largely survives, in spite of the massive deterioration which invariably accompanies Black rule.

There were never more than four and a half million Whites in South Africa. In just over three centuries they built a minute victualling post into a second rate world power. South Africa had one of the world's strongest economies. Its currency was one of the strongest and most stable in the world.

An observer looking at South Africa in say 1914, observing the vigour and confidence of its growing White population, its enormous wealth, and its still more enormous potential, could only conclude that the future was bright indeed for both countries and for the race which ruled them.

SAME FATE AWAITS SOUTH AFRICA

The same observer today would have to concede that it is only a matter of a few years before southern Africa could also be finally lost to the Whites.

In what was Rhodesia, the White is a slave in the house which he built for himself. It is as certain as anything can be that the same fate awaits the White South African, under the present National Party government.

It is true that both countries contained large numbers of Blacks. But these were never capable of being a threat to the Whites. The Whites had the brains, the resources, and the weapons to ensure their continued dominance. Yet it is clear that the "White African" could shortly become extinct.

The reason can only lie in the character or the institutions of the White man. It is to these that we must look to discover why one of the most intelligent and resourceful of human stocks, blessed with an ideal climate and unlimited natural resources, could not survive.

So what could have gone wrong? How was it possible that the flower of thew White race, living under ideal conditions, should wither away?

WHITE GROVELING

We know that in Nature all groups are in perpetual conflict; the situation usually expressed as "the survival of the fittest." A species which does not attempt to dominate and to spread ever more widely is doomed by Evolution. A species which seeks to establish and maintain a status quo is probably doomed.

Any species which yields territory and controls is certainly doomed. That this is true is proved by the histories of Rhodesia and South Africa.

Such was, and still is, the power of the White race that there is nothing to stop it from ruling every inch of the planet. Yet we see it thrust ever further back by weaker races, evicted from its outposts, groveling before peoples which the Whites could easily exterminate. The only cause of such a state of affairs must be something in the nature of the beliefs of the Whites.

For instance, Rhodesia held every inch of its territory by the best of all titles, that of conquest. If called upon to pinpoint the beginning of Rhodesia's decline, a historian would probably plump for the date of the introduction of a constitution which guaranteed to the conquered Blacks 50% of the territory owned by the conquering Whites.

The Blacks were in no way a threat to the Whites. Most were well content under White rule—as well they might be. The tiny minority, controlled from outside the country, who were not were completely impotent.

The only reason for this astonishing concession by the all-powerful conquerors to the powerless conquered must be sought in the minds of the Whites. It seems that only the existence of a death-wish among the Whites can explain why the White gave away half their birth-right, and in addition conceded the right of the more numerous Blacks to own property in the area reserved to Whites.

One might have expected that the South Africans would learn from the fate of the Rhodesians. The two countries had close ties; their problems were largely identical. They did not learn.

REASON FOR DECLINE

The decline of the South African White began, and his eventual extinction became certain, when the Nationalist Party established Bantu Homelands. The basic idea—to provide a place for the Blacks to live under their own laws and customs—was undoubtedly sound, an example of wise statesmanship. Unfortunately the Whites felt it necessary to subsidise the Homelands very handily, in particular to provide Health services virtually free.

Although based upon the most generous and laudable of motives, this policy in practise meant that the White would never lack ever larger numbers of Blacks to hate and envy him. A similar policy was followed in Rhodesia, with of course the same effect.

Together with the Bantu Homelands, townships were set up in the White area for the labour attracted by the promise of a better life than the Homelands could offer. This made perfect sense, but only on the condition that at the end of his working life the Black was compelled to leave the White area.

True wisdom, too, would have insisted that every effort be made to include the immensely powerful tribal system into township administration, rather than attempting to make the township governments "democratic."

This is not done. In fact, the history of both Rhodesia and South Africa can be seen as attempts by well-meaning Whites to impose "democracy"—by which was meant universal suffrage—on peoples to whom the concept was meaningless when it was not repugnant.

SELL-OUT OF S.W. AFRICA

South Africa's mental sickness became clear, when she agreed to hand over South West Africa ("Namibia") to what she and the world both knew would be a Communist-dominated terrorist government. We noted above that a race which cedes territory which it could control is doomed. This is certainly true of South Africa.

There was no political, military or economic need for her to hand over S.W.A. A White racial group which will willingly hand over thousands of its own race, including women and children, to Black rule has forfeited its moral right to survive. In Darwinian terms, that is in terms of the unceasing struggle for domination on this planet, the South African White committed suicide.

Yet not even the abject abandonment of S.W.A. satisfied either the political pigmies who now ruled South Africa or the outside world.

The National Party pressed on with negotiations with Black groups intent on destroying White rule. All were more or less Communist-dominated. All were motivated by hatred of the White and envy for his achievements, which they knew they could never equal.

Western political thought dominated the world. The overwhelming power of the West meant that its political concepts of "racial equality" and "democracy" became the norm. Not that these lunatic ideas were ever believed by any but a small, sick section of the West itself.

The rest of the world found it expedient, and even rewarding, to accept this White nonsense at face value. It enriched them by foreign aid, it allowed nasty little African gangsters to lecture their betters and, best of all, it ensured that the White race could never act as its own interests dictated.

MASS CORRUPTION

The concept of "freedom," "self-determination" and "racial equality" suddenly made the coloured races important. Thus we find a petty state like Panama, with a population smaller than that of a medium American city, defying the United States with impunity.

India, probably the largest and most festering example of mass corruption in the world, felt free to deliver moralistic lectures and admonitions to the West. What is more, she was allowed to get away with it.

Perhaps in this abject truckling we have a clue to the reasons behind the Western collapse.

South Africa had a perfectly viable and morally unexceptionable political policy in apartheid. So long as she adhered strictly to its principles all was well. But South Africa tried to marry the irreconcilable ideas of apartheid and "democracy," by which was meant universal suffrage or ochlocracy. They failed, of course. They lost their country too. They also ensured that the world would never see a White African.

HARD TO BELIEVE

It is difficult for us to understand why the Rhodesian and South African Whites acted as they did, and do. They of all peoples had ample daily experience of living and working with the Black. Their experience of the Black covered centuries.

Their very religion instructed them to keep themselves separate.

The two races were wildly different. The White race—not "mankind" but the White race—had put men on the moon. The Blacks had yet to invent the wheelbarrow. In 1961 the British Association for the Advancement of Science noted that "No contribution to the Arts of civilisation has come from Africa, which has produced nothing but destruction and ruinous exploitation of its natural resources."

Rhodesians and South Africans knew these words to be true. Yet they persisted in their attempts to make equal what Nature had made unequal. We see exactly as foretold by Spengler in his Decline of the West, "Quantity replaces quality; spreading replaces deepening".

Rhodesia and South Africa, in spite of their long experience of Africa, staked their political lives on counting heads rather than what was in them. They lost the gamble, and in so doing committed racial suicide.

Evolution abandoned her attempt to create a White African. The urge to survive, to dominate together with the needed ruthlessness were simply no longer to be found in this off-shoot of the Whites.

Exit the "White African". He walked up a biological blind alley, like the gorilla and Australian black-fellow. The White African was an evolutionary failure. He perished.

SICKNESS OF LIBERALISM

With the advantage of hindsight we can see what destroyed the African White. It was the deadly sickness of liberalism, as fatal in Africa as it was in Europe.

The policy of apartheid, which alone could have ensured racial peace, was universally derided. "Social justice" and "democracy", never precisely defined, were held to be essential in Africa.

This was all nonsense, of course. In their hearts the Whites knew it. But the whole of the communications media ceaselessly told them that what they knew to be true was false, and what they knew to be false was true.

His religious leaders betrayed him by their sudden "discovery"—without any proof being given—that apartheid was contrary to the word of God. His political leaders, who were elected to ensure the safety and dominance of the Whites, openly schemed to hand over the country to the Blacks.

PRICE OF WEAKNESS

Of course, not all the Whites were blind to what was happening. The "reform" policy of the National Party certainly lost it some support. This policy was nothing but a carefully planned strategy designed to bring about Black rule.

Yet although its popularity diminished, the bemused electorate continued to return the National Party to power. It was clear that the majority of the Whites lacked the steel and the resolution to act in their own interests and those of nobody else. The price of this weakness will be their extinction.

As long ago as 1917 C.M. Walsh wrote prophetically:

But woe to that people which has not men that will stand up and fight without flinching. Those countries where the moral decay shall have gone deepest, where the proved stock shall have died out and given way to poor stock ..... when the strong and the wise and the shrewd shall gain no more of wealth and power and influence than the weak, silly and incompetent, all being equal,—those will go to the wall. And when this fate shall have overtaken most of our Western White mens' countries, our cycle of civilisation will be completed.

DESTROYED BY 'LIBERALISM'

As a picture of the West since 1945 and of South Africa in particular, this analysis could hardly be more accurate. It is what inevitably happens when "liberalism" replaces sober thought and reflection.

If, when the West has collapsed, any History is written it will certainly not be by a man of the White, Black or Brown races. He may be a Chinese. He will probably be Japanese.

Should he be moved to speculate upon why Evolution failed to create a "White African," and why the West collapsed, it seems probable that this future historian will conlcude that, just as the Blacks were destroyed by AIDS, so the Whites were by "liberalism." □

THE LATE GREAT BOOK:THE BIBLE.

AN ACCOUNT OF CHRISTIAN AND BIBLICAL ORIGINS.

Nicholas Carter feels that it is time for us to sit down and do what many Christians rarely do: Study the Holy Bible. In doing so, we may discover whether or not the Bible is indeed "Holy" and the "Word of God." In strict biblical order, the author methodically, and scathingly, examines the various claims made in the "Holy Book" and shows how many of them bear no relationship to reality whatsoever. BOOK REVIEW

Arno J. Mayer, Why Did the Heavens Not Darken? / The 'Final Solution' in History, New York: Pantheon Books, 1988. xv + 493 pages plus two maps. $27.95.

Mayer is a Jewish professor who teaches at Princeton University. Born in 1926, Mayer fled his native Luxembourg along with his family just ahead of advancing German forces in May 1940. Mayer's other books include The Persistence of the Old Regime: Europe to the Great War, Dynamics of Counterrevolution in Europe, 1870-1956, Politics and Diplomacy of Peacemaking: Containment and Counterrevolution at Versailles, 1918-1919 and Political Origins of the New Diplomacy, 1917-1918.

The title of the book is derived from a lament of Solomon bar Simson (p. 26) on the massacre of Jews in Mainz in May 1096. Some of Mayer's motivations for writing the book are set forth on page 16, where he points out that the "Holocaust" material has become an overly sectarian "cult of remembrance." He then explains his position as an historical scholar: "The embryonic creed of the 'Holocaust,' which has also become an idée-force, has taken the reflective and transparent remembrances of survivors and woven them into a collective prescriptive 'memory' unconducive to critical and contextual thinking about the Jewish calamity. A central premise is that the victimization of the Jews at the hands of Nazi Germany and its collaborators is absolutely unprecedented, completely sui generis, and thus beyond historical reimagining."

Mayer's attempt to put the plight of the Jews in Europe during the Second World War into its historical context and thus to take it out of the isolation that has characterized the approach of a number of Jewish writers, such as Lucy Dawidowicz, has infuriated a number of Jewish critics. Dawidowicz, in fact, characterizes Mayer's efforts as a "very dishonest book" (as quoted in a rather superficial and distorting review in Newsweek of 15 May 1989, pages 64-65.) Mayer states that he is indebted to Raul Hilberg, Hans Mommsen and Pierre Vidal-Naquet for having read over the entire manuscript with the exception of the Prologue. The checking of Mayer's manuscript by these men no doubt constitutes a sort of "nihil obstat" amongst Jewish writers on the Extermination Thesis. Nevertheless, a quite hostile review appeared in the New Republic of 17 April 1989.

concede that sources for the study of the gas chambers are at once rare and unreliable and that most "of what is known is based on the depositions of Nazi officials and executioners of postwar trials...." (p. 362). Mayer must know that many of such depositions were obtained by torture but does not mention that fact. On page 365 Mayer states that "from 1942 to 1945, certainly at Auschwitz, but probably overall, more Jews were killed by so-called 'natural' causes than by 'unnatural' ones."

Mayer even suggests that "excavations at the killing sites and their immediate environs may also bring forth new information" (p. 363). Indeed, such information has been brought forth, to be specific, in the form of the Leuchter Report, which offers very strong evidence against the Extermination Thesis by actual analyses of fragments of buildings with regard to traces of cyanide. (See Bulletin 35, p. 3.) Mayer does not mention the Leuchter Report, nor does he mention the very strong evidence against the Extermination Thesis, already known a decade ago, in the form of the Allied air surveillance photographs taken over Auschwitz at various times during 1944.

On p. 195 Mayer states that after the German occupation of western Poland, Denmark, Norway, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Belgium, and France a "total of about 3.5 million Jews were now under German control." We would thus have to assume that no less than 2.5 million in addition came under German control and that they were all killed in order to arrive at the famous six-million figure, which is thus quite impossible. After the beginning of the German invasion of the USSR a huge number of Jews and other persons were moved by the Soviet government far to the east ahead of the advancing German forces. The approximately 3,000,000 Jews in Israel alone in excess of those there in 1939 are overwhelmingly of European origin or descent. It is significant that Mayer does not mention the six-million figure, which he seems to have tacitly avoided as being too absurd to defend.

In Chapter XII (page 376-408), entitled "The Extermination Sites/Chelmo, Belzec, Sobibór, Treblinka," Mayer gives rather detailed descriptions of these sites, which he characterizes as "out-and-out killing sites." It is revealing to compare Mayer's description with those by Mark Weber in his "Open Letter to the Rev. Mark Herbener" (Journal of Historical Review, VIII, 2, pages 173-184). Mark Weber supports his descriptions by mentioning sources. The following are some of the main aspects of the descriptions by the two authors:

Some of Mayer's terminology is innovative. Instead of the propaganda word Holocaust he employs the more precise Judeocide. For the National Socialist laws restricting Jews in various fields he uses the historically appropriate verb deemancipate with reference to the fact that in Germany and some other parts of Europe the Jews were freed from various restrictions during the course of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, a process generally designated as emancipation. Mayer frequently refers to the 1914-1945 period as the Thirty Years War of the twentieth century with reference to the earlier war of that name (1618-1648). Mayer finds a number of similarities in these periods.

Mayer conceders that during 1938-1940 there was no intention or plan to exterminate the Jews (p. 159) and that "until the fall of 1941 the Nazi drive against the Jews remained indeterminate and erratic" (p. 201). He continues with this vein on p. 348, where he states that the extermination camps "had not been planned by the Nazis from the very first..... To examine the camps apart from the context of the colossal horrors and miseries of war engulfing large parts of the European Continent is to fail to understand the camps, for this context contributed to the environment of rampant general violence in which the Nazis were able to execute the Judeocide."

At this point Mayer could and should have contrasted the interning of Jews in Europe with the interning of persons of Japanese descent in the United States, the latter of which took place almost immediately after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, while the massive internment of Jews did not take place until some 30 months after the Anglo-French declaration of war against Germany. It should not be overlooked that both internings took place largely for real or imagined reasons of security. The German fear of Jewish partisans operating behind thinly manned German lines was a justified one and Mayer recognizes it (p. 380; see also R. Aschenauer, Krieg ohne Grenzen, 1982, pp. 246 ff.).

Mayer claims that Goebbels was the "chief instigator" of Crystal Night in November 1938 (p. 170). Ingrid Weckert, whose important writings on this subject Mayer does not list and perhaps does not even know, presents evidence that Goebbels was shocked at the violence of the pogrom-like action. Moreover, Hitler's office sent out orders to cease the destruction at once soon after it started. (See Bulletin 31, republished in Liberty Bell of January 1989, where Weckert's book, Feuerzeichen, is reviewed.)

Mayer insists on the presence of gas chambers in German concentration camps for the purpose of killing human beings but he must

MAYER

Chelmno (Kulmhof)

First killing site to be set up, 35 miles northwest of Lódz in secluded place. Killing operations begun 8 December 1941. Within 15 months 100,000 Jews killed, over 70,000 of them from the Lódz ghetto. Mayer concedes that "there is little reliable data for Chelmno (p. 392). The installation was apparently dismantled in March 1943. Mobile gas vans used for the killings.

Belzec

Second killing site to be set up, 100 miles southeast of Warsaw. Gassing facilities stationary, employed bottled carbon monoxide and later exhaust fumes from trucks. Dimensions and capacities of gas chambers uncertain. Facilities destroyed in December 1942.

Sobibór

Northeast of Lublin. A variant of Belzec. Large contingent of Dutch Jews were victims there in September 1942.

Treblinka

Located 50 miles Northeast of Warsaw. Started operation 23 July 1942. Three gas chambers in brick structure with Diesel (!) motor to provide fumes. By late August 1942 over 250,000 Jews estimated to have been killed there, largely from Warsaw area, thus something like 10,000 a day.

WEBER

Chelmno (Kulmhof)

"So little is known about Chelmno (or Kulmhof) that it is difficult to effectively refute the charge that it was a mass extermination center." One Jewish source claims that 1,350,000 Jews were killed there but other Jewish sources claim far fewer. Large truck used as a "gas van."

Belzec

Like Sobibór, a a small transit camp near the Polish-Ukrainian border. A secret German memorandum dated 17 March 1942 indicates that Jews were to be permanently deported from Belzec to the Ukraine. The Polish underground courier Jan Karski did not see evidence of gas chambers in 1942 in Belzec.

Sobibór

In the shifting accounts by Jewish historians this camp has been lately accorded greater significance, with claims that between 200,000 and 600,000 Jews were gassed there in 1942-3. On 5 July 1943 Himmler directed that the transit camp was to be turned into a concentration camp with a center for dismantling captured ammunition. Correspondence shows that neither Himmler nor Pohl regarded Sobibór as an extermination center. A Brazilian court refused to convict or extradite the former acting commandant of Sobibór.

Although over a million Jewish victims have been claimed for this camp, it was not a secret camp and its establishment as a labor camp was publicly announced on 2 December 1941. A German document dated 7 July 1942 also refers to Treblinka as a labor camp.

Although Mayer devotes much space to the status of Jews in Hungary, he scarcely mentions the Béla Kun régime in Hungary (p. 85), let alone the horrors and atrocities of this ephemeral régime (1919), which are vividly described in Cécile Tormay's An Outlaw's Diary, the first English edition of which was published in 1923. Certainly, a "specialist in the recent European history," as Mayer calls himself (p. vii), should be well aware of the impact of the Kun régime on European attitudes toward the danger of Communist régimes dominated by Jews. This cursory mention of the Kun régime is typical of the lack of balance in Mayer's presentation of recent European history as related to Jews (pp. 39-89). Perceptive western Europeans were well aware of the preponderant rôle played by Jews in the horrors of Communism. Not just Goebbels in his famous speech of 18 February 1943 ("Wollt Ihr den totalen Krieg?" discussed at length by Mayer, pp. 342 ff.), but also Winston Churchill in his famous article in the London Illustrated Sunday Herald of 8 February 1920 recognized the Jewish nature of Bolshevism. (For information on the collaboration of Wall Street Jews and Bolsheviks, see Anthony Sutton's Wall Street and the Bolshevik Revolution, 1974.)

When Mayer suggests that Heydrich might have been using "coded language" at the Wannsee Conference of 20 January 1942 (p. 304) we must question his logic or at least his knowledge of the putative minutes of this conference, which were, after all, stamped "Geheime Reichssache." With the usual protections of military secrecy there would have been no reason to use "coded language." This document, at least parts of which appear to be spurious for a variety of reasons, makes no mention of a plan to exterminate all the Jews of Europe, let alone details as to how this was to have been done.

Whatever merit Mayer's thesis that the bogging down of Operation Barbarossa caused a desire for revenge against the Jews might have, he fails to mention a number of reasons for the intense hostility toward Jews for which Jews themselves were responsible. The genocidal threat in Kaufman's Germany Must Perish, which recommended the extinguishing of the German nation by sterilization, was taken seriously and publicized widely at the time of its publication in 1941. Then in the fall of 1944 the Morgenthau Plan, with its clear genocidal objectives, became well known in Germany.

Not once does Mayer mention one of the psychological and diplomatic turning points of the war, the discovery of mass graves of Polish officers at Katyn by German intelligence in the spring of 1943, which caused the Polish government in exile to break off diplomatic relations with the USSR and should have been a strong warning even to the United States with regard to what was in store for postwar Europe.

In contrast to works of such revisionist authors as Butz, Stäglich, Sanning, and C. Weber, Mayer's book contains no footnotes, a circumstance which reduces his credibility considerably, both in the eyes of revisionists and authors who represent the "Intentionalist" school of writing in this field. Why this lack of footnotes? To save paper? More likely it was because Mayer used some sources which he might have considered difficult to defend, such as the effectively discredited Kommandant in Auschwitz, putatively by Rudolf Höss. (See R. Faurisson's article in the Journal of Historical Review, VII, 4 and Stäglich's discussions of this work.) Without footnotes we hardly can judge the reliability of Mayer's text—or the lack of it In his extensive bibliography Mayer lists well over 500 works, even including two revisionist classics by A. Butz and P. Rassinier, but of course we cannot be certain what use Mayer made of them, if any. Perhaps they were "token" listings to give the impression that the author had an open mind about revisionist literature or even made use of it.

This book has provoked a good deal of hostile comment from Jewish writers of the "Holocaust" material because it contests some of the main contentions of their all too well publicized and lauded publications. To a quite limited extent, but in some important ways, we might categorize Mayer's book as a revisionist work. □ by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb. $7.00) describes what was done to the young men whom Cornelu Z. Codreanu, the founder of the Legionary Movement in Romania, inspired, when, seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented Pavlovian 'experiment' on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti-Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. Reading it will be an emotional experience you will not forget. ("A sequel to Orwell's 1984"—R.S.H. "A searing exposé of Red bestiality!"—Dr. A.J. App). Order #01013. THE REWRITING OF AMERICAN HISTORY

by

David McCalden

The United States not only rewrites history in history books, it also rewrites inscriptions on public monuments, currency, and slogans.

The most blatant example of this distortion is the Jefferson Monument in Washington, D.C., the nation's capital. The memorial to Thomas Jefferson, the nation's third president, was erected on reclaimed Potomac tidal land in 1942, the 200th anniversary of Jefferson's birth. It is dominated by a 19ft tall statue of Jefferson. But around the circular walls of the temple-like structure are various quotations attributed to him. The most famous reads:

> Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than that these people are to be free. Establish the law for educating the common people. This it is the business of the state to effect and on a general plan.

However, a referral to Jefferson's own biography reveals what he really said about the emancipation of the slaves:

> Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than that these people are to be free. nor is it less certain that the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same government. nations, habit, opinion, has drawn indelible lines of distinction between them. it is still in our power to direct the process of emancipation and deportation...

Many other slogans around the walls of the monument quote Jefferson's reference to "God", giving the impression that he was a Christian. In fact, Jefferson, like many of the Founding Fathers, was a Deist. In other words, he believed that there had at some time been a supernatural Creator, but that since that Creation, the Creator had taken a back seat and refrained from any divine intervention by way of miracles, messiahs, apparitions, or whatever. Thus, the Declaration of Independence (which was written by a committee chaired by Thomas Jefferson) contained deistic, non-Christian, terms such as "Nature and Nature's God" and "Divine Providence." And, by the time the United States Constitution was written a whole decade later, Jefferson and the other Founding Fathers had turned even further away from theocratic tendencies. The U.S. Constitution closely followed Jefferson's "Virginia Act for Establishing Religious Freedom", and Article VI stated quite emphatically that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification" for public office. Jefferson himself wrote:

> I have recently been examining all our known superstitions of the world, and I do not find in our particular superstition (Christianity) one redeeming feature. They are all alike founded upon fables and mythologies. The Christian God is a being of terrific character—cruel, vindictive, capricious, and unjust.

Jefferson later became so disgusted with Christianity that he rewrote the Christian Bible. By using the "scissors-and-past" process, he cut out all the ugly and illogical sequences, and retained the humane aspects. He named his "wee little book" The Philosophy of Jesus Christ, and it is still available in reprint as Thomas Jefferson's Bible (available from Liberty Lovers Library, P.O. Box 3, Otter Rock, OR 97369, U.S.A.)

Thomas Jefferson's monument, therefore, is a lie. Contrary to the impression given by the Roosevelt-era inscription, he was most certainly not in favor of negroes being granted American citizenship—in fact, he wanted them deported, and he was most certainly not in favor of Christianity—in fact, he wanted strict separation of Church and State, and a radical re-writing of the Holy Bible.

The president who actually freed the salves, Abraham Lincoln, shared Jefferson's views on repatriation to Africa. Shortly before his presidency, he was engaged in a public debate with a Senator Douglas, who endorsed the deportation policy. Lincoln had this to say in agreement:

> I will say then that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races—that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of Negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to inter-marry with white people; and I will say in addition that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality.
> Such separation if effected at all, must be effected by colonization incidentally...what colonization most needs is a hearty will...Let us be brought to believe that it is morally right, and at the same time favorable to, or at least not against, our interests to transfer the African to his native clime, and we shall find a way to do it, however great the task may be.

And so it was that as President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln proclaimed:

> I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy thereof, do hereby proclaim and declare that...it is my purpose upon the next meeting of Congress to again recommend...the immediate or gradual abolishment of Slavery...and that the effort to colonize persons of African descent, with their consent, upon the continent or elsewhere, with the previously obtained consent of the government existing there, will be continued; that on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1863, all persons held as Slaves within any State, or any designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward and forever free.

Two years later, Lincoln was cut down by an assassin's bullet. A few months later, slavery was officially outlawed by the U.S. Constitution's addition of a 13th amendment. However, Lincoln's original plans for repatriation were quietly and quickly abandoned.

The very first President, George Washington, has also been hijacked by unscrupulous Christians. In St. Paul's chapel of Trinity Church in New York City, there is displayed a plaque purporting to bear the inscription of a "prayer to God" regularly raptured up to Heaven from George Washington's adjacent pew number 60. In fact, the "prayer" is lifted and extensively amended, from a circular letter sent by George Washington to the governors of the 13 American colonies. In 1935 a group of atheists sued the Trinity Church for consumer fraud. During the suit the church dignitaries admitted the fakery, but claimed that it was justified in the context of "a place of religious worship." sic, sic and sic again!

The Statue of Liberty on Liberty Island (formerly Bedloes Island) in New York Harbor is also a deception. Most people think that the statue represents unlimited, free immigration to the United States. Their confusion originates from (a) the close proximity of the (now abandoned) immigration entry station of Ellis Island in the same harbor, (b) the existence of an immigration museum in the basement of the statue, and (c) the addition of a plaque bearing a pro-immigration poem written by one Emma Lazarus.

The poem reads in part:

> Give me your tired, your poor
> Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free
> The wretched refuse of your teeming shore.
> Send these, the homeless, tempest-tossed to me,
> I lift my lamp beside the golden door.

In fact, the Statue of Liberty has nothing whatsoever to do with immigration, free or regulated. It was a gift in recognition of French-American friendship, and a miniature version stands on the banks of the Seine river in Paris. The statue was manufactured in France in 1884, and shipped to the U.S. in 214 packing cases. It was erected on a plinth which had previously been the foundations of a fort, and was unveiled in 1886. Ms. Lazarus' poem was not added until 1903—almost twenty years later. Many commentators indicate that Ms. Lazarus later abandoned her support for free immigration, when she witnessed the severe social problems which it caused.

The Pledge of Allegiance to the flag of the United States did not have its origins in revolutionary times. It was originally published in a Beano-type magazine, the 8 September 1892 issue of the Youth's Companion. The extra two words "under God" were only added at the height of the Red scare in 1957.

The theocratic slogan "In God We Trust" was likewise not a part of the Founding Fathers' plans. It was added to large coins (where space permitted) in 1864, and to all currency in 1955—again at the height of the McCarthy era. The following year, the American National Motto "E Pluribus Unum" was abandoned in favor of the sectarian, and by now ubiquitous, "In God We Trust."

Thus, many Americans are under the mistaken impression that Victorian-era jingoism and McCarthy-era righteousness were somehow part of the Founding Fathers' blueprint.

Christians and theocrats have not been alone in tinkering with the American currency. Several years ago, the Department of Printing and Engraving noted the declining purchasing power of the dollar, and the popularity of a $2 bill north of the border in Canada. A U.S. $2 bill was introduced into circulation. However, on the reverse side of the bill is a reproduction of a canvass which hangs in the main lobby of the Capitol building in Washington, D.C. It portrays the signing of the Declaration of Independence. On the bill, a signer at the extreme right of the picture appears to be a negro. But the color painting in the Capitol shows the man correctly as Caucasian. This has not stopped desperate negro leaders from promoting the $2 bill as some kind of symbol for their ethnic cause.

Nowadays, limousine Liberals, effeminate clerics, and unscrupulous historians, are fond of hi-jacking everybody who was anybody in American history, and making them into patron saints of liberalism. Often the most flagrant deceptions and plain re-writings of history takes place. There is not space here to go into this Big Brother activity—it would take a book; actually several books, to list the accurate quotations of historical figures which belie these latter-day claims of congenital liberalism.

One book which contradicts the supposed historical support for Zionism, for example, is The Jew in Review [prepared by Zuhdi Al-Fatih, and originally published in November 1972 under the title The Jews] (re-published in 1977 by, and available from, Liberty Bell Publications, Order #10008, $8.00 + $1.50 postage & handling). I am myself currently working on a book provisionally entitled Great Racists of Our Time, which will profile great western thinkers, such as Margaret Sanger, Charles Darwin, and Thomas Jefferson, whose ideas of racial inequality have been perverted and reversed by the machinations of unscrupulous liberal fetishists.

Most Americans believe in democracy and self-determination; at least where their own country is concerned. There have only been a couple of wars fought by America where American soil was at stake: the Revolutionary War of 1776, the Revolutionary War Part 2 of 1812, and the Texan Wars of Independence from Mexico, fought in 1836 and 1846. During both wars, there were substantial minorities whose loyalty was to the losing side. If the tides of war had been different, and the vanquished had been the victors, then everything would have been reversed. The American revolutionaries and the Texas rebels would have been hanged or shot as traitors.

Since America stabilized in the late 19th century, and her territory became homogeneous, there have been more wars, not less. None of these involved foreign invasions of American soil, nor even the threat of such. Every single war involved the American government intervening in foreign nations. A list follows, together with the "beneficial" results:

Date	War	Result
1898-1899	Spanish-American War	Millions of non-Whites inGuam, Puerto Rico, the Philippines come under American government, and can later claim U.S. immigration privileges.

America joined in the major wars in this list due to deception, and jiggery-pokery on the part of the U.S. government.

The Spanish American War broke out in 1898 after an American ship, the USS Maine blew up in Havana harbor, leaving 260 dead. The American government "assumed" that a Spanish bomb had been responsible, and declared war against Spain on several fronts, resulting in the virtual annexation of large chunks of territory. Subsequent investigations have shown that an accidental coal dust explosion was the more likely cause of the destruction.

The First World War had been waged for three years in Europe before America stepped in. The ostensible reason was that the Germans had killed 128 American passengers on board the SS Lusitania. This British ship was carrying munitions, as well as passengers, to the European front, from New York. The Germans had placed advertisements in the New York newspapers advising neutral Americans not to travel on such a ship. However, the ship was sunk by a U-boat when it tried to cross the German blockade into the war zone. Germany offered to pay monetary compensation to the bereaved families, and issued an official apology. British "dirty tricks" operatives replied with a faked German "Lusitania celebration medal." The true reason for U.S. entry into the war was that American Zionists had successfully negotiated a deal whereby Britain would be rescued (from military stalemate or defeat) by American intervention, on condition that Britain should issue a declaration of support for Zionism. This "Balfour Declaration" was duly issued, and America promptly came in on the Allied side. [See, Origins of the Balfour Declaration, available from Liberty Bell Publications; Order #15006, $3.00 + $1.50 for postage & handling.]

The Second World War had likewise been waged for three years before America joined the fray. Again, a trick was used to bamboozle a neutralist, non-interventionist American public. Once again, the same old "American ships attacked" formula was wheeled out and dusted off. During the years 1939-1941, America had been aiding and abetting the British war effort to a greater and greater extent, most of it kept secret from the American public. Then, Roosevelt declared an embargo of materiel against Japan, and a threat that if British or Dutch possessions in the East Indies were invaded, America would react militarily. Both actions were threats of war. Japan decided to stage a pre-emptive strike, and Washington obliged by conveniently placing the Pacific Fleet as a sitting duck at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. Roosevelt's staff knew three days in advance that the Japanese attack was coming, but held the information back from Hawaii so that a maximum number of American servicemen would be offered up as sacrificial lambs. Knowing that Hitler was a loyal ally of Japan, Roosevelt correctly anticipated that he would inevitably declare war against America. By contrast, America's ally, the Soviet Union, did not declare war against Japan until the war was almost over—the Soviets wanted to fight a one-front war only.

The real reason for American entry into the war had nothing whatsoever to do with Japan. Roosevelt was itching for a fight with Hitler simply because Roosevelt's Jewish advisers and supporters had a score to settle. As with the First World War, the Zionist cause was enhanced and within a few years of the war's end, a state of Israel had been superimposed onto the understandably reluctant Palestinians' land. □

by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb.) describes what was done to the young men whom Corneliu Z. Codreanu, the founder of the Leagionary Movement in Romania, inspired, when seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented Pavlovian experiment on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Mr. Dietz,

I write to thank you in general for the issues of Liberty Bell which you so kindly continue to send me regularly, and which are not only always read with great interest by myself and made much use of for information there contained, but often passed on to others who similarly appreciate seeing them.

In particular I write to thank you for, and to express my admiration for the superb Adolf Hitler centenary issue (April 1989) which is indeed something to treasure permanently as a magnificent commemoration.

It was of course an additional personal pleasure to discover that you had found my old article "National Socialism: A Philosophical Appraisal" worthy of inclusion in this monumental issue.

If, without seeming to detract in the slightest, I can just draw attention to a printing error in the reproduction of that article so as perhaps to prevent a repetition in the future, this occurs in the second paragraph of the article proper, namely on page 124 of the centenary issue, immediately after "his instinct for health and strength," where we have:

"his desire to remain on this earth, the creed of National Socialism will remain indestructible."

The passage should instead read:

"and his desire for beauty in life; and, as long as that will, that instinct, and that desire remain on this earth, the creed of National Socialism will remain indestructible."

The passage in question did appear correctly in the reproduction of the entire issue of National Socialist World Number 1, which was the original home of the article, which White Power Publications produced some time ago.

It was kind of you to preface the reproduction in the centenary issue with the too complimentary remarks concerning myself, and the wording of one of my centenary stickers. My very best wishes to you.

Dear Editor,

As a Revisionist, I have the utmost respect, and further, a debt, to Mr. David McCalden, for his role in the IHR. As an Irishman, however, I take exception to his article that appeared in the July Liberty Bell. In the spirit of historical accuracy, therefore, I challenge the bulk of his article.

Yes, indeed, the men of the six counties of Northern Ireland are Freemasons, mostly Presbyterians, and, in fact, Scottish Rite Freemasons, the organization subscribed to by all of British Royalty, except Randy Andy (Bonnie Prince Andrew). It was this nest of troublemakers that were the target of Hitler, along with the Jews. Hitler closed the temples of both organizations, if you will recall.

As far as the Norman conquerors melding into the populaces of both Ireland and Britain, keep in mind that the Normans (Noth Men, literally) and the Irish were basically of the same race, but by the time they invaded Britain, the British population had been mongrelized by the Roman Army, which consisted of mercenaries from all over, including Turks, Greeks, Asians, Africans, etc. Except for a small band of gallant Picts in the isolated regions of Northland Scotia (Scotland). These men were too ferocious to be subdued. Similarly, Hibernia (Ireland) escaped this mongrelization and, indeed, welcomed the Normans, which they called "The Happy Invasion."

As to the development and makeup of the Ulster Plantation (then called "Coleraine"), it all started with a bit of history known as "The flight of the Earles," in this case Earle O'Donnel, and Earl O'Neil. These men were in charge of what was to become known as "the Ulster Plantation." The time period was 1606-1607 and the Earles were there in accordance with a treaty with Queen Elizabeth, who, unfortunately, died a maniac, as so many of England's Royalty does. (All that proper breeding, you know.)

The mad Queen was succeeded by James the 6th of Scotland, who was later to become James I of England. James was a greedy king, and he had plans to plant Ulster with British and Scottish settlers, but the two Earles were in the way. It was necessary to destroy them. The method was as old as Freemasonry itself. They were to charged in a plot. An anonymous letter found by the Council Chamber of Dublin castle revealed the plot. According to the details, O'Neil was to seize the castle and start another rebellion.

Of course, the letter really emanated from London. It was devised by Cecil, Secretary of State. Lord Howth was to carry out the plot, and to inveigle O'Neil and O'Donnell to a meeting in his house. It was sufficient. They were cited to appear in London to answer the charge. With perfect knowledge of the English government's craft, and aware that the planters were waiting to fall upon O'Donnell and O'Neil and that their destruction had been decided upon, flight was the only alternative.

The true owners, the Irish, were driven from their land by the British, much in the same manner in which the Jews drove the Palestinians from their land. The English and Scottish undertakers, and servitors of the Crown scrambled for the ground, like the Jews, which was handed out in parcels of up to 2,000 acres. Coleraine (Derry) was divided up among the London Trade Guilds, the drapers, fishmongers, vintners, haberdashers, etc. who had financed the Plantation scheme. And thus an ugly blot was planted on the fair face of Ireland, in its proudest quarter.

As to the character of the Planters, Reid, in his History of the Irish Presbyterians notes, "Among those whom divine Providence did send to Ireland, the most part were such as either poverty or scandalous lives had forced hither." Master Stewart, son of a Presbyterian minister who was one of the Planters writes: "From Scotland came many, and from England, not a few, yet all of them generally the scum of both nations, who from debt, or breaking, or fleeing justice, or seeking shelter, came hither hoping to be without fear of man's justice." An Irishman of that time, looking over the verdant valleys of the Plantation from his rocky perch, must have been wondering the same thing todays' Palestinian is wondering.

McCalden does not mention, i.e., give credit to, an ultra-nationalist organization of the last century, "The United Irishmen," a Protestant organization devoted to making a Republic of the Four Provinces. It was founded by John Mitchel, and its membership was full of men like Wolfe Tone, Samuel Neilson, Napper Tandy, Padraic Pearse, Thomas Emmet, etc. Their Republic voice was so strong that the Orange Order had to be established to save the Plantation. Again, Freemasonry saved the day for the Crown. The United Irishmen were supplanted by what is today "Sinn Fein," i.e., "one alone."

Next is the matter of terrorism. Now, I will admit it has been a while, perhaps seven years, but the last time I gathered statistics, these where the figures: British soldiers killed by IRA soldiers—571; IRA soldiers killed by British soldiers—79. Now, rattling those numbers around in my thick Irish head, with its wee pee brain, I come up with a kill ration of better than 7:1 over the Englishmen, touted by the Crown to be the finest soldiers in the world.

Other statistics: Security forces killed by Loyalists—13; Civilian victims of Loyalist explosions—111; Crossfire accidents caused by UDF and UV—10; Innocent people killed by Security Forces—116; Assassinations by UDA and UDF—496; Loyalists fighting Security Forces—13; Loyalists killed by their own bombs—25; People killed by Loyalists in early riots—44; total 818 (Figures as of 28 October 1981).

Respectability is a matter of success. Nothing could illustrate this more than the bad name of the IRA today, which is loosing, compared to the IRA of 80 years ago, when they were winners. Eamon de Valera, the leader, was appointed First President of the League of Nations. Give the Palestinians arms and support, and they will beat the Jews. Give the IRA guns and support, and they will beat the Brits.

Now, concerning McCalden's charge the Irish are not "industrious" and the Scots are, consider a few things. Scotland became a vassal of Muthah England, and, as such had at her disposal the iron and coal mines of England and Wales. With this, the Scots were able to partake in the "Industrial Revolution" of late last century. Ireland was a land bereft of these essentials. What forests she had were razed by Cromwell, because the provided cover for the rebels. Ireland's ports were destroyed, in order that the Irish rebels could not be supplied.

What was left? the fine Irish minds did indeed turn to writing (some of the finest invective the English language has ever seen), science, medicine, politics, etc., as McCalden noted. What McCalden failed to note is how the Irish, when starved out of their own country by the Brits and arrived in the USA, did extremely well in this new industrial environment. Henry Ford was a Corkonian. Holland gave us the submarine, and, in general, the Irishman was not behind the wall in an industrial atmosphere.

We also showed our mettle as fighting men, earning more Medals of Honor than any other ethnic group, albeit regrettably to save Muthah England from the Kaiser and der Führer. As far as being active against the Jews, there is Father Coughlin, Henry Ford, Ted O'Keefe of the IHR, John Mahoney of Link, and I must add with all lack of modesty

Dear Mr. Dietz,

I have just finished David McCalden's article "The Struggle for Ulster," and I am appalled and disgusted.

The Irish Tragedy is a White civil war which is taking place across the ocean in a foreign land which few of us truly know and understand and which is rooted in an ugly past.

Regardless of the merits or the truth of McCalden's thesis, the fact remains that the Irish Tragedy is extraordinarily divisive and completely irrelevant to the Revolution.

Regardless of whatever worthy role McCalden has played in the past in the Revolutionary Movement, his authorship of that article is a counter-revolutionary act which plays directly into the hands of our enemies.

Regardless of whatever past role the Liberty Bell has played in the growth and nurturing of the Revolution, the decision to print that article and thereby inflame divisive and sectarian emotions was a counter-revolutionary act which plays directly into the hands of our enemies.Ulster is not our struggle. The Revolution is!

Long live the Revolution!

Dear George,

I admire you for your courage and stamina to keep up the fight for survival of our Aryan race, now living aimlessly to be the prey of its enemies. I salute you and your family. I hope you can keep up and also hope that you are heard.

Dear George,

The clipping with my monthly donation should be of interest to you. It's typical liberal/Jew cartoon humor. Comparing the greatest White Man who ever lived with Stalin and the Mongol subhuman Deng who currently rules Red China is typical of the lying sheenies of the press. Of course, we know that had Adolf Hitler been successful, there would have been no more Communism and no more Stalin, and if the Japanese had been victorious in the Far East, Chinese Communism would have been smashed, too! Ah what might have been! Yet, the goal is still obtainable, therefore we must fight on no matter how hopeless it seems. My cousin's 3-year-old daughter is the reason I fight on; she's a blond-haired little love and I don't want her to grow up in the world I knew—arrogant Jew media masters and culture smashers, ape-like niggers running the streets, and biological scum elevated to "celebrity status." My parents were of the WW II generation and did nothing to save our country (happily, I can report their apathy ended about 20 years ago, and they basically share our views, especially my Dad, my mom is a bit hung-up on the Christian crap, however). The future belongs to us!

Sincerely,
M.R., New Jersey

Dear Liberty Bell,

I NEED HELP!

I am pursuaded that "Holocaust" IS religion and has therefore no place on public property and memorials, no right to tax money, no place in public schools, and absolutely should not be forced upon our service men and women, nor be promoted by the Department of Defense as by "Days of Remembrance" publication.

I submit that in that aforementioned publication it is clearly state to be religious in its observance and the program made a part of chaplain's activity. What more clear proof is needed? Hoaxacaust has been preached from "Christian" pulpits, written into Sunday School quarterlies, and taught in Synagogues. Further marks of religion include that non-believers have been persecuted as in the case of Ernst Zündel, to name but one.

Certainly, the counter arguments against throwing the Diary of Anne Frank out of schools will include the claim that "Holocaust is historical fact." The counter question then is, "Is that to claim that the lives and works of Jesus Christ and Mohammed are not historical facts? I have stated the question to many groups but though they all seem to agree, but none have the guts to file suit, and I am no lawyer. I would be glad to lend my name as a plaintiff and I believe there would be no shortage of others eager to sign in a class-action of this sort.

Somewhere out there, there must be a lawyer or two who might expect to benefit from the publicity attached to such a suit. Any organization willing to press it would surely make news.

I am so desperate to get that suit filed that I would even contact some atheist organization if only I had an address of one. Please advise as to whether you think I am nuts or if you know of any way I should go.

Yours truly,
Gordon S. Clark, Rte. 2, Box 2560, Eastland TX 76448

Dear George,

...Thank you for the 100th Anniversary issue of AH's birthday. I wanted some appropriate keepsake for the occasion and your tribute I'll treasure forever. Thank you.

Heil Hitler!
E.R., California

PS: I was impressed enough with the March Up Country by Harold Covington to lend him small support. I've felt queasy about his Joshua 1:6 sign-off on his letterheads, and recently Ben Klassen has contacted telling me that Covington is now in "Identity." I've decided to drop support for him and I'd like to know if you think it's the right thing to do. You and your publication I respect in these dirty little matters. [We do not endorse nor condemn either Ben Klassen's or Harold Covington's organization. However, we do have our own opinion based on mature judgement of what "you (they) do, not what you (they) say." Of course we were taken aback too when Harold Covington came out with his, in our opinion, obnoxious "Joshua 1:6" sign-off. When questioned on this point, HC supplied a somewhat satisfactory answer. As we find fault with HC on this particular point, so could we find fault with several points of Ben Klassen's program. Do a little thinking, and you'll come up with the right decision as to whom you should or should not support. —Editor]

Dear George,

Today I had an experience I would like to share with you. While driving my Mercedes down the road, I observed a carload of 6 to 8 talking apes that were gyrating reflexively within their vehicle, as is their habit. The monkoids were making rude remarks to a German girl of no more than 12, who, exercising the good judgment so sadly lacking in many of her race, was preparing to run. By good fortune, the Congoids continued on their way when the traffic light changed.

The critical question in this incident is: what could one unarmed man have done in the event these featherless bipeds had not continued driving, and instead tried to satisfy their natural drives? The answer: not much. The lesson, as I see it, is to consider arming oneself against these sub-humans, who can strike at any time.

Of course, I do not advocate the "Death Wish" scenario, as that could risk violating the rights of rapists, murderers, and other sub-bestial creatures who have a Yahweh-given right to prey upon us.

The best armament against 6-8 targets is a 9mm automatic, which can hold 14-16 rounds, and for which even larger magazines are available. Hollow point ammunition is as effective as the larger .45 cal bullet, weapons for which hold only 6-8 rounds. Think of what one properly equipped comrade could have accomplished at the recently publicized attacks in New York City!

None of my weapons are illegally modified or kept at this time, and I advise others to do likewise. Some evidence against the Order was gathered because one member consistently scared his neighbors with an illegal machine-gun.

I guess I've let off enough steam for now. Please use the enclosed cheque to renew my subscription and continue to publish your outstanding material.

Yours for the Revolution,
F.G., Lt., US Army, Europe

Dear Mr. Dietz,

...I just finished reading a book entitled Talked to Death, by Stephen Singular. It's about the assassination of Alan Berg and the "Order's" successes, failures, and outright stupidity. Might be interesting for someone with literary talent and writing ability to do a book review on Talked to Death for Liberty Bell.

Respectfully,
V.G., Michigan

Enclosed find my personal check, please forward 3 copies of Liberty Bell's "The Adolf Hitler 100th Birthday Anniversary Issue... That edition should be in the hands of every young U.S. citizen, and it will be in the hands of my two sons, one of which is in private family practice in WV.

Although every chapter is significant, the chapter entitled "Under the Swastika: Germany Serves Notice" is priceless. When I think back to the Jewish propaganda we swallowed just prior to the U.S. being maneuvered into WW II, it makes me sick at the stomach. Gentiles against Gentiles resulted with the Jews being the benefactors in both nations. Of course, Hitler was right in his "blood and soil" issue; both of which we are having taken away from us in this country.

Again, congratulations on your excellent April 20th issue. It is unfortunate that even the German Nationals who came to this country as war brides, etc., following WW II cannot be enticed into the struggle "For Fear of the Jews!"

With warmest personal regards and appreciation of the work you are doing, I remain,

Fraternally,
H.W., M.D., Maryland

Dear Mr. Dietz,

Your April Liberty Bell was very, very good. You answered a few questions I had been asking for some time—why did the Jews hate Germans so much? The only answer I could get was the money question. I found answers in pages, 48, 50 and 54.

Dear Landsmann,

The Spotlight performed a public service a while ago and published the oath of the Stern Gang which [the present Israeli Prime Minister] Shamir swore to as "Director of Operations" (murder) for the gang. The two most interesting parts of it were these:

1. The Zionist terrorists swore to establish "a King" of the Jews in Israel.

2. They swore to rebuild the Jewish Temple on the site of the Al Ashka Mosque in Jerusalem.

At about the same time the New York Times published a news story about a Jewish foundation which is preparing for reinstitution of the temple. In the story a number of details are given about the temple.

1. The temple mount is the traditional site of the scene between Abraham and Isaac, recorded in the Bible, where the Jews' God orders Isaac to be sacrificed as a burnt offering, but then relents and allows "an animal" (a goat, in this case) to be sacrificed in place of a Jew. This is very instructive since we goyim are "animals" under Jewish religious law.

2. About a third of the commandments given to Jews in the Bible and Talmud deal with the temple and the service thereof.

3. The foundation is preparing the vestments and furnishings for when the temple is restored. Specifically mentioned are the ritual slaughtering knives.

4. The article, and Jewish tradition, make it clear that whichever Jewish leader rebuilds the temple will be hailed as the Messiah by religious Jews everywhere.

Jewish tradition makes it abundantly clear that the Messiah is to be the King of the world and is to rule the kingdoms of the Earth for the benefit of the Holy race from Jerusalem.

It may well be that Shamir has ambitions of filling this job. This should be very interesting to Christians since the New Testament clearly predicts that the "anti-Christ" will rule the world from Jerusalem and that this will be the signal for the end of the world. It was partly fear of just such a thing that led Christian mobs to prevent the Jews' rebuilding the temple in the time of Emperor Julian.

Another interesting bit of data was revealed in the June issue of Soldier of Fortune magazine. A previous issue had carried an article by a Jew (judging by the name of the writer) trying to white-wash the deliberate Jewish attack on the Liberty. I wrote an indignant letter in answer to this article and so did many others. This case has achieved a following of people determined to find out the truth comparable to that of the Kennedy assassination.

One of the letters revealed a bit of data that puts new light on the whole affair. According to the letter, the Liberty was acting as a data link for a U-2 flying over the Sinai trying to Locate the nuclear warheads Moshe Dyan had personally ordered deployed. Dyan also personally ordered the destruction of the Liberty with all hands and ordered an attack on the U-2 as well. A Jewish jet fighter did attack and fired a missile at the U-2 but it escaped. Apparently the entire incident was the Jews showing the U.S. who was the master.

It is now becoming clear that the great Mid-East war was supposed to be launched over a year ago, as I had anticipated. It has been delayed mainly because of confirmation of the data the Pollards leaked to Israel concerning the Arab rocket and gas warfare capability. This has deterred the Jews' war up to now and was also what forced Iran to make peace last year. Since then the Jews have repeatedly threatened to use their A-bombs if the Arabs dared to use their gas. So far, it is a stand-off, but the Jews are desperate.

They know time is against them as the Arabs are growing more powerful every day and Israels' relative power is declining. The installation of Bush (which should have occurred in 1980) as president has allowed Henry Kissinger to take over U.S. foreign policy again and a new oil war on the lines of 1973 and 1979 is clearly in the works.

R.S., New York State

Dear Mr. Dietz,

Enclosed are a few more $$ for your printing press; I hope the other folks haven't forgotten about you, as I notice no new fund listing in your latest mailings to remind us [We have just grown tired of constantly begging for money! The last appeal was a flop; the monies that did come in were barely enough to maintain our present equipment and make some urgently needed repairs. To make matters worse, our regular contributions have shrunk to approximately 60% of what they have been in previous years. So, we'll hang in there as long as we can, and if things don't improve financially, we'll just go back and try to rebuild our (presently, for all practical purposes defunct) real estate business and earn some money and live a "normal" life again. We consider ourselves educators, not propagandists. Maybe that is the reason we don't seem to have what it takes to make our own people sacrifice some of their income for their cause?].

I imagine if you were to ask for money too often, you'd end up sounding like a TV preacher ("Send 12 million today or I'm gonna die!") or like Harold Covington crying for more money constantly. Speaking of Harold and company, I received a disturbing bit of info about a month ago; it seems Harold & Co. are planning to sue Klassen & Co. (The Church of the Creator) for libel in the courts. Not only that, but one of Harold's buddies in the CNC [Confederate National Congress] walked off with his mailing list and gave it to Klassen, so where else did that list wind up?

If there are any unforgivable sins in this business, I'd have to say that infighting among pro-White groups and giving out your mailing list are two of my choices. Two ants fighting over (at the present) a largely non-existent anthill makes me think of words like absurd or maybe lunacy. Let's be honest, I don't know if Harold is a CIA spy as Klassen contends; does it make any difference right now? [If we had been accused by someone of being a CIA agent, and that someone would then top things off by regurgitating over a nation-wide, if not world-wide, mailing list, old garbage that was originally put out by none other than the "Paper You Can Trust"—The Spotlight—our "Dutch" tempers most likely would have flared up, too. It is our considerate opinion that trying to gain members for your "anthill" by spreading smears, lies and innuendoes, and falsely attributing quotes to third parties, is not in the best interest of OUR cause! As for H.C. being a CIA agent—well, we don't think so, but we do not KNOW. Nor do we think that Ben Klassen is a CIA agent, but again, we do not KNOW!]

His book, The March Up Country, has some excellent parts in it; whether you want to follow his 4 Steps to ZOG overhaul is debatable, of course. However, his most recent effort, the CNC and his provoking the COTC, then threatening to sue comes across as rather idiotic, obviously he lacks necessary character.

I know nothing about Klassen and his right-hand man Will Williams. I do notice that Klassen, Hand (the Odinist) and Covington no longer write articles in Liberty Bell; is this any kind of yardstick assessment?

Without repeating anything I'd say, comprehending Dr. Oliver's "On Tactful Tactics" [see Liberty Bell for March 1989, or send SASE for a copy of the reprint] Might do these "feuding anthillers" some good.

From what I have seen, I'd say Klassen's COTC has much more merit than Harold's CNC ever could (what did Harold plan on doing with us whites outside his "New Confederacy"? Give us all his trash?) However, I don't plan on joining Klassen's crowd either; giving out memberships to hang on the wall, among other things, doesn't strike me as brilliant. Face it, organizations larger than a handful these days are dangerous and someone you haven't known for a long, long time could be a rat, or unstable. Reading Talked to Death, the book about The Order and the shooting of Alan Berg, highlights that fact.

I did note that Klassen is having some luck recruiting Skinheads. that is a group that needs to get past the emotional stage ("I hate Yids & Jigs, but I don't know why; Rah Rah whee, kick 'em in the knee") After watching the Skinhead "leader," Mr. M. Palash get demolished by a few Yids On TV, makes you wonder. David Duke is a much better example of how to come across on TV, even folks not sympathetic to our cause admit he does have "a point," whereas Palash only gets the "geeeeese, what a bumbling bigot."

Hopefully, common sense will prevail down in North Carolina and Harold will float away without causing too much damage.

Respectfully,
V.G., Michigan

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigous academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

GOD-FEARING ATHEISTS

In the August issue, I remarked on the very odd circumstance that the two rival groups that claim to be legitimate heirs of the defunct Truth Seeker, although they are reciprocally antagonistic and bitterly berate each other, agree, with almost perfect unanimity, in denouncing Charles Smith and James Hervey Johnson, the last editors and proprietors of the periodical they profess to be continuing.

Both groups claim to be atheists, but they concur in anathematizing Smith and Johnson for having blasphemed against the Holy Race that was specially created to rule the world by old Yahweh (alias 'God'), from whom all blessings flow (both cash and credit).

Both sets of atheists likewise assume that some supernatural power, probably old Yahweh, stopped the biological evolution of anthropoids fifty or a hundred thousand years ago to make certain that all species of the genus Hominidae (except Yahweh's infinitely superior race) would be perfectly equal.

Since the passionate antagonists share this common faith, it is not remarkable that both groups have plastered on the title of their Truth Seekers the slogan of the French Revolution, Liberté, Égalité, Fraternité.

That is, however, a strange choice for professed atheists, even apart from their belief in a god who stopped biological evolution to produce the égalité. There were a few atheists–Hébert, Chaumette, and others–among the promoters of the Revolution, but the bloodthirsty madman who instituted the Reign of Terror, Robespierre, decreed that atheism was "aristocratic" and had their heads amputated so that he could make the national religion his version of deism, which he instituted with his famous Fête de l'Être Suprême. Robespierre intended to make his religion the only one tolerated in France, since he saw that Égalité depended on a crushing uniformity, just as he planned to decree that social differences shown by clothing must be eliminated by forcing everyone in France to wear only a kind of uniform that was like the shoddy blue garments that a more successful reformer, Mao Tse-tung, did force on the serfs in his "Empire of the Blue Ants."

It is really grotesque to see professed atheists flaunting the obscene slogan of the French Revolution. Lamartine, who was the head of the provisional government that took power after the overthrow of Louis Philippe in 1848, was inspired by the "ideals" of the French Revolution, which he correctly described as "the fulfillment of Christianity." He, unlike so many, was not deceived by the anticlerical animus of the revolutionaries, which was really no more drastic than Calvin's, or their demolition of the established churches, which were then rightly regarded as obstacles to the Revolution, nor yet by their paraded deism. He saw that the ideology of the Revolution, taken as a whole, was simply an attempt to realize the revolutionary doctrine of primitive Christianity, with its open revolt against culture and learning, against property, against nature, and against reason. (Old Jesus, remember, promised to "make folly the wisdom of this world.") But now we have professed atheists, who pretend to repudiate Christianity, then adopt the slogan of "the fulfillment of Christianity.".

This is not the place to attempt an analysis of the French Revolution, which superficial historians or the ones who covet popularity and large royalties misrepresent by talking about its supposed "idealism" and "democracy." They cater, of course, to readers who have mistaken for history Dickens' sentimental Tale of Two Cities, which is almost undiluted fiction, and Carlyle's French Revolution, in which a modicum of history serves as a clothes-horse on which he displays the rich fabric of his embellished eloquence.

The writers of conventional history à la mode even attribute the Revolution in part to the influence of Voltaire, who, if he had not died in 1778, would have denounced, with withering sarcasm, the fatuity of the addle-pated reformers of 1789, who started the avalanche in which they were soon buried. He had only scorn for weak minds that could become drunk on Rousseau's contorted verbiage.[1]

1. Nothing could be more obscene than the act of the revolutionists in 1794, when they dug up the body of Rousseau and placed it in the Panthéon beside that of Voltaire. There was no earthquake: that proves there is no survival after death.

Rousseau, more than any other individual, contributed to the theoretical façade of the Revolution. His Discours sur les sciences et les arts denounced civilization as the cause of all evil and promulgated the idiotic notion of the Noble Savage. His Discours sur l'origine de l'inégalité was the first manifesto of Communism in the modern world. The best-known part of Émile, the episode of the "vicaire savoyard," outlines a "natural" religion that is simply primitive Christianity without its more absurd myths and without an ecclesiastical establishment.

Rousseau's fantasies were the gospel of the Revolution. Weakly sentimental minds were dazzled by the ideological fustian and vapid rhetoric; stronger minds found in it a perfect cover for their crimes. The muddled "ideas" of Rousseau did provide a theoretical basis for the Revolution, but we must remember that intellectual theory had a very small part in that disaster.

There were intelligent men concerned in it, notably Chamfort, who, being poor and necessitous (he was probably the bastard of a man of rank), rented his brain to Mirabeau and devised a great deal of high-sounding nonsense about the "Rights of Man" and cognate fictions, but who knew very well what was the reality of the situation, as shown by his famous aphorism that whatever is believed by a majority is probably silly, inasmuch as it was acceptable to the mentality of the majority. ("Il y a à parier que toute idée publique, toute convention reçue, est une sottise, car elle a convenu au plus grand nombre.") That, of course, is the real basis of all "majority rule," as in the United States today.

A probably sincere "intellectual" promoter of the Revolution was the famous Marquis de Sade, the most disgusting and sadistic pornographer with whom, so far as I know, the world has been afflicted. The Revolution released him from an asylum for the criminally insane, so that he could proclaim his doctrine that "all men are created equal" ("La Nature nous a fait naître tous égaux.") and indulge his tender-hearted humanitarianism by kidnapping men and women and torturing them with every sadistic refinement until they inconsiderately died and spoiled his fun. He is, in his way, a worthy symbol of the entire movement.

They dote on the sentimental rhetoric of Rousseau, a crackpot shyster who, with as much justice as anyone else, claimed to be a real Christian and was capable of a forced rationality, but who revealed himself in a fit of candor when he told Boswell, "I have no liking for the world. I live here in a world of fantasies, and I cannot tolerate the world as it is."[2]

Intellectual chatterboxes had little practical effect on the course of the Revolution for which they provided a painted curtain. It was the work of a congeries of conspiracies, calculated and instinctive.

Earnest Christians, such as the Abbé Barruel and Nesta Webster,[3] often mistake the trappings of Christianity, such as belief in the Resurrection and other stories comparable to the tale of Jack and the Beanstalk, for its essentials, the underlying principles informing the gospels of the "New Testament," and so imagine that rational rejection of the myths was part of a unified conspiracy against religion that designedly produced the Revolution.

There were a number of conspiracies that often overlapped. There was the conspiracy of the scatter-brained Duke of Orleans, who wanted to be known as Philippe Égalité, and who hoped to supplant Louis XVI on the throne of France. There was the conspiracy of Weishaupt's Perfektibilisten (Illuminati), whose aim, in addition to fleecing wealthy suckers, included destruction of the existing social order and its civilization. There was, of course, the instinctive and automatic conspiracy of the Jews, who were the only identifiable group to profit lavishly and permanently from the disaster to Aryan Europe. But all these were merely parts of the whole.

2. The crackpot was also an intellectually dishonest poseur; as Dr. Samuel Johnson remarked, "A man who talks nonsense so well, must know he is talking nonsense." And it is amusing to see that those who would still salvage his reputation do so by claiming that he was an arrant liar, and that, for example, his admission that he had successively fathered five little bastards, of whom he disposed by furtively abandoning the infants on the steps of an orphanage, was just a lie to spice his famous and infamous Confessions (modeled on Augustine's), which set the mode for the histrionic egomania and the morbid and subtly mendacious self-revelation that was the most unpleasant aspect of Nineteenth-Century Romanticism.

3. Her fundamental work, The French Revolution, is available from Liberty Bell Publications, $8.00 + postage. If one makes allowances for Mrs. Webster's traditional Christianity, a prejudice against Germany, understandable in an Englishwoman who had to live through the war of 1914-1918, and a well-bred woman's unwillingness to mention scabrous and revolting details, this is probably the best available one-volume summary of the French Revolution. The sequel, the two volumes entitled Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette (published in 1936-1938), is, so far as I know, out-of-print.

All large cities contain a criminal underworld, the festering refuse of civilized society, and in Paris, as soon as sedition got under way, the robbers, thugs, and other biped rats immediately became champions of the Rights of Man, just as niggers instinctively looted shops and stores when the lights went out in New York a few years ago. They often determined the course of events, especially in Paris.

The thugs, inspired by Liberté, were low-grade thieves; their betters had larger ideals and successfully confiscated and stole the property of the seven hundred leading families of France. There were also great financiers, Jews and their accomplices, who were as clever as the Federal Reserve; they grabbed all the money in France, replacing it with trading stamps called assignats, which quickly became as worthless as dollars will soon be.

Among the anthropoid garbage, often the product of miscegenation, there was the usual amount of degeneracy and what we like to call insanity, because we find it comforting to believe that it is unnatural, at least in apparently White men. There were many little editions of the Marquis de Sade. They all bellyached about the unjust plight of the poor, the purity of their own hearts, and their philanthropic love of all mankind, which they clearly evinced when, for example, they took the peasant girls who worked in a silk factory and held their heads under water until they drowned. It is true, of course, that the humanitarians thus did good to the poor by putting them out of their misery, and drowning them was almost as much fun as cutting their throats or coating them with butter and baking them in a large oven.

There was nothing remarkable about the jolly boys who seized the Princesse de Lamballe, one of the Queen's dearest friends, cut out her intestines while she was still alive, brandished her head on a pike outside the window of the Queen's bedroom, and sent her amputated sexual organs in the guise of a gift to Marie-Antoinette. They were, of course, typically tender-hearted Lovers of Humanity. But it would be tedious to catalogue all the applications of practical idealism that characterized the Revolution so much admired by our "Liberal intellectuals," who sometimes hope and claim that this is the Age, not of Aquarius, but of De Sade.

Beneath all the verbiage about Liberté etc. that acts on "intellectuals" as catnip acts on cats, the French Revolution was the primarily the looting of a great nation by many gangs of robbers, swindlers, financiers, and sadists driven by an organic hatred of their betters, all of whom merely seized the opportunities produced by the breakdown of ordered society–while the predatory race stood in the background, chuckling and profiting, as it always knows how to do. The Revolution was the work of some of the most vicious and repulsive anthropoids known to history. When Léon Daudet called them "bloody beasts," he defamed beasts.

I have said enough to hint that when professed atheists plaster the silly slogan of the Revolution on their publications, they are consorting with creatures called out of the sewers by the "fulfillment of Christianity." Are they proud of the company they are keeping?

Under such auspices did the integral atheism of Charles Smith and James Hervey Johnson end in compromise with superstition. As I expected, one group of pseudo-atheists is purveying a kind of 'One World' mysticism. Called "Eco-Love" and illustrated by two small children, a nigger and a blond Aryan, fingering each other to give themselves "neurobiological health", this pseudo-pantheism is modeled on the 'New Age' hokus-pocus that is now so lucrative.

The Truth Seeker is dead and it is a nice irony that it was buried under the $22,000,000 its last editor had accumulated from prudent investments.

THE CAPTIVE CHURCH

A small booklet written and distributed by Father Juan Martínez (313 South Seventeenth Street, Frederick, Oklahoma), Orientaciones doctrinales sobre la verdadera Iglesia, may be of interest to observers of religious phenomena.

According to Father Martínez, there has been no Pope in Rome since 28 October 1958. The man who is called John XXIII was not even a Roman Catholic, because he was a Mason and it was the established doctrine of the Church that, since the Masonic religion was incompatible with Catholicism, no Mason could become a Catholic and Catholics who joined the Masons were automatically excommunicated. All of John's acts were therefore invalid, including his packing of the College of Cardinals to ensure the election of Montini as his successor.

On Montini, known as a Communist agitator while he was Archbishop of Milan, the author cites the work of Father Joaquín Sáenz Arriaga, La nueva Iglesia Montiniana,[1] which contains abundant proof that Paul VI was a Jew, a heretic, and illegally elected. He was so brazen as to appear in public wearing the insignia of a Jewish High Priest. Of course, he was not by any means the first Jew to take command of the Roman Catholic Church.[2]

The brief pontificate of John Paul I is barely mentioned, and Father Martínez expresses no opinion about the belief of conservative members of the Curia that the old man was hustled untimely to his grave with poison, as were many popes before him.

John Paul II is another Jew and the photograph[3] that shows him being led into a synagogue by a grinning rabbi should excite no astonishment.

Father Martínez notes obiter that John Paul was married to a woman named Edwige, who is said to have died before he put on the papal tiara, and condemns, not the marriage, but the mendacity of the official denials that the pontiff had ever been married. This conjugal adventure presumably inspired John Paul's book, Love and Responsibility, which, according to Father Martínez, would have been put on the Index librorum prohibitorum, if it had been published before 1958.

The author comments on the naïveté of the conservative Catholics in Mexico who urged the supposed pontiff to check the activities of the Marxist clergy, who are openly inciting Communist revolutions throughout Central and South America. They might as well have sent their telegrams to the Kremlin. Father Martínez lists many instances of John Paul's Communist activities, but omits the most flagrant and disgusting: the pseudo-pope's use of his religious prestige to force his way into Chile and openly use hypocritical bleating about "the poor" and "the underprivileged" (whatever that nonsensical term means) to incite a proletarian revolt against what is now the only civilized and stable government in South America.

In all this, there is nothing that is not well known to observers, except the positive identification of John Paul as a Jew, for which I suppose the author has proof. There is, however, one proposition which will be novel to observers, and which deserves careful consideration, since it has more than religious significance.

Catholics who do not accept the Marxian Reformation of their church call themselves 'Traditionalists' and insist on the traditional celebration of the Eucharist in Latin instead of the jazzed-up versions in the vernaculars that accompanied the Roman Church's aping of Protestant rites. The Latin mass thus serves as a symbol of adherence to the whole body of Catholic doctrine, which was universally accepted before the Church was seized by the ecclesiastical revolutionaries. There are quite a few parishes in which the officiating priest ignores the orders of his superiors and celebrates the traditional mass in Latin, and, so far as I have heard, none of them has thus far been excommunicated.

The generally recognized champion of the Traditionalists is Bishop (or Archbishop) Marcel Lefebre, who resides in Switzerland, where he maintains a seminary for training priests in the traditional rites of the Roman Church. He has numerous followers in the United States, where they maintain at least one college (Saint Mary's, in Kansas) and publish a well-written and handsomely printed periodical (The Roman Catholic).

According to Father Martínez, Lefebre was the protégé of, and was both ordained a priest and later consecrated Bishop by, one Achille Lienart, who, five years after he was ordained a priest, had joined the Masonic Order and was thus automatically excommunicated, even though he kept secret his adhesion to the secret society. Achille became Bishop in 1928, and was made a Cardinal by the last legitimate Pope, Pius XII, who, of course, did not know that the new cardinal also attained the highest rank (33º) in an organization whose members were automatically excommunicated. Lienart was one of the prime movers of the ecclesiatical coup d'état called the Second Vatican Council.

Therefore, (1) Lefebre's ordination and consecration in episcopal rank were invalid, and he is not a Roman Catholic at all. (2) His close and unbroken association with Lienart implies a common purpose, and Lienart's indubitable purpose was to capture and destroy the Roman Catholic Church. (3) Lefebre has sanctioned various heresies (enumerated in the booklet), and has constantly encouraged his followers to hope that the traditional rites would be permitted for those who wanted them by the Bolshevik Pope, whose authority was thereby recognized as legitimate.

On the basis of this evidence, Father Martínez concludes that Lefebre was a traitor to the cause he professed to champion, and that the conspirators had given him the rôle of Judas Goat; he assumed leadership of the Traditionalists to prevent them from perceiving that their only recourse was to organize a Roman Catholic Church to replace the one that the enemy had captured. He thus neutralized the Traditionalists and kept them in the Marxist Church by encouraging vain hopes and futile endeavors that gradually over the years exhausted their energies and encouraged them wearily to accept the enormities to which they had at first so strenuously objected.

I do not have, and cannot take the time to acquire, enough information about Lefebre and his movement to hazard even a tentative opinion about the charge made by Father Martínez,[4] but if he is right, we must recognize a typical application of the Jews' standard technique. At every revolutionary coup, they found or acquire a specious "conservative opposition" of which the function is to prevent real and effective opposition and to delude the "conservatives" with vain hopes while exhausting their zeal and energies in futile efforts until they wearily acquiesce in the new régime. Lefebre's "traditionalism" would thus be an ecclesiastical analogue of the John Birch Society and similar "patriotic" promotions in American politics.

BEFORE MIDNIGHT

So far as an observer on this side of the Atlantic can now determine, the future of the British people, if they have one, depends on a small political organization called the British National Party and led by John Tyndall. That necessarily endues with a crucial significance The Eleventh Hour, a book recently published in London and written by Mr. Tyndall while he was imprisoned by the tyrannical government of aliens and traitors that now rules the British isle, for the offense of writing a mildly truthful article—a crime for which the rulers of the United States have not yet seen fit to decree the sanctions of pseudo-legal terrorism.

The book is fairly well produced. The type was evidently set directly from the author's manuscript, and there are many pages that show that the text never received the attention of a professional editor, or even of a competent amateur. The resulting blemishes will seriously detract from the book's potential influence.

It is a paperback, bound by the process, now almost invariably used for paperbacks, by which hot glue is forced under pressure against the ends of page-size cut sheets. (There is a cloth-bound edition, but it must be only a paperback put between stiff covers, probably less convenient for a reader, and perhaps less durable, than the undisguised paperback.)

4. Lefebre was recently excommunicated by the boss in Rome; his clerical followers left him in a panic to retain their place on the gravy train. This neither confirms nor refutes Father Martinez's thesis.

It is a large and thick book of 631 pages, partly because the publisher had the good sense to use an adequate size of Roman type, eschewing the folly of so many "right-wing" publishers who crowd as many words as possible on a page by using small type or some sans-serif style, and thus repelling a large proportion of potential readers and making others discard the volume before it is half-read.

Although the publisher apologizes for the deficiencies of his typographic equipment, the book is, on the whole, as well printed as any volume now commonly issued by the "right-wing." But given the importance of a book that deals with nothing less than the problematical future of a once great nation, it stands in painful contrast to two trivial books at which I have recently glanced–books that are only bits of flotsam and jetsam in the flood of nonce-books perpetually spewed out by American publishers.

For the Record, by Donald Regan, is a crude attempt to whitewash old Ronnie at the expense of Mrs. Reagen, Colonel North, and Admiral Poindexter, but, published by Harcourt-Brace-Jovanovich, it conforms to the standards of fifty years ago. Set in a good twelve-point type adequately leaded and with sufficient margins, it was printed and bound in signatures, and will stay open on your desk or lap. Inside the National Security Council, by Constantine Menges, is an attempt to whitewash old Ronnie at the expense of Colonel North, Admiral Poindexter, and Donald Regan, but does have some value, since it exposes with specific detail some of the pro-Communist activity of the Schulz, a shabbat goy if not a disguised Jew, who was Ronnie's Secretary of State. Although typographically inferior to Regan's, this book, published by Simon & Schuster, is an example of passably good printing and binding. Both of these books are of the kind that is here today and forgotten tomorrow; both, in fact, have already been made obsolete by the aftermath of the scandalous trial of Colonel North. But I guess that the cost of producing either of these ephemeral books was at least twenty times what was spent to publish The Eleventh Hour.

I have labored the contrast to emphasize a cardinal fact. The "right-wing" is poverty-stricken and perforce penurious. It lacks even the modest resources needed to present its own case attractively, let alone impressively. Never forget that fact when you estimate its chance of success. Cogent arguments are less influential than the dress in which they are presented.

The Eleventh Hour deals with three interwoven subjects: autobiography, a narrative of the tribulations of the organizations that culminated in the British National Party, and consideration of the present plight of Britons and possible ways of ensuring their survival in a hostile world.

The succinct autobiography is, in this exceptional instance, exempt from the reproach of vanity, since Mr. Tyndall is the head of a political organization and his character is necessarily and justly scrutinized by potential recruits, for in any such organization the character of the leader is more crucial than principles, arguments, and even facts.

The tortuous road from Sir Oliver Mosley's British Union through the late A. K. Chesterton's League of Empire Loyalists to Mr. Tyndall's British National Party lay entirely in England, but it will seem tediously familiar to every American who has participated in, or even observed attentively, "right-wing" organizations in this country.

It's all there. One begins, of course, with the cacoëthes ducendi and its invariable result. A discerning friend of mine was wont to say that the "right-wing" was foredoomed to failure because its members are poor grammarians: they know that success in political undertakings depends on the maxim "divide and rule" (divide et impera), but they think that 'divide' is an intransitive verb.

The quip was a whimsical explanation of the fatally fissiparous tendency of the "right wing," which is, naturally, exploited by its overwhelmingly powerful enemies. The process, familiar to American observers, is clearly demonstrated by the nasty internal conspiracies within the British organizations that deprived them, first, of Mr. Chesterton and, later, of Mr. Tyndall, under whose direction the National Front had become strong enough to make an appearance as a political party in British elections–a tiny party, which, in favorable circumstances, might obtain four percent of the votes cast in an election, but still a recognized party which might have a future.

It may be noteworthy that one of the prime movers in the disruption and destruction of the National Front appeared to be a man of property and champion of traditional English principles until he finally discarded his mask and became an inventor of lies for a particularly malodorous Jewish slime sheet, thus at last identifying himself as a Jewish hireling, a spy and saboteur. But he is only an example of a phenomenon that is commonplace in the "right-wing."

It may be worthy of note, also, that the débris of what was the National Front now appear to be several dissident little coteries, which, according to Colin Jordan in the April 1989 issue of his privately published bulletin, Gothic Ripples, should be termed the "Nutty Farce." That epithet does not patently fit the May 1989 issue of The Flag, which identifies itself as "the monthly newspaper of the National Front," but it does fit the publication from which Mr. Jordan reproduces a short article.

Mr. Jordan, who is now a detached observer, affiliated with no political organization, notes that the "Nutty Farce" or the dominant faction in it has done what so many misguided "right-wingers" in the United States commonly do. Either because they have only superficial minds or because they have the ludicrous idea that they can conciliate or deceive their enemies, they repudiate and denounce Adolf Hitler and even talk about "Nazi scum," justifying themselves by praising Otto Strasser, a German who, either from addle-pated egotism or as a hireling of the Jews, tried to make National Socialism in Germany a thinly disguised Bolshevism and plotted against Hitler until he finally fled from Germany to conspire against that nation abroad. It is hard to say whether the "Strasserism" now found in the "right wing" proceeds from Strasser's contorted verbiage or from sympathy with Ernst Röhm, the conspirator who remained in Germany and fomented revolution until he was suppressed by Hitler. (On that event, see General Hans Bauer's Hitler at My Side, which was reviewed in Liberty Bell, February 1988.) Röhm naturally engages the warm sympathies of homosexual perverts.

This otherwise trivial detail should remind us that it is simple folly to attempt to oppose the Judaeo-Communist conquest and occupation of the world while futilely pretending to dissociate ourselves from the memory of the great champion of our race, Adolf Hitler.

The great importance of Mr. Tyndall's book lies, of course, in his analysis of the present plight of the British people, which necessarily merges with the plight of our race as a whole.

Of the nations that were crushingly and perhaps decisively defeated by world Jewry in 1945, the British and Americans now find themselves in a more nearly similar condition than the others. But there were great differences.

When Britain was used to start the suicidal war, she was an imperial power: she was stripped of her colonies and, in a sense, dismembered, for she was alienated from South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and Canada, which could have been described as overseas Britain. The consequence of her insanity in 1939 was that in 1945 she had become a second-rate, and was on her way to becoming a third-rate, power, and a thoughtful Englishman could not fail to see that the nation had suffered the consequences of defeat. The United States had emerged from the mundial disaster as the strongest military power, and Americans, unless they were keenly critical, had the illusion they had been victorious; and since the United States was the leading partner in the Jews' Washington-Moscow Axis, her inhabitants imagined themselves the arbiters of the whole world's future and indulged their morbid Christian itch to meddle in other peoples' business, unaware that the country's military might could never be used for the benefit of the American people.

In 1939, Britain had a recognizable social structure, which was almost entirely destroyed, except for empty titles and formalities, by the great hardships that were imposed on the British people during their war against their own race, and the subsequent exploitation of their economic plight by their domestic enemies. Britain suffered a disastrous genetic impoverishment through the loss of valuable parts of the population, a loss that was the more catastrophic because she had already been so bled genetically by her mistaken war of 1914-18. The dysgenic effects of such a war were studied by David Starr Jordan in his War and the Breed (1915; reprinted, Washington, D.C., Cliveden Press, 1988.) In 1939 the United States had already been so rotted by the social disease called "democracy" that she had no classes and the only social criterion was money or the current substitute for it. And Americans had suffered no major genetic loss since they destroyed their republic in a fit of righteousness in 1861-64 and forfeited the freedom they had won less than a century earlier.

The Washington-Moscow Axis uses a technique comparable to that of police officers when they interrogate a prisoner. One of a pair of officers is harshly hostile while the other feigns to understand sympathetically the prisoner's plight, and thus, in close coöperation during a prolonged interrogation, they commonly bend all but hardened criminals to their will. After the catastrophe of 1945, Russia was given the rôle of menacing Europe with Communism, while the United States pretended to be sympathetic to European culture and to want to defend the weaker nations against aggression by her Soviet partner.

In her harmonious collaboration with her Soviet partner, the United States has, as Mr. Tyndall perceives, actively undermined Britain by financial pressure and depredations to avert possible British independence. (It is true that we are now told that the British are second only to the Japanese in buying up parts of the United States in the forced sale of this bankrupt country's assets, but we are not told whether the "British" are Englishmen and Scots or are international predators, and, in any case, the sales are merely in preparation for the collapse of the economic structure of the United States that is probably scheduled for the next lustrum.)

Mr. Tyndall's book was written and published too early for him to consider a development that is now taking place. The United States actively nudged Britain toward the Common Market and toward the surrender of even nominal sovereignty over her island to the European Parliament (then appropriately headed by a Kikess who had been "exterminated" by the horrid Nazis)–a surrender that is scheduled to take place in 1992. Mr. Tyndall perceives that the economic unification of western Europe, and even more the coming political unification, is designed to destroy the surviving débris of Aryan culture and civilization in Britain and in all other European countries, and I am sure he also perceives that one way in which the liquidation of Europe is to be accomplished will be by use of the authority of the "European parliament" to accelerate the flooding of all the countries of Europe with racial enemies to reduce the Aryan population to the status of a minority that will then be exterminated by both miscegenation and massacre.

Since Mr. Tyndall wrote, Gorbachev became the executive officer of the Soviet part of the Axis, and has even openly coöperated with his new colleague in Washington. Now since Gorbachev has been reorganizing the Soviet structure with the obvious purpose, which no one seems willing to notice, of concentrating into his own hands the total powers once enjoyed by Stalin, it is highly improbable that he is such a fool as to believe the nonsense that is quoted from his book and speeches. That would give pause to our twittering "intellectuals," if they tried thinking instead of vociferating.

The boobs are now being told to rejoice because Poland has been infected with "democracy" through a "free election," which was doubtless as well managed as are the political games that entertain gullible Americans. The infection, it is said, is sure to spread to the eastern part of Germany, to Hungary, etc. No doubt, it will. And what will be the result of the "retreat" of the Soviet under Gorbachev? Why, of course, the inclusion of the "liberated" Soviet satellites in the European Union, and they will send delegates to the European Parliament to help "defend" Europe against the Soviet. Everyone seems to have forgotten that when traitors organized the sham called the "United Nations" to prevent the United States from possibly becoming independent, the Soviet was given six votes to our one on the pretext that Russian colonies were separate States. But the ploy will certainly work again–unless by some miracle Mr. Tyndall succeeds in inducing the British to withdraw from their already legislated and scheduled servitude in a colonial possession of a "United Europe," which will be in turn a servile colony of the World Conquerors.

Mr. Tyndall calls for a resumption of British independence, both economic and military. Again, he wrote just before one achievement of the government of Prime Ministress Maggie and her Jewish trainers became fully apparent.

Sympathetic Americans were sad when Englishmen flattered themselves because they were still a second-rate power and had successfully defended the Falkland Islands from aggression by another second-rate power, Argentina. It was true that British soldiers and sailors gave proof that the race had not entirely lost its ancient valor, and American observers tactfully refrained from reminding Britons that the military government of Argentina had stepped into a trap set for it by the British Colonial Office, and that the government of Argentina that was encouraged to embark on what it was led to believe would be an easy occupation and augmentation of its territory, was, by "Liberal" standards, a very wicked government, because it did not cuddle Communists and degenerates, and, what was even worse, did not kowtow to old Yahweh's Sublime Sheenies.

The result of the British victory in the Falklands was that the civilized government of Argentina was overthrown and replaced with a government of Kikes plus a few shabbat goyim; the Argentine army was purged of loyal and honorable officers and neutralized with "democratic" corruption; and the international parasites are now looting Argentina, as they looted Germany in the 1920s and will soon loot the United States, with an inflation so drastic that prices increase hourly, and many persons living on pensions or other fixed income cannot afford to send a letter through the mails. One hopes that the Jews have at least rewarded with free hairdressing their "iron lady," a mannequin created by Saachi & Saachi (see Liberty Bell, July 1986, pp. 3 ff.).

Mr. Tyndall has issued, as the subtitle of his book says, "a call for British rebirth," and while the book is entitled The Eleventh Hour, the design on the cover more accurately shows the hands of the clock pointing to 11:59. I am sure that Mr. Tyndall knows that the situation is desperate, and I surmise that he may also perceive that, so far as one can now foresee, the rebirth will have to come after death, i.e., after an economic and social collapse of Britain so total as to inflict acute privation and physical suffering on the now stultified Aryan population–a national prostration, moreover, that must occur before the importation of a fetid mass of racial garbage to complete the Jews' work of destruction has gone so far as to reduce the Aryans in Britain to a status of cringing and helpless inferiority.

Although by so doing he emphasized the awesome magnitude of the task, Mr. Tyndall has, with almost complete candor, stated in detail what must be done if our race is to survive in Britain, and since the plight of Aryans in Britain and in the United States is essentially identical and differs only in some unessentials and a few adventitious circumstances, most of what he has to say is as applicable to Americans as to Britons.

Mr. Tyndall does not attempt to dissemble the fact that in his country (as in ours) the exigencies of our plight demand a régime that is essentially the National Socialism of Adolf Hitler, which gave such phenomenal strength and courage to a Germany reborn, like the phoenix, from the ashes of defeat. This is also the part of his programme that is most likely to startle not only the boobs but intelligent readers who are living in the past and have in their minds a residue of the genuine liberalism, to which their parents forfeited their right by laches.

As I remarked in America's Decline, in the 1930s some Americans, perceiving the absurdity of the contrived "Depression" and the steady and often stealthy encroachment on their remaining liberty by the diseased War Criminal in the White House, were wont to say openly, "We need a Hitler here." With that view, others (and I was among them) dissented, underestimating the power intent on our destruction, not foreseeing what it would accomplish in 1941, and hoping that the liberalism that inspired the Constitution could be revived.

That genuine liberalism, the very antithesis of the malicious yammering of our "Liberal intellectuals," had its last exponent in Albert Jay Nock, whose Our Enemy, the State, must have been read by everyone who seriously pretends to understand the political history of our hapless people, and who, appropriately, died, an old man of seventy-three, in the year that consummated in Berlin the Suicide of the West.[1]

Aryans, scions of the only race that really prizes freedom, instinctively approve the personal liberty that Nock desiderated, but delusions engendered by a poisonous superstition made them discard their power to obtain it. Every time they had a choice, they opted for "social goods," i.e., more power for bureaucrats, and now find themselves in the debased servitude that their herdsmen call "freedom," which resembles a sheep's freedom to choose in which patch of grass he will browse while he is growing wool and mutton for his owners. Sheep differ from Americans, however, in that they do not need teachers and journalists to exhort them to be grateful for the freedom they enjoy in their democratic pasture.

However desirable personal freedom may be, it is no longer attainable. There was a time when the Titanic's race to disaster could have been checked by prudent alteration of her course, but that could no longer be done when the great liner was sinking. A prudent limitation of suffrage and drastic control of immigration might have preserved the freedom contemplated by the Constitution; after 1864 it was already too late to salvage the Republic, but considerable fragments of it might have been preserved by intelligent action as late as 1916. It is vain to regret what has happened. The past cannot be changed. We must cope with the present, if we hope to affect our future.

You are no longer in the lounge of the Titanic, sipping vintage champagne. You are with fools in an overcrowded lifeboat that may at any time capsize and precipitate you into a lethally cold sea. That should change your table of priorities. In Britain and the United States today, an adaptation of German National Socialism, despite its shortcomings in comparison with an ideal state Platonically imagined, is the very best for which an Aryan can rationally opt, and the only question is whether it is not already hopelessly beyond the boundaries of what is still possible.

If you are an old man, your grandparents had a limited variety of choices before them, and your parents had a few. Whatever your age, you now have only one choice–and it is a grave question whether you still have the power to choose at all, except in imagination–and that choice is between a rationally authoritarian régime that, you hope, may ensure the survival of your progeny, and the merciless and deadly despotism that your eternal foes are now imposing on you. If you opt for the latter, perhaps in the expectation that old Jesus will someday give your ghost a lollipop, I hope you will not be so heartless and cruel as to bring into the world children who will suffer and perish in Hell you will have made for them.

1. I will remark that I was once acquainted with a son of Albert Jay Nock, and when I thought to compliment him, I was shocked to find that he, a frog in a "Liberal" pond, was embarrassed by being reminded of a relationship he thought discreditable.

If you as an American surmount your sentimental objections to an authoritarian state that respects your race, all the rest of Mr. Tyndall's proposals for a rebirth of Britain will, mutatis aliquot mutandis, logically follow as necessary corollaries.

There is one considerable difference between Britain and America today. Both nations, of course, are dying of the poison of "Liberal intellectuals," who, with moralistic hypocrisy, demand what they call an "open society," i.e. a society perpetually so stirred up that the dregs on the bottom become the scum on the top. That, as Mr. Tyndall, leader of a party, prudently does not say, is merely a revival of the primitive Christianity of the Jesus who roused the rabble with the promise that "the first shall be last and the last shall be first"–that he would subjugate persons of culture, refinement, and learning to mindlessly superstitious and uncouth proletarians, who could happily look forward to seeing their betters tortured forever in Hell. England, however, so far as I have learned, is chiefly afflicted with ignorant or malevolent "intellectuals," whose faith is the Marxian cult, but imagine they are not religious, while the shamans of the avowedly Christian churches, with their ever dwindling membership, are without great influence. In other words, if I am correctly informed, the Jewish government of England is not actively promoting the Christian superstitions about Yahweh & Son, Inc.

In the United States, our enemies' technique of Hegelian thesis and antithesis is completing a full cycle. From the French Revolution to the early decades of this century, most obviously in the Marxian cult, they promoted their revolt against our race and its civilization by an ostentatious rejection of Christianity and its folk-tales about supernatural beings, using for that purpose some portions of historical and scientific knowledge. Since the Suicide of the West in 1945, however, our enemies, perceiving that historical and scientific knowledge was equally destructive of their "materialistic" adaptation of Judaeo-Christian superstition, began systematically to promote belief in the old tales about spooks that have always appealed to ignorant and highly emotional persons.

The early stages of the subversion of rationality passed almost unnoticed. In 1948, Federal judges were required to take an oath, "so help me God," thus limiting office in the Federal judiciary to persons who were either superstitious or hypocritical, unless the phrase was to be taken as a mere expletive, like "god-damned." In 1954, "under God" was added to the ritual Pledge of Allegiance, and 1955-56 the American motto, "E pluribus unum," was replaced with "In God We Trust," a lie that was now put on all currency. (It had appeared on some coins since it was sneaked onto them in 1864.) In 1964, the den of thieves that is officially called the House of Representatives imposed a large part of Communist rule on their American subjects as "Civil Rights" for everyone except Americans. As originally passed, it guaranteed employment to niggers, wogs, half-breeds, perverts, and other assorted scum, but provided that atheists, men and women too intelligent to believe ghost stories and too honest to pretend they did, could be hounded from all employment without recourse of any kind and even without a right to the benefits provided for all other unemployed. In 1966, the oath "so help me God"–presumably a reference to old Yahweh, alias 'God'–was required of all Federal employees. In 1969, Nixon bolstered his waning popularity with the masses by having Christian dervishes perform their rites in the White House to show his boorish contempt for both social propriety and the authors of the Constitution.

The significance of the foregoing acts and others like them was not generally appreciated, for Americans have long been used to the antics of candidates for office, who often court popularity by demeaning themselves in such vulgar acts as kissing babies and flattering the rabble, and it has long been customary for Presidents to court the religious by listening to sermons in some church every Sunday. That the owners of the Federal government were engaged in a calculated and progressive campaign to foster irrational superstitions was proved by a performance staged in 1979–staged in a space craft that was orbiting the moon and had been made possible by the genius of a German scientist, Dr. Arthur Rudolph, who was then driven from the United States to please the yammering Yids.

At ten seconds past 7:31 P.M. (prime time!), the crew, sitting before a television camera and acting under military orders, contorted their faces into what was supposed to be an expression of religious awe and pretended to be inspired to recite spontaneously in chorus the first ten chapters of Genesis in the Jew-Book, giving the Jews' version of the Sumerian-Babylonian creation myth. The act impressed quite a number of viewers of the kind that is ready to believe anything that tickles their glands, but although the act had doubtless been rehearsed often before the crew left the earth, the soldiers were not professional actors. One man who watched the performance on television says that when he saw what was supposed to be an expression of awe on their faces, his first thought was that the men had been suddenly struck by food-poisoning or perhaps some abdominal pain caused by weak gravity. When they began to recite, he knew that it was an act and noticed from their eyes that they were reading the "inspired" text from a teleprompter or similar device. No alert witness of the performance should have been deceived at the time, although it was years before it became publicly known that the crewmen had acted under orders and carried out a military operation that had the code designation "P.1," but most of the persons who stare at the boobtube are soon reduced to a quasi-hypnotic trance.

This governmental promotion of Christianity should not be astonishing. Since 1945, most of the established Christian churches, including the Roman Catholic, which for a long time seemed least likely to abandon its traditional faith, have accepted the Marxian Reformation, which they call the "Social Gospel" and attribute to Jesus ("the last shall be first," etc.) rather than St. Marx, whose name might not be equally revered by their sheep. Our enemies, therefore, no longer have anything to gain from their old opposition to religion per se, while they urgently need to obscure the scientifically ascertained facts that make nonsense of the superstitions about "all mankind" and an "equality of all human races" (it being tacitly understood that Kikes are superhuman[2]). They need also to obscure the historical record, which discloses what a miserable set of parasites they are. So they now refurbish the seditious religion with which they consummated the ruin of the Roman Empire and poisoned the minds of our Nordic ancestors.

Accordingly, the Jews' boobtubes began to exhibit talented actors in the evangelical racket, and the howling dervishes peddled a debased Christianity that was even patently Jewish, since the shamans scared the suckers with stories of what old Yahweh would do to wicked nations that didn't revere his Chosen Parasites. The effectiveness of this rhetorical fustian is shown by the fact that it reversed the direction of popular opinion and transformed a dwindling religion into a growing one, enlisting many thousands of mediocre individuals in a "Moral Majority" and inciting in many the fits, similar to mild epilepsy, in which they rave with Pentecostal gibberish.

2. 'Superhuman' in our terminology, which it is best to use for clarity, instead of the Jewish terminology, set forth in their holiest book, according to which only Jews are human, whereas all goyim are animals, perhaps slightly superior to other animals, just as dogs and cats are superior to rats and mice.

We are now afflicted with a plague of "creation scientists," most of them technicians who either are or elect to be ignorant of scientific principles and methods, and misuse scientific terminology to peddle spiritual snake oil to the suckers, while overage actresses and other hokum-artists vend the pot-pourri of cognate fantasies called the "New Age" to other fugitives from reality.

The epidemic is spreading rapidly. A survey reported in the Skeptical Inquirer, Spring 1989, shows that 46% of the young victims of the public schools believe the silly story that old Yahweh created Adam and Eve from dirt and a second-hand rib; 43% believe the fairy story about Noah and his Ark; 44% believe in the actual existence of Yahweh's rival or stooge (depending on which part of the Jew-Book takes your fancy), Satan, and are sure he's at work in the world today; and 36% want all children dosed with the hokum of "creation science." Such are the consequences of permitting racketeers to turn schools into boob-hatcheries.

Meanwhile, the government's promotion of befuddling superstition continues. The Donald Regan whom I mentioned above started a short-lived scandal by disclosing gullible Mrs. Reagan's astrological superstition, but neither he nor anyone else dared remark on the more absurd superstition of her husband, who babbled about a mythical place called Armageddon (as it is most commonly spelled), invented by the lunatic who composed the Apocalypse that was included among the tales in the "New Testament"; who insulted Moslems by sending them copies of the Christians' favorite story-book; who talked about "Bible Prophecy" with an irrational belief that proved him unfit to hold any responsible office in government; who betrayed Americans by promoting the "Genocide Treaty" which is to serve as the quasi-legal pretext for Jewish terrorism in the United States; and who established Yiddish head-hunters from Mossad in the Federal government and on the Federal payroll as an "Office of Special Investigation" to gratify the Chosen Race's blood-lust. And now the Bushman who has succeeded him parades his real or simulated belief in Jewish fables and, in a letter to an association of atheists, insultingly says that he will reluctantly tolerate them in his country.

A gloomy atheist tells me in a letter that he foresees that within a few years the Revolutionary Tribunal, now weighted down with Ronnie's appointees, will soon decree that the United States is a Christian country and that denial of Jewish fables is a criminal offense; he thinks their pretext will probably be the reference, made by some founders of our lost Republic, to "nature's god," by which the deists meant the animus mundi of the Stoics, but which Christians even now claim to have been a reference to their hook-nosed Daddy up in the clouds.

Now, if I am correctly informed that there is no comparable promotion of such overt irrationality in England, there is a very significant difference between the United States and the Britain for whose rebirth Mr. Tyndall hopes. It would appear that the race that has conquered the world by deceit plans different ends for the two captive nations.

There are also relatively unimportant differences. Britain has a royal family, which became purely decorative after the traitors who were planning to attack Germany forced the resignation of King Edward VIII (cf. Liberty Bell, March 1987, pp. 5 ff.); the potential of the family may be estimated from the fact that male children are routinely circumcised by a rabbi, since the liquid in their veins contains an undetermined proportion of the ichor of God's Race. Britain also has some remnant of an aristocracy, but I should like to know how many men now in the House of Lords had grandfathers who sat there–and I should also like to know how many feel sick when they see a grinning rabbi in their midst as a "peer." There is also a self-conscious "middle class," which believes that a knowledge of correct diction, even if unused, evinces a superiority that covers cowardice or stupidity.[3] Whether anything of value can be made of such unpromising materials remains to be seen.

Both countries have the problem of "skinheads," many of whom, tired of being pushed around by niggers and of being harassed by depraved "educators," dare to assert themselves as Aryans. Neither their garb nor their manners commend them to persons who retain anachronistic standards of gentility, but the fact remains that the young "skinheads" retain healthy instincts and evince a courage conspicuously lacking in their spineless elders, and they are almost the only "racists" who are ready to defend themselves when attacked by vermin. In the universities they are giving the venal fakirs of the administration the heebie-jeebies, and that is a meritorious service in itself. Like everything that is detrimental to our captors, the "skinheads" should be encouraged and their efforts, unless grossly inept, commended, but one cannot imagine them as members of an organization necessarily dominated by the middle-aged.

3. It is hard to account for the way in which young members of the gentry were fascinated by "Liberal" and "Socialist" poppycock in the 1930s. I wish someone would determine the relative force of childish exhibitionism; resentment directed against parents or elders in general; sexual proclivities at variance with the norms of good society; belief in traditional Christianity; the residue that Christianity usually leaves in minds that have rejected it; the temptation to become an "intellectual" without the hardship of study and serious thought; philosophical conviction inculcated by professors who, e.g., enforce by adroit argument acceptance of Kant's cant as a propaedeutic to the Marxist faith; and perhaps other factors.

The cardinal factor, which, indeed, overshadows all others, is racial, and to this Mr. Tyndall has devoted a good chapter, writing with the circumspection and caution necessary in a captive nation in which freedom of speech is permitted only to enemies, their hirelings, and their dupes. He has neatly evaded another experience of pseudo-legal terrorism by recommending that our race emulate the Jews' racial consciousness and solidarity. As everyone knows, it is the Jews' confidence in the vast superiority of their race which has enabled that numerically insignificant tribe to dominate the whole world, although, so far as the historical evidence shows, it was always dispersed among the nations on which it was parasitic.[4] If Aryans could develop even a small fraction of Jews' racial cohesion and solidarity, they would soon own the planet.

I commend to your earnest and philosophical consideration Mr. Tyndall's ambitious plan for a rebirth of Aryan Britain and the creation of "a new land and a new people." If he even partly succeeds in attracting the requisite following, that will be time enough to ask whether it would be appropriate to quote Baudelaire's lines, addressed to Philopoemen when the assembled Greeks applauded him at the Nemean Games:

> Cum te mirantur, ad alta
> se credunt genitos, priscasque resumere vires
> antiquumque decus–nimia heu! fiducia–sperant.[5]

4. There is no historical evidence that a majority of the Jews was ever concentrated in Palestine or any other place. It is almost necessary to assume that the hybrid race first formed a tribe in one location, but we have no evidence of where that was. Needless to say, the Yids' story of a 'diaspora' following the Roman capture of Jerusalem in A.D. 69 is just another of their innumerable hoaxes.

5. "When they look up to you, they think themselves born for heroic deeds and, with self-confidence that is, alas, excessive, they hope to recover the vigor of their prime and regain their past greatness."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear George:

I was pleased to read Ed Toner's letter in response to my article on Ulster [see July Liberty Bell]. However, I am afraid that he has got his facts all wrong.

Although the Orange Order resembles Freemasonry, there is no direct connection, and Orangemen are certainly not affiliated with the Scottish Rite, unless they happen to attend Masonic meetings as well as Orange meetings. The Orange Order was founded in 1795 not specifically to promote the monarchy, but to defend Protestant farmers and workers from attacks by ignorant Irish peasants. A similar situation prevailed in western Poland in 1939, when Hitler invaded [formerly German territory of] that country to protect the lives of Lutheran Germans who were being massacred by brutal Catholic Poles, as at Bromberg. Likewise, the American Ku Klux Klan was established to protect southerners from Negro attacks. None of these developments has anything to do with Masonry.

I have never seen any evidence of the "multiracial" Roman armies integrating with the British, during the Roman occupation. Where is Ed's proof? Were are the "Turkish" and "African" surnames? Artifacts? Genetic fingerprints?

Yes, a lot of the Scottish settlers whom the English planted in Ulster were riff-raff. But an awful lot of them were also highly literate educated, stubborn, and independent. I thoroughly recommend a new book, God's Frontiersmen, by Rory FitzPatrick, which, unfortunately, is not yet available in the USA, but is published in Britain by Weidenfeld & Nicholson.

The United Irishmen was originally a Presbyterian organization, committed to self-determination for all Irishmen, whatever their religion. However, every time they would stage a paramilitary uprising against English rule, the rebellion would be sabotaged by the ignorant Irish who used it as an opportunity to massacre Protestants—regardless of their views on government—such as at Wexford in 1798. Eventually, the Presbyterian intellectuals gave up on trying to cultivate their stupid Catholic neighbors, and many of them re-emigrated to the New World, where they at last were able to establish a secular, republican, democracy. In fact the U.S. system of government closely resembles that of the Presbyterian synod, where there are no bishops or popes, and ministers have to run for election.

The Scotch-Irish established, pioneered and built this United States of America. There was only one Catholic signer of the Declaration of Independence, and there wasn't a Catholic bishopric here until Victorian times. The Scotch-Irish came here because they were industrious pioneers; the Catholic Irish came here in the late 19th century because of the potato famine; they were too backward to diversify their agriculture, for example, they never thought of a fishing industry, even though they were surrounded by water.

As for Irish American patriots, I note that at least two of Ed's figures turned out to be sell-outs. Both Henry Ford and Father Coughlin caved in to Jewish pressure and apologized for their earlier candor. Coughlin kept his mouth shut until he died. As for Ted O'Keefe, anybody who cheats, lies and slanders Revisionists at Willlis Carto's command is not worthy of respect.

Sincerely,
David McCalden

Dear George:

With regards to the letters from E.R. in California and V.G. in Michigan which were published in your August 1989 issue, I hope you'll allow me to make the following comments.

V.G. is quite correct. I am always "crying for money." Judging from your paranthetical interpolation I imagine you could instruct this comrade in the realities of alternative politics quite as well as I can, but since the complaint has been made with regard to myself, let's examine some facts about my own funding situation.

First off, I don't think people fully realize how much money is required to run even a small operation like the CNC was. A major publication such as Liberty Bell is even more difficult to finance adequately. Let us assume a mailing of 500 for the CNC—in actual fact, my mailing list fluctuates because I periodically cull deadbeats who don't subscribe or whom I don't hear from, but let's take 500 as a working figure since I have never claimed any huge, vast readership. I issue a 4-page bulletin every month, or try to. The best copying price I can get here in Raleigh is 6 cents per copy. That's 24 cents per Bulletin flat, since I do my own collating and stapling in order to save money. For 500 copies that's $126 when you add the 5% North Carolina sales tax—but I always have to print at least 25% more than my actual mailing list for that month in order to have Bulletins for mailing out to inquirers, passing out at meetings and rallies, etc. So I print 625 copies, which comes

STATUS QUO, UMERZIEHUNG UND REVISIONISMUS

(Status Quo, Reëducation and Revisionism)

By

Prof. Walter Bodenstein

Translated by

Dr. Charles E. Weber

Translator's note: Dr. Walter Bodenstein, who presently resides in Kiel in northern Germany, is the author of an important little book that I reviewed in the Liberty Bell of May 1986, Ist nur der Besiegte schuldig? Kritischer Rückblick auf das Stuttgarter Schuldbekenntnis (Is Only the Loser Guilty? / A Critical Retrospect on the Stuttgart Confession of Guilt), published by the Mut-Verlag in 1985. As a member of the German armed forces Professor Bodenstein participated in the war on the eastern front from the very outset on 22 June 1941, when German infantry forces crossed the Bug River. In the long letter which accompanied the essay below Prof. Bodenstein stated that the first German stipulation in a peace settlement should be the cessation of reëducation. In this connection he discusses two recent books which he feels are symptomatic of an end to reëducation. One of the books, by Karl Salm, deals with the desertion of Captain Richard von Weizäcker at the end of the war from the German armed forces, which were trying to salvage what they could in the face of advancing Soviet troops, who had shown their genocidal intentions as early as the autumn of 1944 in the massacre of the population of the village of Nemmersdorf. Weizäcker, President of the German Federal Republic, is the son of a high-ranking SS officer and high German official in the German Foreign Office under Ribbentrop. The second, clearly revisionistic work which Prof. Bodenstein discusses is a new book by Victor Suvorov which demonstrates the Soviet intentions of attacking Germany a short time after the beginning of Operation Barbarossa (22 June 1941). An earlier version of this book was published in the Liberty Bell of January 1986 (pages 27-39) and was also mentioned in our Bulletin No. 20.

If one defines the word democracy as a governmental and political order which guarantees complete freedom in education and presentation of individual opinion and convictions and if one defines dictatorship as an order in which, as in most cases, a definite ideology is officially advocated, along with a one-party system eliminating the opposition, then it must be observed that such a freedom exists only to a quite limited extent in the German Federal Republic. One must not allow himself to be deceived by the Grundgesetz [the Basic Law, a sort of constitution promulgated in 1949]. The philosophical [weltanschauliche] neutrality ostensibly promulgated by the Basic Law conceals the fact that the German Federal Republic has a governmentally ordered ideology which is obligatory for all [of its citizens]. One can certainly take this ideology as an analogy to the Marxism-Leninism of the German Democratic Republic, with the exception of the fact that the ideology of the Federal Republic is lacking in a broad literary basis, unlike Marxism-Leninism. Nevertheless, the ideology of the German Federal Republic is terribly effective and dominates the mental processes [of its citizens] to a great extent. Indeed, the lack of formulated statements benefits this ideology, because there is no possibility of examining its actual content and discussing it critically.

On the other hand, this ideology dominates the totality of public conscience, the press media, as well as television and radio. Schools and universities, the entire educational system, are dominated by this ideology. At this point the churches view this as a special opportunity to put into discussion again their basic religious concepts, such as guilt and reconciliation, which are otherwise no longer current and are now, indeed, completely secularized and filled with a political content. As far as political parties and trade unions are concerned, this ideology provides a philosophical basis which is common to all [citizens]. It forms the substance of the atmosphere in which the entire political and intellectual life of the German Federal Republic takes place.

We are talking about the so-called reëducation; of the Germans only, it must be added, because the others have no need for such a procedure. Like all governmental ideologies, it has a religious, or to be more precise, a pseudo-religious characteristic. It has an historical basis in the twelve years of the former [National Socialist] regime [1933-1945]. Reëducation, although turning back to the history of salvation [i.e., the story of the life and suffering of Christ] of the Christian Religion, could be designated as a history of disaster which casts its shadow on the present generation as well as all coming generations. This history of disaster has been augmented with atrocity myths that keep growing and in the process have been made a dogma which every German is obliged to believe. In the German Federal Republic a strict prohibition of revision prevents any critical examination, so that intellectual analysis and open discussion is possible only in other countries (France, England, Switzerland, Austria and the United States).

This pseudo-religious ideology has its commemorative days and places when and where it is celebrated in accordance with an established ritual. Its credo, without being formulated in words, is proclaimed by the highest representatives of government at all appropriate occasions and echoed by all the media. Even minor deviations are vigorously prosecuted, as is demonstrated in the case of [Philipp] Jenninger [see Bulletin No. 33].

This reëducation ideology has its origin in the collapse of the German Reich at the end of the war in 1945. As far as the Allies were concerned, there came about at this time the task of maintaining the thus resultant circumstances as a status quo of German powerlessness and weakness, not only politically, but also especially intellectually. For this purpose the military defeat was transformed into a moral one, as if the Germans themselves had deserved this through their own guilt, while the Allies were thus excused. In keeping with the Anglo-Saxon ideology, their own participation was justified as a punitive expedition of the western democracies and this of the bearers of Christian humanity ("Onwards, Christian Soldiers!") opposed to the German nationalistic barbarism.

However, it was not permissible to proclaim this to the Germans as the view of the foreign victors, because then there would have to be a reckoning sooner or later with a counterreaction. Rather, it had to be enunciated by the Germans themselves. Only in this way could their acceptance of the now attained status quo be secured for the future. In its place there entered reëducation, which caused the loss of national autonomy to appear deserved as a result of past misdeeds and which precluded a national self-evaluation in the future as far as possible.

Thus basically, Fichte's great idea, as he expressed it in 1808 in his "Reden an die deutsche Nation" (Lectures to the German Nation), was taken over, but with regard to their contents they were simply transformed into the opposite [idea]: It was anti-nationalist reëducation of the German nation, with the objective of bringing the Germans to a permanent acceptance of the status quo.

II

In order to remove from this undertaking the character of an arbitrary action by the victors, the Allies used the Germans' churches. The Allied representatives made their charitable aid dependent on a German confession of guilt at their first meeting with leaders of the German churches in October 1945. These leaders were willing to accept this condition in the so-called Stuttgart Confession of Guilt. Thus, the principle had been introduced which was henceforth used in ever new variations and which formed the nucleus of reëducation. As a result of the participation of the churches, the German defeat was now declared to be the judgment of God.

The secular supplement to this was provided by German emigrants who had returned from the United States. They had already prepared the plans for the reëducation of Germans during the war in the United States and now they made it a reality in the form of the German Federal Republic. Little by little all of the shapers of public opinion and institutions in the German Federal Republic were taken over by the proponents of reëducation. Reëducation thus developed into the official philosophy [Weltanschauung] of the German Federal Republic.

The guilt complex that came about in this way generated a domestic lack of self-esteem, which was defended by certain circles with an intolerant fanaticism. The military surrender was internalized into a surrender mentality which forgoes from the outset any advocacy of national interests. Thus, the demand for German reunification, as well as the claim on the German eastern territories under foreign administration, were dropped from the platforms of the established political parties without the voicing of any considerable protest.

The astonishing aspect of this process was the willingness of the Germans to accede to this attempt to reëducate them and even take over this attempt as their own task, ultimately with enthusiasm. The reasons for this lie, for one thing, in the profound shock which the Germans suffered in their two defeats in this century after terrific exertions of strength. Further, the economic improvement and the thereby attained material prosperity made easier the forgoing of political activity on behalf of their own interests. As a result, the reëducation was successful, apparently to the astonishment of the Allies, to a far greater extent than they had originally expected. The task of securing the status quo assigned to reëducation was completely fulfilled, so that reëducation has even become an element of this status quo.

But can this condition be permanent? Since the only thing that is permanent in history is that nothing is permanent, the moment can be visualized when even the reëducation ideology will approach its end. This is true for two reasons: For one thing, there is now occurring a change in the overall weather situation of the history of the world which can be designated as the end of the postwar period. In the USSR it is becoming apparent that its expansive imperialism has reached its limits and has passed beyond its zenith. The national desire for freedom amongst the dominated nations as well as the economic and ideological bankruptcy of the system are leading to a constantly progressing decay of power. As the tragedy in China shows, the Marxist model has by now lost all its credit as a basis of social order. But even the United States has had to accept the loss of an absolute leadership rôle, as is shown by the integration and strengthening of western Europe. Nothing demonstrates that more clearly than the fact that the very nations conquered by America in the Second World War, Germany and Japan, have put the United States in third place as an economic power. Thus, the system created by the victorious powers in Yalta and Potsdam has begun to undergo a crisis. This development makes necessary a revision of the status quo created after the war. We are witnessing how history itself has already commenced it progress.

Now then, it is the power of truth in the occidental order of values that is calling for a revision. For two and a half millennia the search for truth has put wings on the intellectual dynamism of the occident. For that reason truth represents a higher value than non-truth of half truth, which is basically no truth. Even in early Greek philosophy, that led to the differentiation of myth from thought based on reasoning. Original Christianity determined the further development in an irreversible way by the concepts of truth and freedom (John 18,37; Second Corinthians 13,8 and Galatians 5,1). This is true because these concepts possess not only a religious and philosophical importance, but at the same time represent a power of social criticism of considerable explosive force.

Consequently, today the demand to subject to a critical test the structure of the reëducation of Germans, with its propaganda lies and legends, is based on the high esteem for truth. Only the fear of truth could have a tendency to prevent that. Thus, there has simply been renewed the demand by the great German historian, Leopold von Ranke (1795-1886), to "show it as it really was." It follows that there must be an end to forcing Germans to defame themselves. This is the case because a permanent conciliation amongst the nations is possible only on the basis of historical truth.

Since that is the case, revisionism will no doubt become the great intellectual adventure of the remaining part of the century, as French professor, Robert Faurisson, has pointed out (see Bulletin No. 35, page 4).

MINORITYISM

by
Nicholas Carter

Minority rights are acclaimed by everyone in the American Establishment as a moral principle of a high order. But this principle, which forbids discrimination, is applied in a discriminatory manner to non-White and Jewish racial minorities,

Any dictionary will provide as one of the definitions of the word "minority" the following: "A racial, religious or political group that differs from the large, controlling group." Although there's no dictionary description for the word "minorityism," I composed the following definition of the term for use in my book, The Late Great Book: The Bible:

> A raging social disease; one of the four horsemen of the modern American apocalypse: Marxism, Freudianism, Liberalism, and MINORITYISM.

American minorityism involves several politically and/or numerically significant—and, to a considerable degree, unassimilable—racial groups that differ largely from the white Gentile majority population. The social disease of minorityism rears its ugly head when the majority is literally held hostage by large numbers of minority members who consider themselves to be anointed victim groups—i.e., professional victims of "social injustice."

The victim's complex, rooted in self-pity and self-righteousness, always results in a seething resentment against society. Recent charges made by a member of the Black Employees Association of Los Angeles exemplify that resentment: "We as Black people are 'married' to racism, and we are 'estranged' in that marriage when we watch the White power structure victimize us and our children." Also worth considering are the comments of minority activist and columnist, Rodolfo Acuña. Within 11 years, he predicts, 90 percent of the state prison population of California will be "people of color," meaning, Blacks and Latinos. Why? They will be "victims of Gov. (George) Deukmejian's policies"—not of their own actions. (Italics added.)

Minorityism is nurtured by a litany of holier-than-thou excuses for, and justification of, minority crimes, failures and overt racist activities. There isn't an American citizen, regardless of race or religion, who hasn't been conditioned to believe that Blacks, Jews, Asians, Indians, and Latinos have been discriminated against, and persecuted by, White Americans. Consequently, no public discussion of minority problems is ever free of frequent references to racial oppression, societal neglect, unemployment, single family homes, welfare dependency, hopelessness, boredom, and depression. along with the lack of availability to the best neighborhoods and the right country clubs–and on and on, to the point of inanity.

Why are so many Blacks and Browns doing poorly in school? Why are so many of them incapable of grasping the fruits of educational achievement? Why has low achievement for Blacks and Browns become an expectancy? "Institutionalized racism!" charges Los Angeles school board member, Jackie Goldberg. Regardless of how much money is pumped into the educational system solely for the purpose of educating and socializing the "underclass," it seems that the underclass always wind up on the short end of achievement because they're "denied equal access to a balanced and enriched curriculum."

From another educational source, we hear that more minority teachers are needed to serve as role models. Why? "Minority students can be best educated by minority teachers." Really? Weren't we told a few years back that minority students could be best educated if they were sitting beside White students in integrated classrooms? But then, as I recall, something untoward happened. Suddenly, there weren't enough "little white bodies to go around," as Judge "forced busing" Eggly commented in a Los Angeles courtroom. And just as suddenly, some new excuses had to be invented.

As if public education isn't screwed well beyond the sticking point as it is, contemplate the case of Sally Peterson, a kindergarten teacher with 25 years of experience in elementary classrooms, who made the mistake of suggesting that the approach to bilingual education should be changed. "I'm not opposed to bilingual education," she explained, "I just want to reform it." BANG! Charges of racism immediately erupted within the unhallowed halls of the school system in Sun Valley, a suburb of Los Angeles. And before you could say Schickelgruber, 50 Latino parents were marching outside her school carrying swastika posters and charging that she was hurting their children.

"Tragically, laws alone cannot eliminate the prejudicial attitude toward certain minorities in our society," laments a California university study. The report advised that, since the days are long gone when college students were predominantly White, ethnic study courses, required like English and history, should be part of the undergraduate curriculum. The study also recommends that minority faculties should be increased—even though it's common knowledge that few students attend classes taught by minority professors. The further point is made that all teachers should be trained to instruct students of different backgrounds, cultures, socio-economic levels and ability, so they'll be able to recognize and nurture the specific and distinct package of racial strengths that each minority group would bring to the classroom. WOW! This is a job for ROBO-TEACHER! Who else could absorb both the wisdom and prescient insight necessary to do the job, especially considering the fact that native tongues in Los Angeles now number up to 80 different languages.

No doubt our racism-obsessed educators will soon be taking pages from the book of an education officer in Hertfordshire, England. "When the sin is racism," evangelizes Ray Wallace, "age is not a factor." According to the Wallace scheme, all children, even those as young as three, should be given a special file if he or she should utter a racist remark or be involved in a racist incident. The file would then become part of the child's personal record and follow him throughout his educational career. (Good show! Nip the little racist buggers in the bud, as it were.)

The message instilled in minority communities via the inundation of absolution delineated above is clear: "You're not responsible for anything that goes wrong at home or at school. If you fall short on any score, blame anybody or anything but yourself. Drop out of school; turn to crime, or live on welfare; and let somebody else sort it all out."

Appeasement and absolution notwithstanding, minority crime has been on the increase in America for decades, with law enforcement statistics now revealing that Black Americans, in particular, a mere 11 percent of the population, commit nearly 50 percent of most violent crimes, and well over 50 percent of the rapes. Is there any other country on earth—excluding those involved in civil wars—in which so small a minority commits enough violence to hold an entire nation hostage? Portions of every big city in America are now in a state of anarchy—and law enforcement appears to be helpless in the face of this assault.

The Big Apple is the rottenest in the barrel of American cities. The comments of prominent New Yorkers bear this out. Ex-mayor John Lindsay, for one: "Now we are living in the most devastating climate of fear of Blacks we have ever known." And Mary Mohler, editor of Ladies Home Journal, for another: "It's the absolute filth all over the place, the new heights of rudeness. And nowhere is racial tension so bad, and yet so untalked about."

One of the more ghoulish incidents of racial violence in Sludge City occurred in April of this year. A 28-year-old woman was assaulted by Black teenagers, some of them as young as 14, while she was jogging in Central Park. They ran her down, hit her with a brick and a lead pipe, raped, slashed and left her for dead, with two-thirds of the blood drained from her body. As of this writing, the victim's identity hasn't been revealed, probably because she's White, perhaps even Jewish—and, undoubtedly, an ultra-liberal who believed that her aura of all-encompassing tolerance for the minorities would protect her from the chaos and cruelty in urban America.

At least eight teenagers were originally arrested; and even while they were singing and rapping in their jail cells, excuses were being invented for their savagery. "They have the wolf of indignation in their bellies," the apologists plaintively avowed. "They're hungry, not for food or shelter, but for acceptance. They're raging because they feel rejected, humiliated, shut out of the good life." Should we apply the word EVIL to their acts? Heavens no. That would focus attention on the evildoers, and distance them from the rest of us; and that would be unfair, since we ALL share the same motives, drives, and pathologies that motivate the inflicting of terrible suffering on our fellow humans.

Good Lord! Talk about undergoing "too strict a paradox,/ Striving to make an ugly deed look fair..." (With apologies to the noble Bard.)

The fact that racial tension is so bad and yet so untalked about in N.Y.C., is because of today's anti-reason climate regarding anything racially disquieting that doesn't point directly to non-ethnic Whites. Young Blacks are raging because they've been indoctrinated to believe that they're VICTIMS–"outcasts in a society that calls itself democratic and egalitarian; social pariahs who can never be successful because of their color." The conclusion of the "victims" they're entitled to be violent and murderous is the next logical step in the scenario of minorityism.

Way out West, life isn't a whole hell of a lot better. Black and Latino gangs have roamed the streets of Los Angeles like Road Warriors for decades, slaughtering people at will. Despite all attempts to limit gang activities, their numbers have increased, the power of their weapons has increased, their involvement with drugs has increased, and the number of their victims has increased. Throughout Los Angeles County, there were a record 452 gang slayings in 1988. And during the first 3 months of this year, 78 men, women and children were shot, stabbed or bludgeoned to death by gangs in the county. One of the youngest scalps collected by the gangbangers was that of a 2-year-old Pasadena girl riding with her mother and grandmother. She was killed by a flurry of gunshots fired into their vehicle.

Apart from the gangs, violence against women is widespread in Black America. Ponder the chilling words of R. Masada, Chairwoman of the Daughters of Zion: "Virtually all of the institutions in the Black community are controlled by men who are mute when it comes to speaking out on violence against women...My experience as a journalist revealed this startling revelation: Every 18 seconds a Black female is sexually or physically assaulted and beaten, or murdered by a Black male in America. Black women are terrorized into keeping silent about it. They are told this is 'in-house' business." That same "in-house" attitude was in effect when Idi Amin was in power. It was nearly impossible to find a single Black leader who would even whisper a word of criticism about the African cannibal king.

And how is the national racial quandary being handled by the Establishment Press? With liberal doses of appeasement, in tandem with the journalistic "in-house" posture of "speak no evil of the minorities." Indeed, the harshest editorial I've read in any Los Angeles newspaper regarding gang savagery, was in the Herald Examiner: "Something awful is happening in Los Angeles," whined the editorial. (Well, tsk, tsk!)

Imagine for a moment the screams of outrage that would emanate from every liberal-minority pulpit in the country if just one drive-by shooting by a few White skinheads resulted in the death of a child or a pregnant woman. There would be no pleas for funds to provide recreational, tutorial and personal-growth opportunities for the disadvantaged kids who became neo-Nazis, or to broaden job training opportunities for them. There would be no excusing them as victims of society's failures. And they certainly wouldn't be depicted as societal victims on film and television as are the lives of Crips and Bloods.

The nation would be inundated instead with newspaper editorials and television specials agonizing over the shocking outbreak of White supremacist violence; his eminence Walter Cronkite would probably unretire long enough to sonorously intone on network TV about "the specter of racism stalking the land of the free and the home of the brave;" and, from sea to shining sea, the smug righteousness of the liberal-minority Coalition would reign supreme. Totally ignored throughout this media feeding frenzy would be the fact that there are probably no more than 2000 so-called White supremacists in all of America.

Also ignored would be the fact that the number of crimes committed by 160 million Caucasians are proportionately trivial when compared with the number of crimes committed by minority groups composing much smaller percentages of the population. Are these startling statistical disparities indicative to any degree of the likelihood that non-White cultures, wherever they may prevail, are still in the limbo between savagery and civilization? Like it or not, the findings of sociologists and criminologists who are probing the criminal mind are imbued with this devastating implication. More and more of the scientists involved in these studies are reaching the conclusion that the direct cause of criminal behavior is criminal thinking. People become criminals not in response to forces beyond their control, but by choice. (Beware! In a minoritiocracy such as ours, scientific evaluations of this nature are considered heretical.)

Always in sync with non-heretical points of view, his mayoral majesty, Tom Bradley, recently elected for four more jaded, and self-serving years in Los Angeles, displays remarkable equanimity when confronted with the city's crime, drug and gang problems, gridlock conditions on the streets and freeways, runaway economic growth, pollution and homelessness, along with an ever-increasing number of illegal aliens, as the declining quality of life in "The City of Angels" rapidly approaches that of an untended zoo. Hizzoner's only recent outbreak of indignation was aimed at the American majority-held view that Japanese ownership of American plants is an economic threat, describing it as an attitude that contains "a dangerous strain of racism...that at its worst...must be rebutted."

Characteristically, any criticism of the alien invasion problems facing the country, or efforts to minimize the problems, are always "rebutted" with charges of racism or barbs of ridicule. The statements of the first health experts who warned that dangerous diseases were being carried by undocumented aliens were dismissed as being motivated by bigotry. From then on, health workers were too intimidated to speak out. The four-mile fortified ditch being built along the border to interdict vehicular drug traffic has been called an "underground Berlin Wall." The decision to erect a tent city in Bayview, Texas, to house Central American immigrants and speed up the weeding out of frivolous claims about persecution, has been condemned as "racist"—with the Catholic Bishops of Texas declaring that they foresaw "the creation of the largest concentration camp on U.S. soil." These are the same people who preach that "a farseeing God will never allow world population to get out of control."

"Remember Immigration Reform? It failed!" enthused an editorial in the Los Angeles Herald Examiner. The reference is to the Immigration Reform and Control Act enacted in 1986. That policy is almost completely in tatters, according to the editorial, since many illegals clearly continue to find work despite the employer sanctions; and since the flood of illegals across the border has not significantly abated.

Naturally, Herald editorialists advise that, rather than trying to keep illegals out, we should be concerned with how best to allow them to come in. (So what else is new?)

The failure of the IRCA is understandable. Overly concerned about complaints from the business community, the gutless wonders in Washington, D.C., injected the legislation with an appeasement virus; and by the time the ink was dry, the bill was terminally ill. The immigration law demands that employers check job applicants documentation proving either citizenship or legal residency in the country. BUT—they don't have to verify those credentials. Ergo, before you could say "presto-chango," the energetic small business known as the "counterfeit document industry" mushroomed into a Fortune 500 contender. On any street corner in certain parts of any major U.S. city today, these phony documents can be purchased: Social Security card, $10-20; birth certificate, $50-100; alien registration card, $20-40; temporary residency card, $30.

How many illegals are there in the U.S. today? The bureaucrats love to play fast and loose with the figures; so who really knows? But we can speculate. In a mere 20 years, Latinos within the Los Angeles school district's student population increased from 20 percent to nearly 60 percent, a jump far exceeding that which would have been the normal Latino-American birthrate during those years. There have been an estimated one million unlawful entries into the country each year for nearly two decades, with approximately 90 percent of them crossing the line stretching over about 200 miles of the border with Mexico. As an example of the tiniest tip of a gigantic iceberg of illegals—with more coming every day—the following incident is worthy of more than casual rumination: A raid on a Los Angeles depot in the underground railroad used by smugglers occurred in February of this year. Acting on a phone tip, sheriff's deputies found 45 illegals crammed into a barren three-bedroom house in an outlying Los Angeles community. The 43 men, one woman and one infant were from Mexico, Guatemala, Ecuador, Honduras and Nicaragua.

Residents of Los Angeles should be thrilled to know that demographers now estimate that by the year 2000, nearly 40 percent of the city's population will be Latino; and Anglos—like Blacks and Asians—will be just another minority. The Tijuanazation of El Pueblo de Nuestra Señora La Reina de Los Angeles will be well on the way to completion.

Meanwhile, alien criminals are giving the Sicilian/Jewish Mafia a race for its loot, since the Cosa Nostra is no longer the premier criminal industry in the country. We Americans are now the proud possessors of crime families from the four corners of the globe. The South Americans are particularly inventive. One criminal cartel is composed of platoons of members, with many of them having been trained in the School of Seven Bells pickpocket academy in Bogota. Aware of all the cracks in the ridiculously complex American legal system, they fan out over the country like hordes of locusts, cashing stolen traveler's checks, and stealing clothing, gems, cash, precious metals—you name it. They carry false identity papers from Mexico, Puerto Rico, and other countries. If arrested they simply post bond and jump bail—time after time. Without weapons of any kind, they are succeeding in the kind of criminal rape that would be impossible in any other country but America. Another army of alien criminals, mostly from Columbia, has turned Los Angeles into the drug distribution center for the country.

The Nigerians are fairly enterprising, too. Half a dozen of them defrauded stores from coast to coast out of hundreds of thousands of dollars with worthless checks and forged credit cards. In Charlotte (NC), this petite crime family took 7 banks for $50,000, and local merchants for $25,000.

Apparently, Washington D.C. has decreed that no criminal organization on earth will be denied access to the vast supermarket of goodies known as the United States. Indeed, we Americans—the world's first equal opportunity victims—are in the enviable position of being available for mugging, robbing, raping and murdering by almost anybody from almost anywhere. (Isn't integration wonderful?)

And what are we Caucasians—160 million strong—doing while our civilization crumbles around us? Well...if we lump together all the turn-the-other-cheek Christians, the arrogant liberals, the timid conservatives, and the left-wing freaks of every color of the rainbow, we'll find that very few of us remain who aren't nurturing minorityism with repressive tolerance—the kind of tolerance that shouldn't be tolerated: undeserved tolerance rooted in the personal guilt and shame felt by so many white Gentiles who have been conditioned to believe that this society has failed to understand the problems of the minorities and to meet their needs. Across the American Establishment board—politics, religion, education, communications, entertainment—Caucasians submit to, and support, the claims and the complaints of the always oppressed and disadvantaged minorities. Socially, politically and morally, the cards always seem to be stacked in their favor.

The elimination of IQ tests in California is a prime example of how the deck is rigged via minorityism. Prior to 1970, state law permitted giving standardized group intelligence tests to students. But the continuing failure of Blacks and Browns to score well on the tests sent shockwaves through the liberal-minority community and in no time at all new legislation prohibited such testing—except for students who appear to be gifted and talented. In other words, only those students who indicate that they will do well on the IQ score are tested. That's like having four aces up your sleeve when you enter the game.

Not surprisingly, the principle of racial maximization—the ability of minority groups to do their own deck-stacking—reaches its apex with the organized activities of American Jewry. From a Jewish Council in every major American city, to the American Jewish Committee, to the American Jewish Congress, to the United Jewish Appeal, many Yiddish organizations blanket the United States. There is even a Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. The payoff: Jewish leaders are always in touch with whatever is going on throughout the country that might affect Jewry in general and Israel in particular. Even the slightest outbreak of Gentile discontent regarding Jewish excesses—a letter to an editor, for instance, criticizing the use of excessive force on the West Bank—results in scores of letters from both Jewish organization officials and average Jewish citizens countering the charge with exaggerated rhetoric.

One lengthy response to a letter favoring a separate Palestinian state to occupy the West Bank demanded, in effect, that American critics get off Israel's back, since U.S. history is no better. "The U.S. is American Indian country taken by force from the indigenous population," charged the incensed correspondent. "The Jews have a historical and biblical and therefore legal right to the land of Israel." Really? What then of the Canaanites and Philistines who occupied Palestine long before a desert tribe of primitive Semites, who later came to be known as Israelites, wandered across the Jordan river?

Even ultra-liberal Paul Conrad, political cartoonist for the Los Angeles Times, got blistered when he aimed his acid-tipped pen at Israeli soldiers slaughtering Palestinian teenagers armed only with stones. The Times was deluged with critical correspondence, many of them form letters. (Out of all letters, 12 were friendly.) Beyond that measure of protest, Jewish anger expanded into overt intimidation, boycotts, and even threats to picket Conrad's home.

I'm reminded at this point of an incident that occurred prior to the New York City primary when Jimmy Carter was running for re-election. For some innocuous reason or other, Carter wasn't quite in full favor with the Israeli lobby. At a pre-election campaign rally, a nearly-shrieking Jewish harridan rose to her feet to exclaim—" Every Jew in power should use his influence to keep Carter on the line!" Now, HOW, I wonder, are American politicians, even presidential candidates, kept ON THE LINE? The Jerusalem Post frankly admits that American Jews control Congressional members by threatening to cut off their financial Support. With characteristic candor, however, former Prime Minister of Israel, Menahem Begin, lays it on the line: "The strength of the Jews is such that Washington quails before us." The little words under Begin's big words come across loud and clear: Politicians who can be bought so cheaply, or intimidated so easily, are not worthy of respect. (Right on!)

The degree to which the American Establishment knuckles under to the "strength of the Jews" is evident in the manner in which the Israeli occupation of Palestine is deliberately ignored. Around the time of the election of George Bush last fall, Israeli soldiers outdid themselves on the West Bank by murdering a 5-year-old boy. Three days later, they broke that record with the murder of a 3-year-old. Were there any comments from the Bush campaign? (Do frogs croon in June?)

During the first 17 days of 1989, 26 Palestinians were shot and killed by the Israelis—9 younger than 16, with the youngest being 11. Two were girls, ages 12 and 15. Of the rest, only 4 were out of their teens. In all of America, not one political voice, democrat or republican, liberal or conservative, and not one Christian voice, from the invincibly ignorant Catholic hierarchy to money-grubbing Evangelists, pronounced a single word of criticism about holier-than-thou Israel. What better proof is needed to demonstrate that both American politics and religion are held hostage by Jewish intimidation?

Jewish racism is also enhanced by what might be labeled the principle of preventive anti-Semitism via the existence of two powerful watchdog organizations: the Anti-Defamation League and the Jewish Defense League. An anti-Black Violence League, for instance, along with an anti-Jewish Racism League, would imply that all Blacks are potentially violent and all Jews are potential racists. Similarly, the existence of the Jewish organizations cited above implies that all Americans are potential anti-Semites, even those who appear to be pro-Semite at any given time. Hence, powerful anti-defamatory leagues are necessary for the purpose of spotting and eliminating brush fires of bigotry wherever they may erupt.

This eternal vigilance includes the collection of files on thousands of individuals who have crossed into the no-man's-or woman's-land of anti-Semitism. Remember Vanessa Redgrave and her encounter with world Zionism when she narrated a documentary supporting the establishment of a Palestinian homeland? "Oh, we have a file on her activities," an ADL spokesman casually admitted when Redgrave entered the U.S. to attend an academy awards ceremony a few years back. Was Redgrave really a threat to world Zionism? No complaints, by the way, from the bleeding hearts of Hollywood about McCarthyism. (Minorityism strikes again!)

Even Jews are not exempt under the provisions of the preventive anti-bigotry principle. In the history of American broadcasting, no program has done more favorable stories about Israel than the CBS video magazine, "60 Minutes." But it isn't what you've done lately, that counts; it's what you're doing now. Last fall, "60 Minutes" devoted a segment to criticizing the America Israel Political Affairs Committee (AIPAC), because the powerful lobbying group was funneling tens of thousands of dollars into a campaign to fill the seat of Rhode Island Senator John Chafee with Jewish democrat, Richard Licht. Since Chafee had proved himself to be a sound friend of Israel, "60 Minutes" had the temerity to ask why he was being treated like an enemy.

The AIPAC representative was introduced by Mike Wallace as a Rabbi Miller, who, in turn, was as noncommittal as possible in response to Wallace's questions; but his eyes spoke volumes—a burning resentment seldom seen in television interviewees. "How can you, Mike Wallace, a Jew," charged those eyes, "do this to your fellow Jews!?!" Following the program Don Hewitt, the show's producer, who also happens to be Jewish, was savaged by AIPAC criticism. His response, in part: "...hollering about 'anti-Semitism' at anyone who has an honest disagreement with you trivializes, demeans and makes a mockery of 'anti-Semitism.'" It would appear that an "honest" disagreement with Jews over their beliefs and policies is impossible. One must agree totally with them, or be considered an enemy. Could this be one of the reasons why Jews have been criticized and even condemned throughout the ages?

And that brings us to some intriguing questions...

If there's nothing wrong with the lobbying methods employed by Jewish organizations, and nothing questionable about the source of monies used to finance these activities, why do Jews insist on operating in virtual secrecy? If there's nothing wrong with the reasoning and the statistics used to justify Holocaust claims, why do Jews object to open debates on the subject with people who assert that the claims and statistics are exaggerated? Similarly, no open debate is allowed regarding the practices of two rabbinical groups that collect thousands of tax-exempt dollars each year from the producers of household items—virtually everything from Comet to Yoghurt—for the right to bless those items, thereby making them acceptable for purchase by Jews. The "K" found on some of the items indicates approval by the Committee for the Furtherance of Torah Observances; and the "U" on other items by the Union of Orthodox Congregations. Is this, or is this not, a form of religious blackmail that favors one racial group to the exclusion of other racial and religious communities in America?

For 3000 years, the Jews tell us over and over again, they have been persecuted and discriminated against, solely because of their religious values. But is there more to this story? Organized racism, perhaps, of the kind practiced in the U.S.? Undisguised contempt for all other races, perhaps (according to rabbinical teachings, Jews were blessed with 9 of the 10 measures of wisdom the Ancient of Days gave to the world)? Obnoxious arrogance, perhaps, of the kind that demands special privileges not available to Gentiles? Racial nepotism, perhaps, guaranteeing that Jews will be over-represented on college and university faculties, and in government employment, book and magazine publishing, movies, television and the media?

A prime example of racial nepotism at work was uncovered during the Kissinger/Nixon administration. It seems that President Nixon learned about a "Jewish Cabal" infesting the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Of the 35 top positions in the Bureau, 13 were held by Jews–a number ten times their proportion of the population. Under normal conditions of retiring, firing and hiring, this racial imbalance could never have occurred. Nixon ordered an investigation that resulted in at least two of the Jews being transferred to different areas of the government. And who got blamed in the end? Jews, who saw to it that only Jews got most of the available jobs? Or Nixon, for anti-Semitism?

You guessed it! Hundreds of millions of dollars are collected each year by the United Jewish Appeal and other organizations (Israeli bond salesmen raised a record $631 million in 1988) for the exclusive use of a foreign country, Israel. Among wealthy Jews, there are some who frequently brag about contributing a million or more dollars per year to Israel. The obvious consequence of these enviable tax deductions, is that a good deal of tax money that should be paid to the U.S. government is drained off because of the special tax privileges granted to American Jewry. Even the Mafia's numero uno Associate, Meyer Lansky, always donated part of his yearly portion of skim money from Las Vegas casinos to Israel—after it had been carefully laundered, of course, so he could take advantage of the tax write-off.

There is much evidence—both historical and current—to indicate that Jews have never been able to walk with contempt lightly. Best exemplifying Jewish arrogance are the events that occurred following the devastating defeat of the Arabs in the 6-day-war in 1967. All over the world, the Jewish people crowed over their conquest. In Los Angeles, a film industry victory celebration was staged at the Hollywood bowl. The portion of the program I heard on a local radio station included the telling of a joke by the late character actor, Ross Martin (of "Wild, Wild West" fame), an orthodox Jew. It seems that an Arab army is about to invade Israel. Suddenly, a single bayonet appears above a sand dune at an Israeli outpost in the distance. Two scouts are dispatched to investigate. Before long, they can be seen running back, frantically waving their arms, and shouting, "Retreat! Retreat! There are TWO of them!" Needless to say, the joke was received with much hilarity.

To the Arab, shame is a living death—although nobody in our minoritiocracy seems to give a damn. The latest success of the officious Jewish lobby, by the by, is the forcing of PBS to back away from airing the documentary, "Days of Rage: The Young Palestinians."

As surprising as it may seem, most Americans have never heard a single objective critical word about the ethnic nation within our nation. They aren't aware that approximately 90 percent of American Jews, as Jewish writer James Yaffe informs us, will only hire Jewish lawyers and doctors. Logically, this code of behavior—selling to Gentiles but only buying from Jews—rather than being restricted to Law and Medicine, is probably applied across the professional board from Accountants to Wedding Supplies. (Would anyone care to speculate about how many Jews would be out of work if Gentiles lived by this same code?) Another Jewish writer has reported that at least 50 percent of the Marxist-oriented Students for a Democratic Society were Jewish. In other words, there were hordes of young Jerry Rubin's and Abby Hoffman's screaming "F—k a nun!" and "Revolution for the hell of it!" on university campuses during the 1960s.

From the atom bomb spies to literary terrorists who describe white Gentiles as "the cancer of the human race," and "humanities greatest criminals," Jews, far out of proportion to their population numbers, have been in the forefront of many of the movements dedicated to "achieving radical structural changes" (euphemism for a crusade to create a Socialist Worker's State) in the United States. Among the longest surviving members of the violent Weathermen group of radicals—a spin-off from SDS—were 3 Jews: Susan Saxe, Bernadette Dorne and Kathy Boudin. Who, I wonder, taught these young women to hate America? (Would anyone care to speculate on how long a Caucasian Lenny Bruce, or Abby Hoffman, or Susan Saxe, would last in Israel?)

Throughout history, Jews have been expelled from numerous countries—from Spain, for instance, in the 15th century. Why Spain? Could a 14th century book used to instruct all Jewish children Spain in the belief that non-Jews ought to be the slaves of Jews "because Jews are the elite of the human race and were specially created to give homage to God" have had anything to do with the expulsion? Dr. Israel Shahak, a citizen of Israel, writes that the Israelis have resuscitated that very same 14th century book for use as a manual of religious instruction in secondary schools.

As prophets exhorting their nation to do better, Israeli citizens are much less constrained in their censure than their racial relations in America. Amnon Rubenstein, a severe critic of the undemocratic posture of Israel, has complained in his writings about the Israeli Writers' Union refusing to accept Arab authors because of their origins; about the Israeli law defining the citizenship rights according to the test of the grandfather and grandmother; and about the Chief Rabbi declaring that the rules of justice and equality do not apply to Gentiles.

Consider, too, the words of a sensitive young Israeli couple interviewed on the network TV documentary, "Fortress Israel," a few years back. They freely—but somberly—admitted that their children were attending state-controlled schools where they were being "taught to hate Arabs." Their exact words: TAUGHT TO HATE ARABS. According to even the narrowest definition of Human Rights, it's evident that the Zionist character of much basic Israeli law makes discrimination a matter of national politics; and since the one hundred million or so Arabs in the world are Semites, it also means that the state of Israel is officially anti-Semitic.

Just one of the tragic results of the appeasing of non-Whites and Jews in America is the fact that the minorities are virtually never subjected to censure or even moderate criticism. Censorship by intimidation not only prevents the majority of the American people from hearing the kind of criticism set forth in this article, it also prevents the many decent minority members from criticizing the excesses of their own people.

A moment now for a few words about two of the most dedicated adherents to minorityism in the U.S., the morally bankrupt media, and the Hollywood film industry.

I touched briefly on the media earlier; but it occurs to me that something needs to be said about the rather simplistic charge that the media is liberal controlled and anti-conservative. There are a number of conservatives within the media—albeit, not the kind who would give the time of day to Barry Goldwater. Nonetheless, it would be more to the point, I think, to describe media people as being motivated by "correctivism"—the inclination to say and do those things that are acceptable in the eyes of the liberal-minority influenced Establishment; and to attack only those targets that are safe and conventional: racial segregation in South Africa; White supremacy; skinhead neo-Nazism, etc. In sum, media members look good, appear virtuous, and it costs them nothing to always be on the side of integrationists, egalitarians, radical activists of the left, gays, abortionists, feminists—and, naturally, the always wronged and never wrong, minorities.

Part and parcel of this carefully honed bias on the part of the media is the continuing emphasis on White racism, while always ignoring minority racism. By giving the impression that racism doesn't exist among non-Whites and Jews, media members regularly betray the trust of the nation as a whole, as well as mocking the values of Caucasians by misrepresenting them before the entire nation. This social-distorting propaganda contributes to the ever-present odious double standard regarding racial pride and racial self-interest. White groups emphasizing racial unity are condemned as "divisive." Minority groups emphasizing racial unity are considered "unifying." White groups dare not claim that their culture is unique; that would be "chauvinistic." When minority groups make the same claim, it is called "ethnic pride." The majority must tolerate and understand minority values and customs; while the minority can proclaim that its soul is beyond the comprehension of majority members, who are blinded by racism. (Honky joke: How should Caucasians state publicly that they are proud to be White? Verrrrrry quietly!)

Now to Hollywood—that minorityized cesspool where old-fashioned values such as decency and fairness are about as rare as alligators without teeth. From "The General Died at Dawn" (1935), in which an American soldier of fortune strikes a White man for using a racial slur to describe Chinese peasants...to "Souls at Sea" (1939), a film dealing with the shipping of Black slaves to America, and in which the bottom of the sea is described as "being paved with the bones of Africans"...to "Gentleman's Agreement," and numerous other flics dealing with anti-Semitism in the 40s and 50s...to an endless parade of anti-Fascist movies including, "We Were Strangers," the fight against a dictator in Cuba; "Keeper of the Flame," a scenario involving a national hero who, unbeknownst to the millions who idolize him, is an incipient Nazi; and "The Fallen Sparrow," a story about a returning hero who fought in Spain—on, of course, the right side...to the many productions like "Betrayed," "Mississippi Burning," and the latest Don Johnson potboiler, "Dead Bang," in which the attempt is made to link Americanism with racism and Nazism—Hollywood has preached integration, anti-Fascism and ultra-liberalism.

To this long and triumphant crusade against right-wing (never left-wing) evils can be added countless portrayals of Nazis of every stripe and hue, and a continuing parade of Holocaust productions (in October of 1988, 4 Holocaust movies opened at about the same time in New York City) carrying the message of Jewish "Tragedy and Remembrance." Hollywood has plumbed the most perverse depths of dishonesty and hypocrisy, however, by deliberately manipulating both fiction and fact in order to placate the biases of the film-making community in particular and the minorities in general.

In the novel "Gone With The Wind," the potential rapist of Scarlett O'Hara was a Black carpetbagger. In the film, the character was changed to a White Union soldier. A two-hour segment of the "Eischeid" series, starring Joe Don Baker, was obviously inspired by the Son of Sam killings in New York City. The killer in the TV production, however, was portrayed as a light-haired Anglo, even though the actual Son of Sam, David Berkowitz, was Jewish. A "Hill Street Blues" segment was loosely based on the Los Angeles Night Stalker murder case, for which the alleged criminal, Richard Ramirez, is now being tried. Once again, the killer was portrayed as a Caucasian.

It would have been too obvious to transform the Black child killer of Atlanta into a white Gentile; so Hollywood did the next best thing in the docu-drama filmed about the case. The production portrayed the Black officials of Atlanta as Uncle Toms railroading Wayne Williams into a rush to judgement conviction that would pacify the White community.

"Oh, my God, he stabbed me! Please help me!" These were among the last few words screamed by Kitty Genovese into the early morning silence of a New York Street. She was a 28-year-old bar manager on her way home in the wee, small hours of the morning, when she met a Black man bent on rape and murder. Over a period of a full half-hour, she was raped and stabbed 8 times—fatally. The case received national notoriety because there were 58 people in the neighborhood who witnessed part of the drama, but did nothing. Naturally, Hollywood jumped on the bandwagon with a film production about the tragedy. And, guess what? The killer was changed from Black to White; he was also portrayed as the rapist of Black women; and the detective who hunted him down was Puerto Rican. (How they must have loved this flic behind the Iron and Bamboo curtains.)

The latest example of Hollywood mind-bending, "The Accused," starring Academy Award winner Jodie Foster, was patterned on events that took place in an Eastern bar—a gang rape in front of a crowd of cheering spectators. The actual rapists were described as Portuguese-speaking aliens, whether from Brazil or Portugal, I don't know. Not that it matters, since both countries are macho-lands where gang-rape registers very little higher than shoplifting on the scale of criminality. The cultural factors in this case, which are enormously significant, since so many aliens believe they can get away with doing in America what they do back home, were ignored; and the rapists were portrayed as clean-cut Caucasians—a decision certain to generate greater profits for the movie moguls from the lucrative, world-wide, "Hate America" market.

Will Hollywood film the sordid "Joel Steinberg/Hedda Nussbaum Chronicle?" Bet on it. But it'll probably be called the "Joe Smith/Letta Jones Caper." To be sure, the couple will be Caucasian—with the disease of racism deeply buried in their psyches; the illegally adopted child will be Black; and the wise, and wonderfully warm psychiatrist who explains how the subconscious racism manifested itself in the brutalization and ultimate murder of the child, will be Jewish. (That's entertainment!)

"Racism: Screams of Hatred, Tears of Despair!" and "Pockets of Hate: U.S. Racial Violence and Discrimination!"—are typical of the sensationalist signs of our racially-obsessed times. In abstract principle, how wonderful it would be if this were the best of all possible racially integrated worlds. But this isn't the best of all world. We don't believe in abstract principle. We live in a world in which all peoples prefer ethnic homogebeity. Their individual judgements, convictions and interests dictate that they are more comfortable in racially uniform surroundings. And what of the moral justification involved? Shouldn't all human relationships be voluntary? Sure—in any country but America, where the minorities, deluded by the notions that they have a monopoly on anger and truth...that they are the only peoples in the world who have ever suffered...and that they are all VICTIMS—are convinced that they should be handed total racial equality and social acceptance on the proverbial silver platter.

Be it known to all and sundry, however, that racial segregation is A-OK for those minority members who desire it: the Harlem Globetrotters; the entire NBA of the near future (curious, isn't it, that basketball teams don't have to be integrated to be successful); and minority cults like the Organization of American Cultures, a newly established arts lobbying group, which has the backing of some elements of the National Endowment for the Arts. In the group's multi-colored eyes, the only true American cultures are Black, Latino, Asian and Indian. Ergo, White members are flatly rejected. Even federally approved apartheid is okay for Indian tribes. Originally settled on the same reservation, the Hopi and Navajo peoples were never able to integrate. Hence, millions of federal dollars were spent to ensure that 2,650 Navajo and 24 Hopi families could live apart, free of conflict and violence. With wisdom and logic, Teddy Kollech, the mayor of Jerusalem, best describes the normal desires of most human beings regarding apartheid—a word meaning simply the separate development of culture. Interviewed on the CBS program "48 Hours" in 1988, Mayor Kollech provided this frank assessment of segregation: "Different races should be kept separated. People want to be with their own...hear their own language, smell the cooking of their own food. Personally, I wouldn't mind living next to an Arab. But—it wouldn't work."

Would Teddy Kollech make this statement if he was an American citizen? Not on your life. The racial double standard in America has led to a reinterpretation of the much tarnished Golden Rule: "Do unto Caucasians that which you will not allow them to do unto you."

The "civilizing process"—the increase of individual responsibility among the human species—has developed to the greatest degree in Western societies. The basic principles of a rational view of existence, everything that contributes to what we call civilization, all of the values that we possess, have been defined in the Western world. Everything that contributes to minority successes in the West—sports, film and television, the recording, amplification and broadcasting of sound, the language and instruments of music, the birth of science, the English language, as well as the great universities, libraries and laboratories, in concert with ever-expanding technological developments—are all rooted in the efficacy of the white Gentile mind. (To the reader whose hackles may be reaching erections at this moment, I say that truth is not now, nor has it ever been, racist or bitgoted.)

But the ruling Establishment of the Western world likes to pretend in the name of good fellowship and tolerance that these historical facts do not exist, or—are no longer relevant. Both the appeasing Caucasian and the intimidative minorityite spend their lives pretending that they do live in abstract principle. To pacify their feelings, they deny what their knowledge tells them.

Only the small-souled person will deny his own achievements, or pretend that they don't exist; only the empty-souled person will betray his own self-esteem by seeking justifications for his failures in the psychic torment supposedly caused by social conditions beyond his control. No one can have rational pride in himself and in his moral character if he spends his life compensating for feelings of guilt and shame on the one hand; or wallowing in self-pity and self-righteousness on the other.

The values we live by must be created by standards based on reality. The standards based on minorityism are both hypocritical and unrealistic. Tragically, the ideational content of minorityism has been accepted on faith in America, not because it has ever been right, but because it has been able to fill a vacuum created by moral self-doubt on the part of white Gentiles.

Whenever evil triumphs, it's always by default.

THE LATE GREAT BOOK:THE BIBLE.
AN ACCOUNT OF CHRISTIAN AND BIBLICAL ORIGINS.

Nicholas Carter feels that it is time for us to sit down and do what many Christians rarely do: Study the Holy Bible. In doing so, we may discover whether or not the Bible is indeed "Holy" and the "Word of God." In strict biblical order, the author methodically, and scathingly, examines the various claims made in the "Holy Book" and shows how many of them bear no relationship to reality whatsoever. WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. out to $138 for the whole run. Add $125. for stamps and $12.95 for a ream of envelopes, and that's $273.95 for the entire mailing.

Out other basic expense here at the moment is the recorded White Power Message. The line charge for that is $45. in addition, there is the immense amount of postage necessary for routine mailing, answereing letters, introductory packet requests, etc. I nead at least $500 per month in "disposable income" for political purposes just to keep a fairly small, kitchen-table type operation like the CNC going.

Then there are the special expenses such as bulk runs of leaflets, typesetting new leaflets, printing pamphlets and photocopying certain newspaper and magazine material, etc. Once we get those expenses out of the way, we need money to expand, to install new messages, to acquire rally and march equipment, to enter political campaigns, etc.

Now, am I able to pay for all this myself? Let's take a look. Up until April 5th, 1989, I was earning the highest salary I have ever earned in my life working for a local insurance company—$13,800 per year. On that day one of Benny Klassen's idiots telephoned my employer and spoke with my supervisor. He identified himself as a purported FBI agent, informed my boss of my political past, and then told him that "the Bureau" had information that the JDL was going to storm the company offices and assassinate me with AK-47s. The identity of the man who did this is known to me and I must emphasize that despite official denials from the Otto ashram there is no question whatsoever that the individual in question is guilty; he admitted it to a number of people and boasted about it before Klassen told him to dummy up. The sequel may be imagined; I was out of work as of April 20th. Happy 100th Birthday to our Führer from Benny Klassen.

I have since gotten another job at the princely age of $5.50 per hour. I will leave it to the readers of your pages precisely how much I am able to pay for on this wage after my own bills are taken care of. Those of your readership who are also on my mailing list will have remarked the scarcity of mailings from Raleigh this summer. Now they know why.

Yes, V.G., I am always crying for money,"for the simple reason that neither I, nor George Dietz, nor anyone else can function politically at even the most rudimentary level without funds. I am genuinely curious as to where people like V.G. think the money does come from? I'm not saying that in any patronizing or derogatory way. I would very much appreciate it if Mr. V.G. would contact me personally and explain this to me. Where in God's name (if you'll pardon that expression given its apparently loaded connotations) does V.G. think people like you and I, George, get the money to finance our activities? I would sincerely like to know. Does he believe we have mysterious sources of funding from secret Nazi exile networks in South America? Does he believe we have large networks of followers who do all our printing work for free and who voluntarily lay down rolls of stamps for postage? Does he believe we are independently wealthy? Is it simply the old standby of, "I'm all right, Jack, let the other guy do it?" Is it the old fairy tale about the wise old hen who could get none of the other animals to harvest the grain, mill the flour, knead the dough, or bake the bread—yet they all wanted to eat the bread when it was finally made?

Again I emphasize that this is a serious question and I would very much appreciate hearing from V.G. to try to understand his thought processes and his views on Movement funding. Because if he won't kick in—who will? Where will the money come from? If Mr. V.G. from Michigan has seen something which you or I have overlooked, George, if he has some key to the problem of finance which we don't, then in Heaven's name (oops! Sorry!) let him please come forward with it. I am certainly open for suggestions. Somehow or other we have got to lick this problem, because lest it seem that I am singling V.G. out I need to make it clear that he is by no means alone in his views that somehow our money springs from the earth and forces its way into our bank accounts unasked. I have received many, many letters such as his over the years. I've never understood this point of view and I again respectfully request V.G. to write to me.

Regarding my lawsuit against Benny Klassen and his flunky, Williams, I think the best antidote to all the vapors now floating about on the subject is pure, hard fact. Accordingly, I will send anyone who inquires complete copies of all the legal documents in the case—not slanders, not innuendoes, not rumors, but actual legal documents filed under oath with the Superior Court Civil Division in Macon County, N.C. the cost is $5.00 for copying costs and postage, or $3.75 and $1.25 in postage stamps. I am willing to satisfy the apparently inexhaustible lust for gossip, scandal, and squabbling which pervades this glorious Movement of ours, but I see no reason why I should do so at my own expense. (Yes, that includes you too, V.G. from Michigan!)

If there are those who do not wish to profane their lofty ideals and "encourage" the Horrible Harold, yet who still wish to satisfy their prurient curiosity, they may order copies directly from the Clerk of Court, Macon County, Civil Divison, P.O. Box 288, Franklin, N.C. 28734, Tel. 704-524-6421, during working hours, Eastern time. I'll only charge you six cents per page copying, what I must pay myself, but the Clerk of Court will charge ten cents and there may be other fees. Call and find out first before you order. The case is HAROLD A. COVINGTON, Plaintiff, versus BENNY KLASSEN, WILL W. WILLIAMS, and THE CHURCH OF THE CREATOR, Defendants. The docket and fily number is #89-CVS-144. At present the whole lot consists of my original Bill of Complaint, Williams' rather bizarre "response" to the complaint (Klassen has fled from the state of North Carolina in order to avoid service and tracking him down is going yo be a whole can of worms in itself), and my Request for Production of Documents and First Interrogatories which have already in actual practice finished the whole mess, as you will see when you read them. As in all litigation, the paperwork will accumulate rapidly so all you Movement ghouls out there who groove on this kind of thing should get your orders in and start your collection now—in a few years' time a complete copy of the lawsuit will be worth two DeGuello reports, a Karl Hand denunciation of David Duke, a JIM MASON AND JIM BEAME, and a copy of Bill Wilkinson's FBI file in trade-off value.

Finally, as to V.G.'s hopeful comment that I'll just "float away"—well, as Mark Twain said, "Rumors of my death have been greatly exaggerated."

For Victory,
Harold A. Covington, Box 1321, Raleigh NC 27602

Dear Editor:

Each year before the fourth of July, the master manipulators behind government, and in strict orchestration with the controlled media, perform their artificial patriotism-awakening act on the gullible masses. Last year, it was the magnificent Statue of Liberty hoopla. This year, it was the carefully staged flag-burning decision by the Justice Department's judicial hit squad. Old Glory is the sacred symbol of our great Republic—well, our once great Republic. It is the glorious color that our forefathers fought, died, and sacrificed their all for, for the generations to come. But this generation must ask the question, is it the flag or the nation that stands in desecration? Is this nation worthy of flying such a noble symbol today? I say, no. I have very carefully folded my flag and stored it away in the hope that in my lifetime I will again see the people of this land rise up, regain their honor, do their duty with manly courage, and make America once again "The Land of the Free and the Home of the Brave," and thus become worthy once again of flying the flag for the preservation of which our courageous ancestors fought and died. To fly the Stars and Stripes over alien-controlled America today is a desecration and a demeaning act of treason, to be sure. The flag, worthy of today's "democracy", should be of bright yellow color, symbolizing the treason, cowardice, apathy, and complaceny of the people and their dereliction of duty in allowing their nation to fall into the hands of their mortal enemies. In the center of the bright yellow background should be a scarlet red hammer and sickle superimposed upon a blue Star of David. In the upper left hand corner should be the symbol of the God or Deity we have all been trained and conditioned to worship, the $ sign in green. This is the only flag that should be flown from "Sea to Shining Sea," until our people awaken to a realization of the awful situation they find themselves in today, take back their sovereignty, and once again earn the right to fly Old Glory over the "Grand Republic."

Dear Mr. Dietz,

I gave up reading fiction a long time ago. Nevertheless, I found at a friend's house George Orwell's 1984 and I read it. I was thoroughly disappointed. Moreover, I was confused. I cannot understand why such a book is recommened as good reading. Personally, I would never make such a recommendation to anybody sharing my political ideas. Could a book whose most luminous figure is a "Goldstein" be a good book for us? Could this Orwell, who fought on the republican (communist) side in Spain, be called a visionary? What did he envision for 1984? A Jewish mother is dying under bullets trying to protect her daugther. The ever martyrized "Chosen Ones." He was a stupid and blind Englishman, as stupid and as blind as the rest of his countrymen and related Anglo-Saxon inhabitants of this planet.

I enclose a cheque for renewal to Liberty Bell. Please let my Australian subscription run its course. I hope my friend has enough sense to renew it. By the way, I have been there for four moths and I found the Aussies as blind as their American and English counterparts.

Sincerely,
G.S., Florida

Dear Mr. Dietz:

This is just a short note to renew my subscription and to finally tell you about one item that was the convincer for me that the HOLOHOAX was indeed a phony.

About fourteen years ago I had the opportunity to read a report put out by a suspect organization we know as The National Council of Churches. This item was a census of the world religions in the past. Here is what they reported:

1930–15 million Jews in the world.

1940–No census taken.

1950–15.3 million in the world.

Need I say more?

Regretfully, I did not retain a clipping on the following from the New York Times: (Approximately June 1978)

It seems that (in the story which was buried on page 43) that a Meyer Levin, who had authored a novel called Compulsion, was sueing an individual by the name of Otto Frank for the balance of funds that he (Levin) had been contracted for in the period 1949-1950 to write Anne Frank's Diary. This suit was filed in Federal District Court in Albany and was settled for about $35,000.00, which was the sum owed.

Although this item was not mentioned in the Times article, the original manuscript for the Diary was handwritten using a ball-point pen which was not even invented until 1950.

Thank you for your excellent publication.

Very truly yours,
C.B., New Jersey

Dear Sir:

The erroneous remark by Mrs. P.G., the German-Irish lady who claims that she is a half-breed, is yet another indication that many do not understand the subject of race very well. Terms like German, Irish, English, etc. are not racial terms. They are ethnic and national terms.

The White Race is divided into three main groups: the Nordics, the Mediterraneans, and the Alpines.

The Nordics are characterized by blue eyes, blond hair, and a large frame. The purest example of the Nordic is the Swede.

The Mediterraneans are characterized by brown skin, dark hair, brown eyes and a slighter frame. The purest example of the Mediterranean is the Spaniard.

The Alpines are squat in stature, have a round mongoloid skull, brown eyes, and straight black hair. They are devoted to the soil. The peasantry of Europe is predominantly Alpine.

The Nordics are referred to as the Great Race. They are a dominant people, warriors, sea-farers, an out-of-doors people. There is argument as to who is the more intelligent, the Nordics or the Mediterraneans. The Mediterraneans are undisputably the greatest artists.

The people of Western Europe and their off-shoots are either one or a mixture of these three strains. The English are half Nordic and half Mediterranean. The Alpine wave did not cross the English Channel.

Germany lost much of her best Teutonic (Nordic) blood in the senseless 30 years war.

The greatest threat today to all White peoples is the flooding of our lands with unassimilable aliens whom we are forced to subsidize. If the tide is not reversed, we will, as Jean Marie Le-Pen of France says, be swept away.

Two of the greatest American writers on the subject of race were Lothrop Stoddard and Madison Grant.

Yours truly,
J.McC., Washington

Dear Mr. George Dietz,

Enclosed, my cheque for $45.00. I enjoy reading your magazine and look forward to its arrival every month. I hope to be able to increase my level of support before the end of the year. The events of the last year demanded support for Zündel and others.

Yours is one of the few Publications which is critical of the lousy clergy. In my opinion, the "Christian" clergyman bears the greatest responsibility for our present state of affairs. He adores and promotes stupidity and he instinctively knows that any political movement which is racial and national will curb his swindle. We would not have a Jewish problem were it not for the charlatans of the pulpit. Keep up the good work. I will do my best to promote your magazine.

Regards,
H.A.T., New York

Dear George,

After reading the material in Liberty Bell for February 1989 I had occasion to think back to the years when the political adventurer, Sir Oswald Mosley, was the front runner, or he tried to be. I knew him rather well and had many conversations with him. He had previously tried to get to the top in most all other British political parties. He even went so far as to try to create a new party called "The New Party," which turned out to be a flop, so he climbed on to a then popular band wagon and copied the real R/W Fascist leader (Arnold Leese and his Imperial Fascist League, founded about 1931). Mosley was the great showman, in all black attire; his last pre-war meeting was at Earls Court, only a matter of a few weeks from the outbreak of war in 1939. I have since had the view that Winston Churchill was responsible for setting him up. He was known by all genuine Nationalist pundits as the Kosher-Fascist and, of course, just like Churchill, was undoubtedly of Jewish extraction.

But the overruling factor is something of a present-day enigma; by far the greater majority of people have not the faintest idea of the fraudulent political set-up existing in the corrupt world of these days. It is so simple, I wonder why others have not emphasised the great fact that the NEWS MONOPOLISTS are in fact NO-BODYS. They are all fraudulent, non-elected ONE-WORLDERS: For How much longer can society allow this anomaly to continue. Broadcasting, the image and the voice are vital to us, to all peoples, no matter where they may live.

On a recent visit back to England, I was dumbfounded by the apparent lack of people involvement with any aspect of political administration. It would seem that our media controllers will only permit sport and more sports. It is something like a huge prison, the only ticket out is your bankroll, that is, if one can find some place where you will be accpted!

I was born in 1907 and have, as a consequence, seen numerous changes, very few for the better; corruption and pollution are the real problem. As things stand today, it is rather doubtful that the world will ever again get the chance to rectify the tragic mistakes made, especially during this century. Of course I am interested in history and the past; after all, I have lived through much of it, but would to some extent take issue with those who use history as more of a way of life and the only means of a livelyhood. The most important thing to my way of thinking is the FUTURE; the next ten or twenty years will be the most crucial. One thing is certain, we shall have to change direction; we'll have to go back to REAL PEOPLE, not the phonies who strut around on our TV screen and print mostly tripe in the press.

Thinking back again re Oswald Mosley, I recall a little of a specific conversation I had with him on one occasion. I brought up the vexed question of the Jews and his remark was, I quote, "If we hanged the Jews from the lampposts of London, we would still be controlled by the Jews in New York." A quick answer, but not necessarily a correct one! Many good men became disenchanted with O.M.; he spoke mainly of cooly labour and economics, etc. but absolutely nothing about our racial heritage. He was the first to announce Europe as a Nation! It was not Edward Heath, who was only the implementor.

After reading the item about Dr. Peter Peel, it reminded me of another exceptional, outstanding character: William Joyce [aka "Lord Haw-Haw"]. He was a master orator; he could really get a crowd going; he was an aware racist, the real thing, he could not tolerate Mosley's tomfoolery and, after a big row, left the party and shortly before the war went to Germany. It so happened that 1939 was the year I had chosen to take my mother and father for a holiday to Germany. I also remember I was asked to take an item of mail to post in Germany for William Joyce, and, of course, that was the last I ever saw of him. Although we would be hearing his nightly broadcasts from Bremen, Germany, during the war, he undoubtedly hated the guts of Winston Churchill, and so did a few million others in Britain at that time. It was Churchill and the Jews who created the atmosphere required to get a hanging indictment against Joyce as a traitor, whereas the shoe was exactly on the other foot. Churchill was the kosher traitor and, of course, the kosher BBC gave him every assistance. It is doubtful whether humanity will ever again get the chance to throw off the yoke of Jewish overlordship. Broadcasting is the weapon which currently holds the world in some kind of menopause, but new technology will without doubt change this aspect. Sensible people will realise that a whole new system of representation is over-due, but will arrive in due course; this I am positive about.

It is because Aryans have been effectively removed from administrative occupational involvement in political affairs that it can be seen that the whole world is being allowed to go to pot.

I enclose herewith US$50. for subscription renewal. I would genuinely like to be in a position to send you more, but with a pension of NZ$100. per week, this after a lifetime of paying into a National Health and Pension Fund, it is difficult. (We left Britain in 1972 to come here; a nice enough country, but abject poverty is in full control. I wish you all the very best; may you long continue; you are doing a wonderful job.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Dietz:

First, let me briefly say, I am in the middle of the commemorative issue and I'm delighted with the balance you came up with.

Probably not enough of your readers have read about Hitler's struggle, and I, for one, feel it cannot be quoted and reviewed often enough; and a good representation of some of the leading voices of today rounds it out nicely.

I even find it interesting to attempt to de-code the Deutsch passages with my handy-dandy travelers dictionary, since I do not "sprechen Sie Deutsch" (how's that) and it adds flavor that should be there for all. Very good....

Very respectfully,
D.R., California

Dear Sir:

I have made many orders from you in the past, and words can not describe what a valuable service for our people you are performing. I have particularly enjoyed Dr. Oliver's America's Decline: The Education of a Conservative. I have noted that Howard Allen Books, who publish The Dispossessed Majority, have put its back issues of Instauration [a magazine Yours Truly thoroughly enjoys! Their address is Box 76, Cape Canaveral, FL. —Editor] on microfiche. If you were to do the same thing with all back issues of Liberty Bell, I would gladly buy the fiche from you. Dr. Oliver is a truly brilliant as well as courageous man, and some day I would find it invaluable to sit in front of a microfiche viewer and absorb his life's work, as well as the outstanding works of your other writers. I have often thought of getting back into writing myself some time, and I think that access to all of your back issues would provide an invaluable reference source.

Sincerely
P.S., New York

Dear Sir,

I have, by no means, read all the pubLications you offer to Patriot, but here is a suggestion of a subject that could be expanded into a book.

The philosophy of the Zionist bankers is to produce commercial goods and services which are IN-efficient, because only then can MAXIMUM PROFITS be realized through resales, repairs, refinancing, law suits ("Professional" services). Chaos and turmoil mean PROFITS. It's not just WAR that can mean profits; peace (Kosher peace) can be a racist war of Jews against the rest of us. One example: Automobiles are not insulated and sahded (by design) from sun and cold, because then less gasoline would be used in heating and cooling the car. Education fails because that's where the profits and taxes are.

If people see how close to home this Zionist racist war is to them, maybe apathy will abate. It's not the 3 Ks (KKK) they should fear, but the 2 Ks–the KOSHER KONSERVATIVES.

Sincerely, F.B., New Jersey

Greetings:

An appropriate date [4 July] to write and request a current price/book list and an order form. I've just finished Simpson's Which Way, Western Man? Quite a tour de force on most major issues we face. In about five years mass consciousness is going to be considering such, even as the occult has become the rage among folks who five years ago had no inclination to even consider such matter. Thanks for keeping up the service.

Best regards,

Dear Sir:

Recently, I was watching "The Morton Downey Jr. Show," where they were interviewing some Skinhead representatives. They brought many new things to my attention that I was never aware of before. I never realized that our hard-earned money that is being taxed is sent to Israel so they can go kill innocent civilians!

I am also aware that the Jews own the media and it is impossible to find out what information is true while it is ruled by these people. Please send me some information on what can be done.

The following letter is reprinted from Instauration (July 1989), P.O. Box 76, Cape Canaveral, FL.

I hope that the letter from Zip 787 (March 1989) criticizing Tom Metzger doesn't mean that racially awakening whites are still afflicted with the "Christian American patriot anti-Communist" syndrome. Of the three unholy Cs–capitalism, communism, Christianity (all with the same progenitors)–it would be hard to say which has been most culpable in bringing our race to the brink. Furthermore, without the intervention of the capitalist Christian nations on behalf of the USSR 40 some years ago, the much maligned Nazis would probably have ended whatever remains of communism, as well as established a secure base for our continued existence in our European homeland. A rational person might also note that it was not the Politburo which gave us forced busing or reverse discrimination. It was American troops that used bayonets to integrate the schools and universities of Dixie. It was American political and economic warfare that destroyed Rhodesia and is now doing the same to South Africa. It is American judges that force us to accept homesexuals as teachers and role models for our children. Incalculable are the crimes of America against nature and civilization!

KEEP THE LIBERTY BELL RINGING!

Please remember: Our fight is Your fight! Donate whatever you can spare on a regular–monthly or quarterly–basis. Whether it is $2., $5., $20., or $100. or more, rest assured it is needed here and will be used in our common struggle. If you are a businessman, postage stamps in any denomination, are a legitimate business expense–and we need and use many of these here every month, and will be gratefully accepted as donations.

Your donations will help us spread the Message of Liberty and White Survival throughout the land, by making available additional copies of our printed material to fellow Whites who do not yet know what is in store for them.

Order our pamphlets, booklets, stickers, and–most importantly–our reprints which are ideally suited for mass distribution at reasonable cost. Order extra copies of Liberty Bell for distribution to your circle of friends, neighbors and relatives, urging them to subscribe to our unique publication. Our bulk prices are shown on the inside front cover of every issue of Liberty Bell.

Pass along your copy of Liberty Bell, and copies of reprints you obtained from us, to friends and acquaintances who may be on our 'wave length,' and urge them to contact us for more of the same.

Carry on the fight to free our White people from the shackles of alien domination, even if you can only join our ranks in spirit. You can provide for this by bequest. The following are suggested forms of bequests which you may include in your Last Will and Testament:

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigous academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH–FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

BARBARIANS AND GREED

In the August and September issues I commented rather sardonically on the recent appearance of two periodicals, each of which claims to be the legitimate continuation of the Truth Seeker while repudiating the principles on which its editorial policy was long based. I therefore hasten to report that the Truth Seeker which is published from P.O. Box 2832 in San Diego, California, has given proof of a rational courage that deserves recognition and sincere commendation.

Its issue for July-August 1989 is entirely devoted to "crimes of genital mutilation," and it has dared to offend the aliens who now control the United States. The crime which concerns us is, of course, the barbaric and disgusting rite of circumcision, which is ably discussed in Nicholas Carter's Routine Circumcision, the Tragic Myth (London, Londinium Press, 1979; available from Liberty Bell Publications, $5.00 + postage.)

A section of the periodical is devoted to the circumcision of females (clitoridectomy and even more drastic forms of sexual mutilation), which is practiced by the savage Congoids and Australoids and some Semitic tribes as a counterpart of male circumcision.[1] The details, which are often suppressed by pudibund ethnologists, will shock many naïve readers, but are interesting to us only as evidence of the irremediable savagery of savages, although "do-gooders" will doubtless feel their morbid itch to filch part of the income of the stupid tax-payers to waste on sentimental folly.

1. Although the Christians' venerated Jew-Book, of which the oldest portions were written in the late sixth century B.C., contains no certain reference to the sexual mutilation of females, it was probably practiced by the barbarians earlier and may have been practiced as late as the Tenth Century A.D., when it was denounced by a rabbi because it scandalized the goyim (although it is now argued that he cannot have meant what he said). Cf. Edward Masters, Erotica Judaica (New York, Julian Press, 1967), pp. 27-29. It evidently is not part of the degradation routinely inflicted on Jewesses today.

Several articles deal with the sexual mutilation of males by barbarians and Christians. I note especially the one by Gerald A. Larue; it is a pleasure to read an article by a man who knows when the text of the Septuagint is to be preferred to the Hebrew text, which was revised by the Masoretes, and who sees that while the early Christians naturally insisted on circumcision, Paul and Jews like him realized that their poisonous superstition could not be peddled to even the dregs of the population of the Roman Empire so long as it required a sexual mutilation to which no sane man of the less barbarous races would submit.

The practice of sexual and other mutilations (e.g., deformation of skulls by strapping the heads of infants between boards) doubtless arose in the fetid mass of the innately savage races, whence it spread, for reasons no sane man can imagine, to Hamitic and some Semitic peoples. As everyone knows, it had become normal among the mongrelized Egyptians when Herodotus observed them, late in the long history of that country. If we can rely on the tales incorporated in the "Old Testament" when it was put together, the Jews derived it (like their tribal god, the Yah whom they took from a Canaanite tribe) from other barbarians. What is noteworthy is that the two races that are capable of high civilization, the Aryans and the Mongolians, must have felt an instinctive repulsion from the obscenely insane custom, for there is no slightest trace of it in their oldest records.

When Aryans became infatuated by the cleverly adapted Jewish superstition, their natural abhorrence of the disgusting practice was checked by the notion that it was practiced by the barbarians who had been, and perhaps still were, the pets of the ferocious deity they worshipped. They thus reluctantly tolerated the odious barbarians in their midst, but it is significant that although the Jews have long had great, though partly surreptitious, power in Europe and now control it, it is only in the United States that they found Aryans so culturally (and perhaps biologically) depleted that they could be persuaded to mutilate their own children and thus make it easy for Jews to conceal their race, whenever that is expedient.

Several articles deal with the psychic malformation of infants who have been subjected to the sadistic cruelty of circumcision, and add a little to Chapters VIII and X of Mr. Carter's book. Infants are not fully conscious, since only the lembic part of their brain is operating and the neo-cortex will develop only slowly in the following years, but it is surely obvious from the effects of painful abuse on other mammals that the savage mutilation of infants must produce a shock from which the victim will never recover, although he will have no conscious recollection of it.

Several articles expose the foolish pretenses by which even educated men have tried to justify the atrocious custom as medically or morally justified. It is likely that in the Nineteenth Century the fictitious claims were partly motivated by a reluctance to recognize the barbarity of the disgusting rite to which, according to the "New Testament," one-third of the Christians' god was subjected in his terrestrial infancy.[2]

Americans began to mutilate their male children only after the medical profession had been Judaized by Fishbein, who may have been sent to this country for that purpose, where his success was virtually guaranteed by the Americans' cherished social disease, "democracy," which reduces all social values to money or the current substitute for it. Medical men could not doubt the indisputable benefits of a rite by which they could make fifty bucks with a single clip. They talked, of course, about hygiene or repression of precocious sexuality or whatever the boobs were ready to believe, since it would have been tactless to mention the transcendental therapy of fifty bucks. And, no doubt, the assiduous propaganda carried on by their medical associations convinced many of them that there must be some physiological justification of the quickie surgery. Of course, a few infants do not survive the operation or are permanently crippled by its consequences (many instances cited and illustrated in the Truth Seeker), but the certain benefits outweighed the occasional risks—or did so until juries began to return large verdicts in malpractice suits.

Most readers will be astonished to discover, on page 51 of the periodical, that the California Medical Association, doubtless dominated by Sheenies, has become so brazen in its malice and greed that it officially claims that the sexual mutilation of male children serves to prevent syphilis, gonorrhoea, and other diseases of which the aetiology is well-known even to persons who have no medical knowledge at all.

The rabbi of a "Humanistic Jewish Congregation," quoted on page 18 of the Truth Seeker, opines that the mutilation of male infants serves as a prophylactic against "AIDS," and I think that

2. Cf. the insane Jewish boast that "Great is circumcision, since but for it heaven and earth would not endure.... So great is circumcision that but for it the Holy One [i.e., Yahweh]:..would not have created the universe," quoted from the Talmud by Masters, loc. cit.

Dr. Martin S. Altschul is right when he predicts (p.45) that this absurd claim will be taken up by the Jews and venal physicians of other races who have a vested interest in perpetuating outrageous cruelty to newborn children. It will be particularly absurd because there is considerable evidence that a greatly disproportionate number of Jews have died and are dying from the African Plague, for which they evidently have a strong diathesis.

What makes this issue of the Truth Seeker so very remarkable is that the periodical is sponsoring (p.54) petitions for legislation by the various state legislatures that would make the barbaric rite a crime, a felony punishable by imprisonment and a fixed fine of $100,000, to be put in trust for the benefit of the mutilated child. An exception is made for the rare instances in which children are born with a malformation that makes surgery necessary, but there is no exception on religious grounds. The protection of the law is extended to Jewish children.

I wonder whether the editors can have been fully aware of the risk they have taken. It is true that it would not be feasible to dynamite a postoffice box, but they have an office and residences that can be discovered by the terrorists who destroyed the offices of the Institute for Historical Review by arson and dynamited the homes of several insubordinate goyim.

Aryans have in the past tried to suppress the revolting practices of the barbarians, but without success. In the second century B.C., the Seleucid monarch, Antiochus IV Epiphanes, forbade the sexual mutilation of children, but the Kikes in Palestine revolted and the colonies they had planted in all the nations of the civilized world abetted their fellow tribesmen, making particular use of the Romans whom they had cozened with professions of friendship and mutual interests, and Antiochus, who had intended to deal effectively with the infestation of his territory, turned eastward to deal with revolts in that part of his empire, leaving his civilizing work unfinished.

Although the Roman Emperor, Hadrian, tried hard to conciliate the Jews in the early part of his reign, he finally realized that nothing could abate the malice of the barbarians. He made no exception for them when he forbade castration and circumcision throughout the Empire. After his legions, in A.D. 135, suppressed the revolt led by a Jewish christ who called himself Bar-Kokhba, he converted Jerusalem into a civilized town, Colonia Aelia Capitolina, and forbade Jews to reside in it (though not, of course, in the rest of Palestine). When he died, three years later, his successor, the mild Antoninus Pius, relaxed the wholesome legislation, vainly hoping to conciliate the unappeasable hostes generis humani, but, of course, they conspired against him and he had to deal with another revolt.

So far as I can recall at the moment, Septimius Severus, who was not even a Roman but was of Punic and Berber stock from North Africa, was the last Roman Emperor (193-211) who tried to prohibit the obscene rite by which Jews were made "sons of the Covenant" with old Yahweh, who would help them take possession of the whole world.

No one has succeeded in solving the Jewish problem, not even prudent Roman Emperors, who had virtually unlimited authority and loyal legions to enforce it. It will be interesting to see what happens to the audacious editors who have now challenged the world's wily and triumphant parasites.

AMERICAN HEROINE

Feminists like to talk about heroines. So do Americans sometimes, when they are in a sentimental mood and have nothing else to do. But I have never heard them mention the lady to whom I devote this brief note, and I wonder whether any reader will recognize her name, although it was fairly well known in "conservative" circles forty years ago.

Miss Vivien Kellems was the descendant of an Englishman, Richard Kellam, who came to North America in 1636, and of the Randolphs of Virginia, whose ancestor came in the early 1670s. Eleven of her ancestors fought to make the colonies independent of the mother country, hoping that they would remain free. They could not foresee what would happen in less than a century later.

When I met her briefly, she was past sixty, but she retained the kind of feminine pulchritude that, according to experts, comes from a well-formed bony structure. It amply confirmed the photographs that show a younger woman with the exquisite Nordic beauty that Richard McCulloch celebrates in his Destiny of Angels—a beauty that by contrast shows how tawdry and meretricious are the tarted-up features and figure that the Kikes of Hollywood like to display in their cinemas.

She was a sagacious business woman. Realizing the value of what seemed a minor invention, she went to Connecticut and there built a factory and a prosperous business. Evidently believing, as did many at the time, that the war of 1942-1945 was in the American interest, she did not object to the already outrageous exactions of Infernal Revenue, but when she saw that the purpose of the government under Sheeny Truman was to invent pretexts for even greater fleecing of the taxpayers, she became concerned, and when the flagrantly tyrannical Withholding Tax was enacted by the slightly disguised dictatorship, she was the American who had the courage to challenge the obviously illegal imposition.

Everyone knows, of course, the reasoning of the predators who imposed that device: "The Americans are such stupid creatures that if we make their employers deduct our loot from the cash or cheque they receive, they will never know the difference, even if they are told what we have taken; but if they actually have the money in their hands before they pay us, even such dumb brutes might see what we are doing and might get ideas."

Miss Kellems accordingly paid her employees their full wages, but saw to it that they themselves then paid the sums exacted by the owners of the United States. The pickpockets of Infernal Revenue were immediately alarmed. They sent their bully boys to overawe her and tell her, in effect, "You American swine, you think you have rights when bureaucrats have their scaly claws about your neck?"

When they failed to overawe her and could not answer her reasonable insistence that employers were not tax-collectors, the thugs raided her bank and stole a sum equivalent to the taxes her employees had already paid, plus, of course, penalties for having disobeyed her owners.

She was not allowed to challenge the Constitutionality of the White Slave Amendment or the tyrannical legislation by which it was enforced, but she sued the Federal government and, thanks to a jury of Americans, recovered the amount that had been stolen. Debarred from a full legal remedy, she finally consented to a small penalty of $837.70—plus, of course, the enormous expense of fighting Organized Crime in its own courts.

Her experience taught other tax-paying animals how expensive and futile it would be for slaves to dispute the commands of their masters.

Miss Kellems was a lady but also a feminist, for in those days it was possible for reactionary women to be both. She believed that women are more intelligent than men, and, as her own experience had shown, more courageous. She accordingly hoped that she could arouse the women of the United States to try to recover some of the liberty stupid or cowardly males had forfeited. She was mistaken, of course, but while thus hopeful she wrote Toil, Taxes, and Trouble (New York, Dutton, 1952).

The book is now out-of-print, and I do not know where a copy can be obtained, but you should read it, if you can find one. The part of the book that will be valuable so long as there are intelligent men and women to read it is the large part of the little volume in which Miss Kellems illuminates the terrible paradox, that men who revolted from the mother country because they refused to pay taxes imposed by the British Parliament—taxes that were trivial and trifling by modern standards—left descendants who voluntarily rushed into servitude and enslaved themselves.

A statistician has calculated that out of every eight-hour day, an American works five hours to pay what is exacted from him by Federal, state, and local governments, plus all the little nests of bureaucratic parasites—school boards, park boards, sewer boards, and the many similar blood-suckers—that have the power to tax. The remaining three hours the American slave is still allowed to work for himself and his family and the usurers to which he will probably be indebted all his life. Roman slaves were allowed to save from their allowances and accumulate a peculium, with which they, if industrious and sober, could eventually buy their freedom.[1] American slaves, needless to say, cannot hope ever to purchase emancipation from their ruthless and inhuman owners.

Miss Kellems gives us a succinct history of the way in which the Marxist Amendment was put over on the American dolts. An income tax had been levied in 1864 to pay for the invasion and devastation of the Southern states when they sought to exert the right that the British colonies had asserted in 1776, but this

1. To show you what was possible, I translate a success story recorded on a tomb at Assisi in the First Century (Corpus inscriptionum Latinarum, Vol. XI, No. 5400). I will translate to make the meaning clear without notes, and use the sign $ to replace the Roman symbol for sestertius, which resembles H and S in ligature and may have been the source of the modern monetary symbol.

[The tomb of] P. Decimius Eros Merula, formerly a slave of P. Decimius; a clinical physician [i.e., one who made house calls] and ophthalmological surgeon, member of the six-man municipal board. He paid for his freedom $50,000. On election to the six-man board, he gave $2,000 to the municipal treasury. He contributed $30,000 for the statues placed in the Temple of Hercules. He donated to the public treasury $37,000 for the paving of the highways. The day before he died he left [by will] an estate of $800,000.

"emergency" imposition contained a saving provision for its own termination. She summarizes the process by which Communist slavery was imposed on the fatuous Americans in 1909-1913. Some details may astonish you. Some of the most zealous promoters of the amendment, including Cordell Hull, expected that the tax would be uniformly imposed on all incomes. They might have been less zealous, had they foreseen that the tax would be made progressive, ostensibly "to soak the rich."

Although most members of the House and Senate were too stupid to understand, or too corrupt to care,[2] intelligent men, both proponents and opponents of the income tax, knew and admitted that its real purpose was not to obtain revenue, but to "redistribute the wealth," i.e., carry out the Communist Revolution.

Curse the Congressmen and the legislators in states that ratified Marxism, if you wish, but do not forget that in 1909-1913 the American people still possessed some power of affecting the government under which they lived. For almost a decade before 1913 they had an opportunity to think about the agitation for income taxes, if they were interested in the future of their nation and of their own offspring; but nevertheless they walked voluntarily into the trap. I am afraid that an impartial historian will have to admit that they deserved what their posterity got.

"Soaking the rich" was, of course, a slogan calculated to appeal to the malice and greed of the proletariat, but not to be taken seriously. And, by the way, we must admit that much of the ostentatious wealth in evidence in 1909 was of the kind created by the War Against the South and was acquired by various forms of theft, many of them legalized in violation of Common Law.[3] Perhaps some animus against such wealth was justified, but the boobs did not see that the purpose of "soaking the rich" was to create more of the wealth that is obtained by spoliation and political larceny.

2. There appears to be no way of determining or even estimating how much was distributed in bribes to suborn treason. No doubt many bribe-takers did not foresee the consequences of the slavery for which they voted, and it may be doubted whether any member of Congress knew the detail that the nation was being prepared for the First World War and the insanity that was induced in 1917.

3. I am always reminded of the short story by Edith Wharton in which the widow of a financier asks his principal subordinate about a certain transaction of which she has heard. "No," the man replied, "it certainly wasn't honest, but then it wasn't illegal, either. It was—well, it was just business."

The results, of course, may be seen today in the scabrous vampires who do not hesitate to pay a thousand dollars for a night in an hotel or a million dollars for an evening's party.

The purpose of the Marxist Amendment was to eliminate wealth that was honestly acquired and could be transmitted to heirs. A man who has a secure income is largely independent and has the power to behave honorably. In the "Liberal's" ideal state, individuals must be serfs, as entirely dependent on the tyranny that really owns them as the cows in a barn are dependent on the farmer who owns them—and as unable to have self-respect, personal honor, or a real family. No one today has the personal independence and freedom that every American had in 1860 or even 1910. Men who are accounted very wealthy today depend for their income on some industry or other business, and exist only at the mercy of their masters. If they seriously annoyed the Judaeo-Communist rulers, they could and would be ruined, if not overnight, at least in three or four years.

Miss Kellems is, to my mind, a true heroine. Although a woman, she showed the courage of a Roland and confronted, though vainly, the vast machine of oppression beneath which the spineless and degenerate Americans of today cower in slavish submission.

I do not expect Miss Kellems to be honored by the general public. For one thing, she was a lady and ladies are detestable to our contemporaries, whose ideal of femininity is represented by a mass of sluts and mongrels. For another, the comprehension of the world given by modern education is exemplified by the girl, white and apparently Anglo-Saxon, who was recently graduated from a junior high school with an average of "A-." On her examination in English she wrote: "A heroine is a drug that makes us feel good."

MAMMALIAN PSYCHOLOGY

In my youth I met an amateur zoölogist who was studying the relative intelligence of various species of mammals, excluding men. Obviously, carnivores are more intelligent than herbivores, and he thus far had been able to observe only Felidae and Canidae.

For him, intelligence was not the ability and willingness to be taught tricks, at which dogs obviously excel, but the exercise of judgement in situations involving the animal's survival.

From an eminence he had watched with binoculars a pair of coyotes as they dealt with a pack of dogs. Hotly pursued, they reached a thicket in which one hid while the other led off the enthusiastically yelping pack, and led them over a widely circular course that resembled the lower part of the numeral 8, returning at length to the thicket, where the mate, who had rested in the meantime, took over and led the dogs over a course corresponding to the upper part of the 8 to repeat the manoeuvre. Before long, the dogs were sprawled out on the ground, panting desperately in utter exhaustion, and the two coyotes trotted away to attend to their own business.

He had recorded the results of an experiment on a short film, taken with a telephoto lens from a blind. A cage of steel mesh, large enough to contain a small pony, was placed in the open. It had a guillotine door that was held open by a catch connected with a treadle on which was placed a generous hunk of fresh meat. An animal that tried to take the meat would spring the catch on the door and be securely trapped in the cage.

A coyote, attracted by the aroma of the meat, approached the cage and halted some ten or twelve feet from it, tensely alert as he watched the cage for several minutes. When it did not move, the coyote sank down on his haunches and continued to study the unfamiliar object. At last he arose, walked to the cage, sniffed at the steel mesh, and then trotted disdainfully away.

The gentleman thought that he had proved that coyotes are more intelligent than dogs, wolves, and other Canidae. Perhaps he had. What he certainly proved is that coyotes are more intelligent than Americans.

THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT

If you seek comprehension of the events of today, do not expect to learn anything from current news: it will be only more of the same. If you have in mind a fairly adequate outline of the history of our race from the Greeks to our century, you may give special attention to the crucial periods in which Americans were prepared for plundering by their inveterate enemies: 1908-1914, 1916-1920, 1932-1941. First-class periodicals addressed to literate and educated readers, which were still published in each of those periods, will be your surest guide, but you may wish to glance occasionally at newspapers of the period to see how far the pablum of the populace was seasoned with ideology or reason.

The dean of honest historians who have dealt with the second of those periods, James J. Martin, has continued, in his recently published book, the studies that form part of his invaluable The Saga of Hog Island (Colorado Springs, Ralph Myles, 1977). The new book, An American Adventure in Bookburning (ibid., 1989), examines what may seem at first sight a relatively minor event, the publication by the Secretary of War in 1918 of a list of books that were to be removed from the libraries provided for American soldiers and sequestered or destroyed. The compiler of the index of prohibited books was so incompetent or negligent that he ignorantly misspelled some of the names of the purportedly pro-German authors and the titles of their books.

Professor Martin identifies the books listed in what must have been a haphazard compilation, and conjectures why each book was included and why books that more cogently presented the German position were overlooked. We are left, of course, with some unanswerable questions. When a book that in no way favors Germany but was ardently pro-Irish was included in the list, was the feckless compiler ignorant of what was the subject of the book, or did he use a pretext to ban a book that could not have been correctly denounced without arousing the mercurial ire of the numerous Irishmen in the United States?

Some books on the American Index librorum prohibitorum are now deservedly forgotten; others I have not read. A few are still relevant.

Graf Ernst zu Raventlow's The Vampire of the Continent is brilliant and scathing, but essentially accurate in its statement of the historical facts of the official British policy of maintaining a "balance of power" among continental European nations, a policy that our historians have almost unanimously regarded with the tender sympathies of Anglophiles, but which naturally appeared to Germans in a quite different light and which they interpreted accordingly.

Frank Harris's England or Germany is now preserved by the literary reputation of its talented and flagrantly unconventional author, but contains significant observations on the issue that is its subject.

I have not read E. F. Henderson's Germany's Fighting Machine, but obviously the author of the statement quoted by Professor Martin, that the British alliance with Russia against Germany was "the most monumental act of folly in modern history," had a keenly lucid mind, and I hope for time to learn what else he had to say in that concise book and other works.

How Diplomats Make War, written and published by Francis Nielson while he was still a member of the British Parliament, is a fundamental work of historiography by an eminent writer, and will always be a basic work on the origins of what is called the First World War. It has been reprinted several times since 1915, and I hear that a new reprint of it is now in preparation.

The most enduring importance attaches to several books by David Starr Jordan, an eminent biologist who, for a quarter of a century, 1891-1916, presided over Stanford University, for in that now far-off age men of intellectual integrity and distinction could become the presidents of colleges and universities. Having a truly scientific mind, he studied and objectively examined the biological effects of modern warfare, i.e., the "democratic" warfare with mass armies that was one of the innovations for which "Liberals" admire the French Revolution and openly or secretly delight in all the slaughter it caused.[1]

Professor Martin lists three of the great biologist's works. Their subject is indicated by the title of the first, which, I am ashamed to say, I have not yet read: Blood of a Nation: A Study of the Decay of Races Through the Survival of the Unfit (San Francisco, Carlisle & Co., 1912); it is now quite rare. The other two I read many years ago, and I can recommend them to everyone who is willing to think about the world in which he lives and in which his unfortunate children will have to live and die. War's Aftermath (Boston, Houghton, 1914) is a study of three Southern counties in

1. "Democracy," the syphilis of nations, represents the theoretical dominance of the proletariat, the lowest and least valuable part of the population, and the actual dominance of the criminals who manipulate the brutish herd. All "democracies" are really ochlocracies, and are such lovers of peace that they periodically launch bloody jihads to destroy superior cultures, hypocritically pretending they want only to kill everyone who does not love their proletarian squalor as much as they do. Jews naturally love "democracy," both for the infinite loot it brings them and for the destruction, degradation, and suffering it inflicts on the goyim whom they plunder and hate. The French Revolution, having murdered the best part of the French nation and almost exterminated the Nordic component, attacked other nations to spread its idealistic ordure and invented conscription to form mass armies. The blessings of "democracy" as opposed to monarchy may be shown by a simple statistic. In 1704, during the reign of Queen Anne, the British Army and Navy decided the War of the Spanish Succession and fate of Europe at a cost of less than 5000 dead, of whom about 2000 fell in the four major actions, including the Battle of Blenheim, which was so bloody, by contemporary standards, that all England was shocked. In 1914 to 1918, Britain, enjoying the blessings of an incipient "democracy," sacrificed the lives of 200,000 young men every year.

1865 to show in detail the genetic consequences of the War for Independence that was forced on the South by Northern criminals and mobs crazed with righteousness. War and the Breed: The Relation of War to the Downfall of Nations (Boston, Unitarian Association, 1915; abridged reprint, Washington, D.C., Cliveden Press, 1988) examines the results of the first year of the First World War, with special attention to the many young officers, the very flower of British manhood, who were killed in action and died childless, leaving the nation permanently impoverished genetically. There are photographs of many of them to attest the racial strain they represented.

Professor Jordan, then Chancellor of Stanford, which was then a real university, was denounced as guilty of the awful crime of being "pro-German," because dispassionate and scientific studies of the consequences of "democratic" war might abate the ardor of the peace-loving Americans, who were out on the war-path, brandishing their tomahawks and yelling for blood.

The "bookburning" ordered by the Secretary of War may seem to you to have been not without pragmatic justification. It was only reasonable not to place sobering books before the young men who had been, or would be, shipped to Europe to fight in an idiotic war in which many of them would be killed or maimed for life.

The list, however, serves to introduce a far more important subject which Professor Martin adumbrates in the closing pages of his text and on which much information is given in the thirty-one pages of closely-set notes that precede the sardonic "Beginner's Manual for Apprentice Book-Burners," written in 1954 and here reprinted from an obscure periodical, that concludes the volume.

Books that gave reasonable accounts of the war in Europe or were written in German were sequestered or destroyed in public libraries, and Federal thugs raided the offices of many publishers and destroyed the stocks of books that dissented from the government's official lies. But this, too, was merely a phase of a much larger subject, a study in psychopathology and racial decay.

Woodrow Wilson was a crack-brained college professor whom the Jews selected and trained, leading him about "like a poodle on a string," as they boasted to Colonel Dall, and teaching him tricks, and then installed in the Presidency by the simple expedient of playing on the vanity and ambition of Theodore Roosevelt.[2] He was first elected in 1912, and through him the invaders began the devastation of the American nation by inducing the boobs to give all their money to usurers and to enslave their posterity with the White Slave Act.[3] In 1916 the foolish Americans reëlected him on the grounds that "he kept us out of war," and one month after taking office he proclaimed, as planned, a holy war, a "war to end wars."

Instead of impeaching the jabberwocky and hustling him off in a strait-jacket, the pacificistic Americans became insane with blood-lust and righteousness. The Jews, of course, cracked their journalistic and other whips over the dumb brutes, and, as we all know, righteousness is far more hallucinatory than hashish, peyotl, or a tincture of Amanita muscaria, but just the same, the fatuity and sudden reversal of American sentiment in four months presents a problem in the morbid psychologie des foules (pardon the pun) that has appalling implications.

The only thing among other mammals comparable as a mass movement to the American rush to holy war is a horde of lemmings racing for the precipice from which they will plunge to their death in the sea. For a parallel in mindless ferocity, one has to imagine a horde of starving Tyrannosauri reges at the end of the Mesozoic Era.

The grim antics of Americans during their fit of righteousness in 1917-1918 have been recorded, usually with proper embarrassment, in various books. I will give here only one example, of which I was told by an eye-witness.

In a small town in the south central part of the country there was a young man who, like many others, enjoyed playing and experimenting with wireless telegraphy and had assembled an apparatus with which he could communicate in Morse code with

Jewish masters had to use blackmail to force him to appoint the first Sheeny to the Supreme Court; his lapse into insanity in 1919 is plausibly attributed to remorse following a belated perception of the purposes for which he had been used; and after his recovery he is said to have candidly lamented, "I have ruined my country."

3. The Marxist Amendment, which, in effect, destroyed what was left of the American Constitution, was proposed by a corrupt Congress in 1909, but it took time to corrupt enough state legislatures to procure its ratification, which was completed only in February 1913, just in time for the Jews' fantoche and the corrupt Congress elected with him to begin fastening the chains of bondage on the American boobs, who had thrown away their birthright.

other amateurs within a circle of three or four hundred miles. A mob was with great difficulty prevented from hanging him. They had dragged him to an improvised gallows before their patriotic ardor was restrained by a few sane men, at considerable risk to themselves.

The process that went on in the consciousness of the patriots was apparently the following: (1) The young man was Italian; (2) therefore he must be a Roman Catholic and thus (3) a devotee and agent of the Pope, who (4) was the Antichrist and (5) must, therefore, be in communication with Satan incarnate, the Kaiser. Hence it was obvious that (6) the youngster must be transmitting to the Vatican, for relay to Berlin, the vital military secrets to be discovered in a town of about twelve thousand in which the only industry was a blacksmith shop.

That incident was merely typical of the mental or glandular processes of the bellicose peace-lovers throughout the country, with only insignificant variations conforming to local conditions in other towns and cities.

There were innumerable incidents like that, but the subject is one that calls for the masterly summation of crucial evidence that is evinced in the two volumes of Professor Martin's authoritative and unsurpassed American Liberalism and World Politics, 1931-1941 (New York, Devin-Adair, 1964). From such a calmly objective précis of the essential facts, you would draw for yourself the inescapable conclusions, applying the rule of cui bono?

What happened is clear. The race of barbarians who are conquering the world by deceit, relying, perhaps, on the promise of their ferocious god (Exodus, 23, 27-30) to destroy every nation they infiltrate, first infected the minds of our race with a Judaeo-Communist religion, and then, when our native intelligence was beginning to recover from the disease, perpetuated it, superficially disguised, in the Marxian Reformation, thus keeping their victims crazed with one or the other form of righteousness. At the opening of the Nineteenth Century they were at last ready to begin the final drive of their dupes to eventual extinction, and they had at their disposal, for timely use, the nation that had righteously ruined itself, mentally and spiritually, in 1861-1865.

We shall here notice only one aspect of the delirium tremens that was induced in 1917: it effectively abolished a rational conception of patriotism, that is to say, a nation's natural and necessary devotion to its own preservation and advancement.

The boobs embarked on their holy war not only knowing, but boasting, that the war would not bring the slightest advantage to the United States, but would instead squander their resources and the lives of their young men to impose their own meddlesome righteousness on European nations.[4] A rational patriotism was evinced only by the few Americans who felt a concern for the welfare of their own nation and tried as best they could to prevent the epidemic of madness and its consequences, but the crazed imbeciles inverted the meaning of words and stigmatized intelligently patriotic Americans as "unpatriotic."

In 1917 'patriotism' came paradoxically to mean treason—for it was nothing less than treason to undermine our nation by squandering its wealth and the irreplaceable genetic heritage in the blood of its young men in a chimerical effort to impose a crack-brained righteousness on other nations. And 'patriotism' came also to mean fanatical and tyrannical repression of Americans who were sufficiently intelligent to have a rational regard for the welfare of their own nation. That was the first outbreak of the infectious brain-disease that produces delusions about 'One World.'

Considering only this one aspect of the madness of 1917, we may again ask cui bono? If you need help in answering that question, you may note one recent incident.

4. A precedent for this folly had been established in 1898. The only morally justified war ever fought by the United States was the Mexican War of 1846-1848. The attack on Spain in 1898 was publicly promoted as a righteous itch to interfere with Spain's government of her own colonial territory; that could have been shabbily justified as expedient hypocrisy, had the war actually been fought for a national advantage, i.e., the annexation of Cuba for the defence of the United States and to provide new territory for settlement and exploitation by Americans. The obvious reasons for taking Cuba from Spain had been stated in the Ostend Manifesto of 1854, inspired by President Pierce, who was an intelligent and relatively honest man, but also a weakling; the howling of the crazed Abolitionists daunted him, and he disavowed the one act of true statesmanship that would have entitled him to the grateful remembrance of posterity. The result of American aggression on Spain in 1898 was to leave the nation burdened with the Philippine Islands, of which it could make no use unless it embarked on a policy of colonial expansion in the Orient, which would have been contrary to American interests. The annexation of Puerto Rico as a sop to the minority of intelligent Americans was no compensation for the fatal failure to annex and occupy Cuba.

Martha's Vineyard, the pleasant island off the southern coast of Massachusetts,[5] once an American summer-resort, has been overrun by wealthy members of the predatory race and their stooges, who are naturally jostling the remaining Americans, using the procedure described by Samuel Roth in Jews Must Live.[6]

A gentleman on the island, David Wayfield, whom readers of Christian News will remember for his excellent reports of the trial by which the Jews' shabbat goyim in Canada persecuted Ernst Zündel, has organized Veterans Against Brainwashing (P.O. Box 699, Vineyard Haven, Massachusetts; 02568). He has equipped a station wagon with a display of "Banned Books," the books that are effectively kept from the American public by the Jewish censorship, and thus Mr. Wayfield exhibits to passers-by the works of authentic history and ethnology that Americans are clandestinely prevented from seeing. (Oppressive regulations decreed by parasitic bureaucrats prevent him from selling copies on the spot.)

One day one of our biped afflictions emerged from his lavishly luxurious estate with two of his females and inspected with horror the display of Banned Books. As he and his companions turned away, he imprudently exclaimed, "We need a war!"

Of course, they need a war. They need another holy war, not only to send their American serfs to devastate another part of the world, but to incite another orgy of the treason called 'patriotism' to silence the tiny minority of thinking Americans left in their New Canaan. In their enthusiasm for the "war effort," the boobs, crazed again with righteousness, will be delighted to see it made a crime, punishable perhaps by death, to doubt the Holohoax or any other lie the Masters of Deceit choose to tell their victims. Possession of a book the World Conquerors have banned will be sufficient proof of unrighteousness, and an intensive search of all dwellings by Federal Marshals will obviously be needed to "preserve our freedom" by identifying all persons who are so irreligious and "unpatriotic" as not to worship God's Own.

The barbarians need a war. Whether or not bumbling old Ronnie was charged with the task and failed to deliver, Bushy, who is taxing his serfs to import another horde of Sheenies (by agreement with Gorbachev, who is doubtless glad to be rid of them) to reënforce the many millions already here, will probably deliver the war, neatly wrapped up in ideals, before long, and the boobs will yell applause.

Only one more holy war is needed to put the denizens of the North American Canaan in the place to which they are destined—and which they will have earned by their own efforts. The witless Aryans will whimper, and it is even possible that some of them will belatedly have the spirit to emulate the Semites in the old Canaan, who are now trying to resist.

Today the Palestinians; tomorrow the Americans.

THE ODD GERMANS

In the 1930s I occasionally visited the Classics Library of the University of Chicago, which stood, in a rather handsome building of its own, on the Midway, and I became acquainted with its amiable and learned Librarian, Walter R. Rathke. As our acquaintance progressed, I learned that after he earned the degree of A.M. in German philology at the University of Chicago in 1912, he supported himself and his wife by teaching German literature at a respected college in Wisconsin, intending eventually to obtain a doctoral degree from Chicago. After more than half a century, I dare not trust my recollection of the name of the college, and the University of Chicago appears to have no record of it.

When the American people became hysterical and demented in 1917, the college patriotically abolished study of the damnable language of a wicked race that spent its time impaling babies on bayonets and using the corpses of men killed in combat to manufacture soap. Mr. Rathke, accordingly, became a librarian, a relatively safe employment, since the Americans had not thought of abolishing books.

I asked Mr. Rathke the obvious and inevitable question: How was it possible for such blithering idiocy to be tolerated in Wisconsin, a state of which probably the larger, and certainly the dominant, part of the population was of German ancestry and included many of German birth?

He did not know the answer, and we considered a series of hypotheses. The majority of the Germans who migrated to Wisconsin came from the lower classes, but so did immigrants from, for example, Ireland, who were always ready to fight if they heard any slur on Erin's emerald isle and its Celtic people. For that matter, the upper classes of any European nation tend to be cosmopolitan in the better sense of that word, and a traditional loyalty to the homeland is usually most emotionally maintained by persons from the lower classes.

Many Germans who migrated to the United States did so to escape a short term of obligatory military service: yes, but how could that make them eager to see their sons conscripted to fight in a foolish war in which many of them would certainly be killed or maimed for life?

Germans and British were the two nationalities from which came the greater part of the Americans, even in colonial times, so that the two were regarded as authentically and naturally Americans, and did not seem somewhat exceptional, as did Swedes and even Italians of predominantly Nordic ancestry. True, but the Germans, no less than the British, had not forgotten their origins; many Lutheran and other churches held services in German, and both Cincinnati and St. Louis had been the home of large publishing houses that issued books in German, many of them written in this country. Furthermore, in the United States before 1917 German was thought to be the most important modern foreign language, given the acknowledged fact of German leadership in almost all domains of learning, from Classical philology to chemistry and biology. Many children of British ancestry were taught German in their childhood so that they would be equipped for serious study or success in industry when they grew up, and surely that fact must have stimulated further the ethnic patriotism of Germans in the United States. (It should also have made other Americans, who had read German works in the originals, immune to the epidemic of madness, but that is another matter.)

Before 1870, Germany had been divided into a number of independent states, large and small, which were often rivals and occasionally at war with each other, with latent antagonisms surviving from the Thirty Years' War. True, but the essential unity of all Germans, except those in Austria, had been affirmed by the establishment of the German Empire after 1870, and how could any residue of divisive sentiments among Germans be as strong as the aftermath of the savagery shown in the invasion and conquest of the Southern states during their tragic War for Independence?

The Germans who came to the United States brought with them, or acquired here, an irrational antipathy to monarchy per se. It seems, however, that many of them proudly displayed in their homes pictures of the Kaiser, and, in any case, such a sentiment could make them prefer residence in the United States, but it is hard to believe that it could make them believe in the praeternatural wickedness of the blood in their own veins.

Mr. Rathke and I considered other hypotheses. One that we overlooked was the possibility that the unsuspecting Germans in the United States may have been greatly influenced by the indeterminate number of Jews who came to this country from Germany and posed as Germans. It does not seem likely, however, that this could have been more than a contributing factor, at most. The Jews who pretended to be Germans were, at least ostensibly, pro-German in their attitudes in 1914-1916 and until their fellow tribesmen had extorted the Balfour Declaration from the desperately embattled British.

One question was the attitude of the German clergy. Other holy men, with a few honorable exceptions, found in antagonism to Germany an opportunity for righteous ranting. Did the German churchmen as resolutely oppose them? According to Mr. Rathke, some joined the howling pack, while others were intimidated by the "democratic" tyranny in Washington and the Attorney General's lawless henchmen. Only a few courageous clergymen spoke out, but they were not supported by their cowed congregations and were silenced by means that were usually flagrantly illegal and tyrannical.[1]

It was true that for decades there had been in the United States a certain antagonism toward Germany on both rational and sentimental grounds. The conception of Manifest Destiny, which the invertebrate weaklings of today cannot begin to comprehend, usually led to the acceptance as inevitable of a conflict between the two rising and proudly ambitious nations of the civilized world.[2] A strong prevention in favor of the traditional Humanistic culture

1. Only a few years ago I heard a reference to the death of a clergyman, not of Germanic origin as I recall, who was remembered for having been "in trouble" for "pro-German sympathies" in 1917.

2. Typical is a now forgotten short story by Robert W. Chambers, who is now remembered only for the peculiar horror of "The King in Yellow." In 1895 he published a story set in the United States a quarter of century in the future, which he accordingly described as what then seemed likely. The United States and Germany engaged in a war to determine which should annex the Samoan islands. A German army that invaded the United States evidently suffered the fate of Cornwallis at Yorktown. Americans learned from the war in which they had been finally victorious. They made their navy overwhelmingly superior and maintained six great fleets of battleships and cruisers that patrolled the oceans of the entire globe. They established an army modeled on the Prussian,and a centralized government, modeled

THE BROMBERG BLOODY SUNDAY

The year 1989 will have called forth the memory of various events which took place two centuries ago, a century ago or a half century ago. On 30 April 1789 George Washington was inaugurated as the first President of the United States. On 14 July 1789 the Bastille was stormed in Paris. On 20 April 1989 Hitler was born. On 1 September 1939 German armed forces invaded parts of Germany that had been annexed to the newly formed Polish state after 1918. On 3 September 1939 England and France, with their mighty armed forces and their vast empires, declared war on Germany, using the German armed action as a pretext. Two weeks later the armed forces of the USSR also invaded Poland, but no war against the USSR was declared by the western allies. The relatively backward economy of the USSR was no threat to England.

It is appropriate that we reëxamine the background of the German invasion of western Poland during the time when there will be widespread notice of the half century that has passed since these events, which eventually brought about untold suffering to the major European nations and still cast their shadows on Europeans and even their descendants across the seas. (See Bulletin 19.)

Bromberg, now designated on maps by its Polish name, Bydgoszcz, was a Prussian city that was annexed by Poland in 1919 as part of the wide "corridor" to the Baltic Sea. This wide "corridor" was awarded to Poland by the western Allies and it cut Germany in two. On 3 September 1939 a genocidal slaughter of many of the German inhabitants of Bromberg took place which is designated by historians as the Bromberg Bloody Sunday. This genocidal action by the overconfident Poles no doubt contributed from the very outset to the grim, desperate nature of the Second World War, especially in eastern Europe We would probably be justified in saying that German attitudes toward Poles, even before 1918, were somewhat analogous to American attitudes toward Mexicans. There is even an old, pejorative German idiom, polnische Wirtschaft ("Polish Economy"), which designates a disorderly state of affairs. The massacres of the German population in and around Bromberg were given wide publicity in Germany and a large book with many gruesome pictures was published by the German Foreign Office under the title, Die polnischen Greueltaten an den Volksdeutschen in Polen (The Polish Atrocities Against the Ethnic Germans in Poland) We have a copy of this scarce book on our library. (See also our Bulletins Nos. 18 and 23.)

Unabhängige Nachrichten (Postfach 45 02 15, D-4630 Bochum 4, West Germany) is a small but notable journal of political and historical commentary with a patriotic intent. From time to time it has included short supplementary sheets for school textbooks pertaining to what its editors consider gaps in, or falsifications of, recent history. These have borne the title, Auf dem Stundenplan / Ersatzblatt für fehlende oder verfälschte Schulbücher (On the Lesson Plan / Supplementary Sheets for Insufficient or Falsified Schoolbooks). These sheets have covered a rather wide range of topics, including the lost eastern territories of Germany, the war guilt question, a comparison of the treaties of Brest-Litovsk and Versailles, the ethnic history of Czechoslovakia, the lessons of the Weimar Republic, German colonization in Africa, and the Reichskristallnacht.

I have long wanted to see a study of American school textbooks from a revisionistic point of view with regard to events of the Second World War. Such a study might become the basis for a series of correctional leaflets similar to Auf dem Stundenplan.

Now, in keeping with the notice that will be taken of the events of September 1939, I have made the following translation of the eleventh Ersatzblatt in the series, which deals with the outbreak of the German-Polish War in September 1939. The sheet is dated March 1987.

THE BROMBERG BLOODY SUNDAY

"As one of the first soldiers who entered Bromberg after these murders of ethnic Germans, it is my duty to make the following statement: Everything that has been written and told about this Bloody Sunday can only be a shadow of the reality. The actual insanity cannot be described and is incredible for those who were not eyewitnesses. Almost fifty years later, in many a dream, my mind wanders back to the corpses of the German population that had been hacked up beyond recognition. The German nation, and especially its young people, are being frightfully deceived. Indeed, the truth would probably be dangerous for the reëducators."

So goes the statement of the eyewitness J. Wichmann of Weissenborn in the Deutsche National Zeitung of 8 November 1985.

What Was This Bromberg Bloody Sunday?

In all of the school history books available to us we do not find the phrase "Bromberg Bloody Sunday" or "Bromberg." It is only one of the many mass crimes against Germans before and after the outbreak of the war which are not mentioned in the schoolbooks.

In all of the schoolbooks which were checked through only the outbreak of the war is described, and to be specific, in the following manner:

> In the morning hours of 1 September 1939 the German armies crossed Polish border without a declaration of war..... The formerly German territories of Poland, as well as those with a purely Polish population, were incorporated into the German Reich. The rest of western Poland was transformed into a "Generalgouvernement of Poland" and subordinated to the German government. There thus began a long period of suffering for the Polish population. It was oppressed from both the German and Russian sides and kept down by hunger. Polish property was destroyed or expropriated. The population was drafted for compulsory labor projects or went into German or Russian concentration camps...." (Rückert and Lachner, Grundriss der Geschichte [Outline of History], Paderborn, 1971.)

The Preliminary History

The unconditional guarantee given by England and France in March 1939 to go to war on the side of Poland in case of an armed conflict was a specific encouragement for the Poles to commit every conceivable provocation against the Germans in their territory and against the German Reich and to intensify without limit the bloody terror against the ethnic Germans. The Polish Marshal Rydz-Smigly declared in the summer of 1939:

> "Poland wants war with Germany and Germany will not be able to avoid it even if it wishes to do so."

This declaration was also naturally the result of the Anglo-French guarantee as well as the rejection of the very modest offer by the Reich of 28 August 1939. This rejection was tragic for all of Europe. This offer provided that Danzig [Gdansk, in Polish], in keeping with the desire of its purely German population, was to be returned to the Reich, a plebiscite was to take place in West Prussia ("the Corridor") and that an extraterritorial highway and rail connection through this territory was to be granted to the side which obtained the lesser number of votes in the plebiscite. Further, a complete protection of the minorities was to be guaranteed by both sides.

A more peaceful and juster solution is simply not conceivable!

With an awareness of the guarantee, during the months of April to September 1939 the Polish press published veritable orgies of hate against the German population that had settled there long, long ago and against the German Reich. At times stones flew against the windowpanes of German houses, while at other times peaceful German citizens were attacked by Poles and German women and children were struck down on the open street. Ethnic Germans by the thousands were put into prisons and Polish concentration camps. The property of the ethnic Germans was destroyed, confiscated and expropriated, and the closer the outbreak of the war provoked by the Poles came, the worse the Polish terror became. Finally, the number of Germans who were interned and deported to the reached 50,000. Thousands of them succumbed to hardships or were deprived of their lives by violence. Only by the rapid advance of the German troops were the surviving ethnic Germans spared the same fate.

The Climax of the Orgies of Murder

Beginning with 31 August 1939, every ethnic German in Poland, whether man, woman or child, had to fear for his life every minute. In all the cities and villages the horrible hunt for the Germans began. The authorities of the Polish police and army not only looked at this action of the incited Polish mob without doing anything about it, but in many cases even took part in it themselves.

The Bromberg Bloody Sunday of 3 September 1939 was the frightful climax of this orgy of murder, the climax of the twenty-year Polish war of annihilation against the German ethnic group.

In and around Bromberg thousands of ethnic Germans who could not escape the murderous gangs of Poles in time were murdered. The fact that raiding squads consisted for the most part of persons not resident in the area and had lists in their hands proves that these crimes were not only tolerated, but were directed. Using these lists, the murderous gangs searched through the houses of the ethnic Germans, abducted them or shot them on the spot. The meanness of the Polish clergy in this process is beyond belief! After Catholic church services in the German language were forbidden by order of the Polish church authorities on 3 July 1939, the priests incited the Poles during church services to "exterminate" [ausrotten] the Germans (the actual word used according to an interrogation record). Now, on this Bloody Sunday the clergymen of the Jesuit Church on Markt Platz [Market Plaza] issued weapons to the mob. There were instances in which Poles greeted their German neighbors before going to church and shot them after leaving church. Horrible events took place of which the human brain cannot conceive except for the perverse brains in which the deeds were thought up. Whoever was not shot in his dwelling or in the cellar of his house was shackled or tied to others and taken from the city and abused, mutilated and murdered in any number of ways. Even military units participated in the killing of the shackled, abducted ethnic Germans. For days the dead continued to lie on the fields, in the yards or gardens or in front of their houses, in many cases covered over only with branches and foliage or buried in shallow graves. Many lay in groups of two or three bound together along the the of the roads. Many of the victims were found only later at distant places. Many were missing forever. The corpses which were found were mutilated in manners which can scarcely be described.

More than 900 Germans found their last resting places on the honor section of the Protestant New Cemetery in Bromberg, on which high-rise buildings are standing today.

In and around Bromberg alone at least 5,347 Germans were murdered under horrible circumstances, a number which was examined by international witnesses. Even today there are no exact figures on the total number of the dead from the Polish massacres of 1939. In 1954 the East-German historian Theodor Bierschenk mentioned the number of 12,857 identified dead, which are supposed to have increased to 15,000 according to information obtained by the Central Graves Registry Office [Gräberzentrale] of Posen. The Social-Democratic publisher, Otto Heike from Lódz, mentioned the same number of victims in 1955.

All of that which we have reported here with revulsion took place before the war or during the first days of the war.

If, until the present time, all of the crimes against Germans before, during and especially after the war are passed over, minimized or excused in schoolbooks as an understandable revenge (something which is, naturally, false, unjust and immoral) there is not the slightest justification for these crimes before the invasion in 1939.

All of these crimes were the manifestation of a Polish megalomania, which was described on 3 August 1939 by the Flemish observer Ward Hermanns as follows:

> The Poles have lost the last feeling of moderation and proportion. Every foreigner who looks at the new maps in Poland, on which a large part of Germany as far as the proximity of Berlin, as well as Bohemia, Moravia and Slovakia and a gigantic part of Russia are already annexed in the quite fertile imagination of Poles, must think that Poland has become a gigantic lunatic asylum.

In addition, there was an unlimited hatred of Germans with the objective of slowly but certainly destroying our nation.

Within the framework of this goal, the "Bromberg Bloody Sunday," like innumerable other crimes against Germans during peacetime and before the invasion of German troops, was only a fraction of and a prelude to the mass murder of millions of Germans during and especially after the Second World War.

Since, according to everything we are taught, a constant reminder and continued awareness of the crimes which took place are a requisite for the reconciliation of the nations, this leaf should be entered as a substitute for insufficient or falsified schoolbooks, as instructional material in all of the schools of the German Federal Republic.

LÜGE UND WAHRHEIT

("Falsehood and Truth")

Translation by Charles E. Weber

The following is our third translation from the Kritik series, nos. 60 and 61. The first translation, which had to do with the involvement of the United States in the Second World War, was published in Bulletin 28 and republished in the Liberty Bell of October 1988. The second translation dealt with the destruction of the Czech village of Lidice. It was published in Bulletin 34 and republished in the Liberty Bell of June 1989. As in Bulletin 39, which dealt with the "Bromberg Bloody Sunday," we again turn our attention to the events of 1939 around the outbreak of the war between Poland and Germany on 1 September 1939, which was expanded into the Second World War three days later by the declaration of war against Germany by England and France. For information on the Kritik series, see Bulletin 28. Please note that the quotations from sources in English are retranslations and thus might not have exactly the original wording.

– Translator

It is a lie that Germany started the Second World War.

On the 40th anniversary of the outbreak of the German-Polish War, politicians and organizations, from Hamburg Mayor Klose to the churches, fell all over themselves in confessions of guilt, how much guilt we had taken on ourselves and in assertions that even those who had not yet been born at the time were burdened with it.

It is the truth that Poland annexed the purely Germany areas of West Prussia and Upper Silesia in 1919. [President] Wilson's advisor, Major General [T.H.] Bliss, said at the time: "Putting 2.1 million Germans under the rule of a nation which has never demonstrated the capacity for a strong self-government in its entire history will, in my opinion, necessarily lead to a new war in eastern Europe sooner or later." And the English Prime Minister, Lloyd George, went to the wall map during the peace negotiations in Versailles, pointed to Danzig and West Prussia and said: "This will be the cause of the next war."

As a matter of fact, already after the First World War Poland drove far more than a million Germans out of West Prussia and Upper Silesia, denounced the minority protection agreement imposed by the League of Nations, closed German schools and cultural institutions in large numbers and forbade German newspapers. [Concerning this, see also Bulletin 18.] Poland answered the German demand for self-determination in Danzig and West Prussia with the mobilization of its troops. The Poles overestimated their own strength and underestimated that of the Germans. The Polish Foreign Minister Lipski told the English Ambassador Henderson: "I do not think of advocating peace. If war comes, there will be revolution in Germany within three days and Poland can march in." In the Polish army "au revoir in Berlin" was introduced as a toast. During the months before the outbreak of the war, nearly all of the larger newspapers in Poland, such as Dzien Polski, Mosarstwowiec, Ilustrowany Kurier, demanded the annexation of at least East Prussia, but if possible the Oder-Neisse Line as a frontier. And the National Polish Youth League ["der allpolnische Jugendverband," as given in the German text] gave the following incitement: "In 1410 the Germans were defeated at Tannenberg. Now we shall beat them up at Berlin. Danzig, East Prussia and Silesia are minimal demands." The Germans in West Prussia and Upper Silesia were persecuted in a bloody manner. Every day Germans were murdered in keeping with the Poland Song of 1848: "May our enemy, the German, perish. Whoever hangs the German dogs will be given God's reward." In August 1939 alone more than 2,000 Germans were slain or shot without any indictment by a Polish prosecuting attorney. A country with self-respect cannot allow such provocations and attacks against its ethnic members without a response. The guilty party must be sought not in Berlin, but rather in Warsaw. The march into Poland was a justified police action.

And the war with England and France?

By the formulation that "Hitler started the war" the fact is concealed that the German Reich did not declare war against England and France, but England and France against the Reich. The assertion is made that they were obligated to do this as a result of a guarantee of boundaries given to Poland. But why did they not declare war against the U.S.S.R., which also marched into Poland in September 1939 and occupied the eastern part, and why did they not, along with the United States, see to it that Poland became free in 1945? Poland was only an excuse for a clique which wanted war. As early as 1936 Churchill said: "Germany is getting too strong. We must destroy it." And in Churchill's memoirs he writes: "One day President Roosevelt told me that he was about to have the question posed publicly as to what name to give to the war which he was determined to conduct. I gave him the answer at once: 'The Unforced War!' This was the case because there was never a war which would have been easier to avoid than that which would soon rage." And when Lord Halifax was challenged, he smugly said: 'Now we have forced Hitler into a war.' "

But are we guilty of the war against Russia?

The American ambassador in Moscow at the time, Joseph Davis, observed: "since the Munich discussions in 1938 Soviet industry has been working simply one-hundred percent for war." The Soviet party journal Communist confirmed this in 1958: "The non-aggression pact with Germany was intended to gain time and to increase our power. It was not England and France that were the real combatants. During May to June 1940 the Soviets decided to go to war and to wipe out fascism." On 12 November 1940 Molotov [Soviet foreign minister at the time] made unlimited demands on the Reich, in particular a free hand in Romania, which would have cut off the German supply of petroleum. Russia did not want a compromise with Germany, but rather war. In the Russian History of the Great Patriotic War 1941-1945 the following is stated concerning Russian intentions: "In keeping with the theory of achieving a break through the tactical defense of the enemy with the help of deep offensive operations, army units were supposed to make deep thrusts through the enemy defenses." As early as the spring of 1940 there were 116 infantry divisions and 20 cavalry divisions, as well as 40 armored brigades in deployment, which were opposed by no more than just 12 German divisions. Up to June 1941, 13 armies with 4,700,000 men, 21,000 tanks and 6,500 airplanes had moved into position here. They were opposed on the German side by only 3,000,000 men with 3,500 tanks and 2,700 airplanes. On 5 May 1941 Stalin told high-ranking Soviet leaders: "Within two months we can go to war." [It seems to me that Rudolf Hess' lonely flight to Scotland just five days later with the objective of a settlement between England and Germany could have been a specific reaction to Stalin's speech, about which German intelligence could have learned. — Translator] The high-ranking army commander [Andrej] Vlassov [captured in 1942 by, and then fought with, the Germans, and turned over to Soviet authorities after the war by the Americans as part of "Operation Keelhaul"] confirmed that the attack had been planned for August or September 1941. According to him, the Russians were marching into position since the beginning of the year, a process which lasted rather long as a result of the poor Russian rail connections. Hitler viewed the situation quite correctly, Vlassov said, and thrust right into the Russian deployment. The newspaper Contemporary Review adds: "One of the anomalies of this confused war of 1939-1945 lies in the fact that Hitler perceived the perfidious policies of Russia without any self-deception." There was only one possibility for Germany: to surprise the Soviet troops deployed for an attack before the Russian steam-roller got a start.

Those are the facts.

However, instead of proceeding against the lie of the German main guilt in the war, as have the American professors Charles C. Tansill, Harry Elmer Barnes, David L. Hoggan, and others, as well as Taylor, the professor of history at the English University of Oxford, and instead of rejecting decisively the demands made on account of the "German war guilt," "our" politicians befoul their own nests with self-reproaches. People who befoul their own nest are not respected anywhere; they have an embarrassing effect. Anyone can go around in sackcloth and ashes as he wishes. We could be indifferent to this if it were not for the phrase used by Klose, "joint responsibility" [Mithaftung]. This is the case because these accusations of guilt have consequences: unlimited demands for reparations, obtaining economic favors through blackmail, and weakening of our own political position in the world. Instead of averting harm from the German nation in keeping with their oath, many of the politicians do unlimited harm to our nation. For that reason the historical truth must not simply be discussed in congresses of philologists [sic] but belongs to the people in general!

Let us work toward that end!

STALIN REMEMBERED

We were astonished to note that an important item of historical revisionism was published in the Wall Street Journal, of all places. An editorial in the issue of 23 August, page A10, entitled "Stalin Remembered," contained the following paragraph:

> A new volume, titled "The Icebreaker" and published in West Germany by a former member of the Soviet secret service, the GRU, does much to refute the myth that Stalin agreed to the Nazi pact in order to keep peace for the Russian motherland. Writing under the pseudonym "Suvorov"—the name of a great Russian field marshal—the Soviet exile argues that Stalin calculatedly allowed Hitler to commit the first aggressions in the hope they would clear the way for an international socialist revolution. He claims that the numbers of Soviet prisoners and materiel seized in the first days of the June 1941 Nazi attack were so huge because Stalin himself was preparing to attack Hitler the following month.

This is hardly new to historical revisionists. As long ago as January 1986 an article by Suvorov to this effect appeared in the Liberty Bell. This article, in turn, was a republication of the article that had originally appeared in the Journal of the Royal United Services Institute for Defense Studies, London, June 1985 issue. [Reprints of "Who Was Planning to Attack Whom in 1941: Hitler or Stalin?" are available @ 2 for $1.50 + postage from Liberty Bell Publications.]

JOURNALISTIC VERSIONS OF THE SECOND WORLD WAR

Two very widely read weekly periodicals, Time and U.S. News, have taken notice of the beginning of the Second World War a half century ago in the form of long articles. The 18-page Time article is largely devoted to the military defeat of Poland in September 1939, but makes no mention of the Bromberg massacres, an aspect of the war which was to have considerable consequences. The Time article in the issue dated 28 August is to be continued. One of the Time journalists stated (p. 34) that Poland had "reemerged into independence only in 1920," apparently unaware that a Polish state had been proclaimed as early as 1916. The 27-page U.S. News article concentrates largely on Hitler, stating (p. 1) that he was the "one man responsible for World War II." Hitler was the subject of a largely Freudian analysis and was characterized as "the monster... who 'scientifically exterminated' 6 million Jews in the death camps of the German empire."

It is rather depressing to contemplate that such unbalanced, distorted and to some extent factually inaccurate versions of the history of the Second World War are being read by millions of Americans. □

Title 3—

The President

Proclamation 6014 of August 29, 1989

World War II Remembrance Week, 1989

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

Fifty years ago, on September 1, 1939, the proud nation of Poland was invaded by forces from Nazi Germany, marking the end of its independence and the beginning of World War II. Poland suffered a second devastating blow 16 days later, when Soviet forces invaded from the East. In a secret protocol to the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact signed the previous month, Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union had plotted the conquest and partition of Poland and the Baltic States.

While many of the events that took place during the fateful month of September 1939 and the 6 turbulent years that followed might seem remote today, it is our duty—to future generations and to those who bravely defended the cause of freedom—to remember them. By recalling these events, we remind ourselves that real and lasting peace can be won only when the rights and dignity of all human beings are cherished and protected.

During World War II, the United States and its allies were engaged in nothing less than a life-and-death struggle for the fate of millions of people. Totalitarian regimes in Germany, Italy, and Japan—intent on regional hegemony and even world domination—posed a threat to all free and sovereign nations. The imperialist aims and racist policies of the government of Nazi Germany and some of its allies resulted in the deaths of millions of innocent men, women, and children—including six million Jews. By the end of the 6-year-long war, more than 15 million combatants and 24 million noncombatants had been killed. Many of these casualties occurred among the people of the U.S.S.R., whose sacrifices were instrumental in securing the Allied victory. The enormous costs of this fight against tyranny can never be forgotten.

Today, the principles that motivated the Western Allies during World War II continue to demonstrate their undeniable appeal. The history of the Federal Republic of Germany is now a moving testament to the power of democratic ideas, the wisdom of West Germany's post-war leaders, and the talent and resilience of the German people. Today the Federal Republic is among America's closest allies, and a champion of human rights, democracy, and freedom.

The people of Eastern Europe have continued to struggle for freedom and their right to self-determination. With courage and persistence the Polish and Hungarian people have begun a democratic transition in their countries.

The United States welcomes positive changes in Poland and Hungary—and in the Soviet Union itself. Nevertheless, we realize that the goals fought for during World War II have not been fully won. We stand with those peoples who continue to struggle for representative government and complete and lasting guarantees of their God-given rights. We look to a Europe whole and free.

Today, as we recall the grave events of September 1, 1939, and the years of bitter conflict that followed, let us pause to salute our Nation's veterans, the hundreds of thousands of Americans who gave their lives, and the millions of civilians who rallied to support the cause of freedom. Their courage and selflessness—reflected day after day in acts of great personal sacrifice—led the way to victory. Let us also rededicate ourselves to promoting freedom and respect for human rights around the world, for they are the only sure foundation for lasting peace.

To commemorate the 50th anniversary of the outbreak of World War II, the Congress, by House Joint Resolution 221, has designated the week beginning September 1, 1989, as "World War II Remembrance Week" and has authorized and requested the President to issue a proclamation in observance of this occasion.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, GEORGE BUSH, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the week beginning September 1, 1989, as World War II Remembrance Week. I ask all Americans to join in remembering and reflecting upon this conflict, which changed forever the history of mankind. I also call upon government officials and private organizations to observe this week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-ninth day of August, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-nine, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and fourteenth.

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. Fiftieth Anniversary of World War II

Message by President Richard von Weizsäcker to the President of the Polish People's Republic, His Excellency Mr. Wojciech Jaruzelski, remembering the German attack on Poland on September 1st, 1939 that unleashed World War II.

Following are some key quotes from President von Weizsäcker's letter dated August 23, 1989:

- Poland became the first victim of a war provoked by the National Socialist leadership. Neither the tensions that existed between Germany and Poland at the time nor the cynical Hitler-Stalin Pact can exonerate it from blame for starting the war. It alone launched the attack, showing utter contempt for humanity, international law, and the need for reconciliation.

- Who could ever forget the fate which befell Jews from Poland and the whole of Europe in Auschwitz, Majdanek, Treblinka, Sobibor and elsewhere in your country at the hands of Germans? Unprecedented are the consequences of war and war crimes which the whole Polish nation have had to bear.

- But in your country as in ours people have the same emotions and needs. They are looking for and need peace. They want to live again as peaceful neighbors. That is why it is necessary to find the way out of the guilt and misfortune, out of the suffering and misery, into a future of mutual trust. To do so we need the will to recognize the truth and to develop mutual understanding.

- The people are often ahead of their governments and pave the way. In performing our political tasks we had to take account of - and we respect - the fact that for Germany as a whole there has still been no post-war settlement. The victorious powers reserved the right to make such a settlement to themselves. But the Federal Republic of Germany and the Polish People's Republic have, within the scope of their powers and responsibilities, pledged their word to each other. My country has given a binding promise that it will neither now nor in the future make any territorial claims on Poland.

- We Germans are well aware of the extraordinary significance of the developments currently taking place in Poland, and of the need for political reform coupled with economic stability. We want Poland to be economically strong as well and thus be able to participate in and contribute to the continent's favorable development.

(President Jaruzelski's message referred to in the first sentence of President von Weizsäcker's letter was the Polish leader's thank you-note for a congratulatory message on assuming the Polish Presidency.)

GERMAN INFORMATION CENTER, 950 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10022 (212) 888-9840

Reprinting Permitted

Dear Mr. President,

I wish to thank you for your message of 4 August and to address myself to you and your fellow-countrymen in connection with 1 September 1989.

Fifty years ago, on 1 September 1939, the German attack on Poland unleashed the Second World War. That war convulsed Europe and led to untold human suffering.

It affected the destiny of the Poles and Germans in particular. Both nations commemorate that day with deep emotion. We are divided by the most painful memories. But the people also have the deepest sympathy for one another across all frontiers. Today we have both the duty and the opportunity to look into a future which will unite us.

Poland became the first victim of a war provoked by the National Socialist leadership. Neither the tensions that existed between Germany and Poland at the time nor the cynical Hitler-Stalin Pact can exonerate it from blame for starting the war. It alone launched the attack showing utter contempt for humanity, international law, and the need for reconciliation.

Countless are the victims and indescribable is the suffering which the people of your country had to bear during and after the war. Nearly every family was affected, including your own. Was any city devastated to such a terrible extent as Warsaw during the uprising of 1944? Who could ever forget the fate which befell Jews from Poland and the whole of Europe in Auschwitz, Majdanek, Treblinka, Sobibor and elsewhere in your country at the hands of Germans? Unprecedented are the consequences of war and war crimes which the whole Polish nation have had to bear.

But we Germans too have deep scars from the war. We saw injustice and suffering recoil on our own people in whose name those crimes had been committed. The grave losses of human life, the destruction of Dresden and many other cities, were followed by the expulsion of millions of Germans from their native regions and, with the division of Europe, by the division of our own nation and capital.

We inflicted terrible wounds on one another and the scars are still hurting. Bitterness and alienation were the result. They left behind feelings of hostility and vengeance. The atmosphere was further poisoned by the confrontation of political systems in Europe during the cold war.

But in your country as in ours people have the same emotions and needs. They are looking for and need peace. They want to live again as peaceful neighbours. That is why it is necessary to find the way out of the guilt and misfortune, out of the suffering and misery, into a future of mutual trust. To do so we need the will to recognize the truth and to develop mutual understanding.

In the millennium during which Germany and Poland have been neighbours there have been dark shadows but there has also been a great deal of light and mutual enrichment. Few other European Nations are as intellectually, culturally, geographically and historically dependent upon one another as the Poles and the Germans, as regards both their differences and their similarities.

Both have their own interpretation of history. But they should not use it to make it difficult for each other to live with the past in facing the future. What matters is the fate of the people in your country and mine. They will not benefit from any hardening of political attitudes based in history. Only open hearts and minds for personal suffering will help.

For a long time there was little opportunity for that. The Poles were disturbed by some thoughtless remarks in our country and waited for unqualified expressions of understanding. We felt the same way towards the Poles.

But on both sides there have also been good signs. Unforgotten are the words of the Polish bishops in November 1965 with which they, "in a very human spirit", forgave and asked forgiveness. Their German colleagues, deeply moved, thanked them, just as previously the Protestant Church in our country, with its memorandum on Poland, had paved the way for reconciliation.

In the meantime many personal contacts have developed. Private hospitality and links based on mutual trust between towns and cities testify to a fundamental common feeling and a clear awareness of our common responsibility for peace and creation, for the dignity, the freedom and the rights of the individual.

The people are often ahead of their governments and pave the way. In performing our political tasks we had to take account of - and we respect - the fact that for Germany as a whole there has still been no post-war settlement. The victorious powers reserved the right to make such a settlement to themselves. But the Federal Republic of Germany and the Polish People's Republic have, within the scope of their powers and responsibilities, pledged their word to each other. This was done by means of the Warsaw Treaty of 7 December 1970, which points the way. That is how it will remain. My country has given a binding promise that it will neither now nor in the future make any territorial claims on Poland. Our respect for the law is reflected in the fundamental human dictate of reconciliation. That is the view of the overwhelming majority of Germans, old and young. They want to live in peace and security themselves and they understand and respect the wish of the Polish people to live within secure borders. They therefore seek reconciliation with Poland without any reservations.

On the basis of these agreements and through our mutual contributions to the Final Act of Helsinki we must fulfil the hopes which Europe pins on the Poles and Germans in particular. We live side by side in the heart of Europe. Self-determination for all of its peoples, freedom, legal protection and equal opportunities for all, are values deriving from the European spirit which moulds both our nations.

We Germans are well aware of the extraordinary significance of the developments currently taking place in Poland, and of the need for political reform coupled with economic stability. We want Poland to be economically strong as well and thus be able to participate in and contribute to the continent's favourable development.

That is why we seek intensive, broad-ranging political, economic and cultural co-operation with Poland. We want that co-operation to benefit all people, and I am sure you will appreciate my also having in mind the Germans living in Poland.

Europe now has opportunities as never before since the end of the Second World War. It is up to us to make sure they do not pass by because history tends not to repeat its offers.

Fifty years after the 1st of September 1939 we want the Polish people to know that our reflections on that day embrace both the memory of the injustice and suffering inflicted on Poland and our respect for the dignity and pride which your country has retained in every situation and which signify a nation of strong character.

Just as Europe was plunged into a terrible war by the attack on Poland half a century ago, Poles and Germans can today, through reconciliation, play a major part in bringing the whole of Europe nearer a free and peaceful future. May we succeed in this common task.

Yours sincerely,
(SGD) Richard von Weizsäcker made by Chancellor Helmut Kohl in the German Bundestag

on September 1, 1989

Key points in Chancellor Kohl's statement were:

- Keeping alive the memory of the war is what we owe to the innocent victims, above all those of the Shoah, the unparalleled genocide of the European Jews, to the Poles, against whom Hitler waged a total war of enslavement and annihilation, to the Sinti and Romanies, and to the many other victims of the National-Socialist tyranny.

- We are grateful to all those who, after the war and tyranny, reached out their hand in reconciliation - above all the American nation, which at an early state provided generous food aid and assistance in reconstruction, thus unforgettably demonstrating active charity and political foresight. Prudent statesmen like President Truman and George Marshall and many private individuals participated in such peace efforts.
- The Federal Republic of Germany shall continue to abide by the letter and spirit of the the Warsaw Treaty of 1970.

I

Today we are remembering in Germany, in Europe and world-wide the outbreak of World War II fifty years ago. This imposes a special duty on us as freely elected representatives of the German people. We face this duty with the earnestness that this day demands of us.

Today we are filled with sorrow and with the sense of responsibility that the memory of World War II entails. Particular responsibility derives from the fact that the war was unleashed by the criminal regime that was in control of Germany then. We feel sorrow at the untold suffering inflicted on people and nations by Germans and in the name of Germany, and we mourn the many innocent victims from the midst of our own nation.

As the perpetrators themselves intended, the war was a merciless war of racism and destruction. It acquired a dimension of terror that had never been seen before - and should never recur. It was the final outcome of a totalitarian ideology which, in its fanaticism, idolized a single race.

Keeping alive the memory of it is what we owe to the innocent victims, above all those of the Shoah, the unparalleled genocide of the European Jews, to the Poles, against whom Hitler waged a total war of enslavement and annihilation, to the Sinti and Romanies, and to the many other victims of the National-Socialist tyranny.

We mourn the victims of oppression and deprivation of fundamental rights, which Hitler's dictatorship first inflicted on Germany and then on the world; we mourn the innocent victims at the battlefronts and at home as well as the victims of expulsion.

We also remember the millions of soldiers from many nations who perished while prisoners-of-war or returned home disabled. Who could forget the women who waited in vain for their husbands, and the mothers who waited in vain for their sons! And how many children lost their father or mother!

Remembering the innocent victims means keeping the horror in our minds, keeping it present, as it were. It must always serve as a warning to us. It must not be made light of by false comparisons. Let us guard against thoughtlessly or polemically using words like "facism" or "resistance" to describe current situations.

There is not only a temptation to make light of the past. It is also thoughtless and unfeeling to close one's eyes to present-day suffering. Let us remember at this moment those people and nations who are still denied a life in dignity and freedom.

After that world war and the destruction wrought in the period from 1939 to 1945, after Auschwitz and Babi Jar, after Oradour and Lidice, our world could never be the same as before. Traditions and seemingly self-evident truths must therefore be critically examined time and again.

Continuity is only justifiable if it involves a deliberate perpetuation of good, which can never be destroyed. This includes the liberal traditions in the history of our nation. They are the moral fabric from which we shaped the Federal Republic of Germany - the most liberal society that has ever existed on German soil.

To be sure, even after 1945 some incorrigible people who refused to learn spoke out, but they were strongly condemned by the vast majority of survivors and rebuffed once and for all. For the survivors had personally experienced the effects of the former evil doctrines and were only too familiar with their devastating impact.

The evil in history will not survive in the long run. This gives cause for hope. With his fanatical belief in a racial state, Hitler defied all historical experience. But history passed him over. After twelve years his so-called "Thousand-Year-Reich" vanished in rubble and ashes.

It is true that too many people in Germany and some abroad were blinded and deceived by that tyrant. But the judgement of the National-Socialist dictatorship hinges alone on its crimes, its campaign of destruction and its genocide.

The wounds caused by World War II have not healed yet. They are burnt into the minds of nations. But they have also branded the people individually, everyone who experienced that period of horror, be it as a child. I myself am unable to this day to rid myself of the images that were deeply impressed on my mind in 1939 - I was nine years old then - and in the war years that followed. I still recall the terrible night-time bombing in my home town, the many dead lying in the streets and in demolished houses.

Other people still vividly recall the cattle waggons of the "death trains" packed with people destined for the extermination camps; the battlefields of the war, where millions of soldiers experienced fear, want and death; the seemingly endless processions of emaciated children, women and old people who were fleeing or had been expelled; the trains carrying refugees in which mothers clung to their frozen children.

Those who innocently lost their lives then and those who survived the horror - all of them are a warning to us not to forget that man's inalienable dignity must always and everywhere be the yardstick of our actions. The dignity of the weakest must be the touchstone.

Particularly in Germany the memory of the past must not be lost. It is a heavy burden for us Germans, but it has also helped us to responsibly shape our society. And it is the prerequisite for our being able to do so in future, too.

Unlike after World War I, there was no discussion about war guilt after 1945. Hitler had wanted, planned and unleashed the war. There was not and cannot be any doubt about that. We must strongly oppose all attempts to modify this assessment. Veracity as well as political and moral decency demand this of us. Enlightened patriotism also requires it of us. For Hitler's destructive drive was ultimately also directed against the German nation itself: Faced with total defeat, he intended to tear it into the abyss with himself. He had spoken of a "national community", but in reality he wanted to exclude, and not integrate, many sections of the nation. He was obsessed by the notion of race, to which he subjugated everything, even the national concept.

He had spoken of "divine providence" but in truth he wanted to destroy religious ties and Christian ethics. Europe's ethical culture meant nothing to him, but his own depotism everything.

Today we can note with gratitude that the Federal Republic of Germany, our free society, differs radically from everything that the National-Socialist despots aspired to. In over forty years we have, through joint efforts, built a republic which is committed to freedom and peace and enjoys high esteem throughout the world. The Federal Republic of Germany rests firmly on precisely those values which Hitler deeply abhorred and rabidly combated.

II

The men and women who deliberated our constitution, the Basic Law, in the Parliamentary Council were well aware of this contrast. They acted in the light of their own experience. They had witnessed the rise of National-Socialism, but very few of them had ever imagined where Hitler's dictatorship would ultimately lead to. Their motto was thus "principiis obsta". For the disaster had not started in 1939, but years earlier, even before 1933. The development that could initially have been stopped became ever harder to halt and reverse in the course of time.

The origins of World War II also teach us that power, granted for whatever purpose, can only be checked by counterbalances.

We do not in the least diminish the guilt of the National-Socialist rulers in stating today:

- At home, sections of the social and political elites failed. Many had refused to support the democratic Weimar Republic. Later, quite a few, some of them to the very end, harboured the illusion that the fanaticism of the National-Socialist rulers could be bridled by compromise and co-operation.

- And it is also true that European powers unintentionally assisted a development that in fact favoured Hitler's plans, they had misjudged him. The widespread yearning for "peace in our time" - as Chamberlain put it in 1938 after Munich - was certainly understandable, but it was also a poor counsellor. It was essential then to see through the dictator's plans with a vigilant eye.

Only a comprehensive balance of power can reliably guarantee lasting peace. But true peace requires more. For this reason we unreservedly acknowledge in our Basic Law "inviolable and inalienable rights as the basis of every community, of peace and of justice in the world".

The experience of the inter-war years shows that a fair balance is not possible if goodwill exists on one side only. The developments leading up to World War II taught the community of free nations how important it is to be vigilant. This is still valid today, even though we are now also witnessing fundamental change in the relationship with our neighbors in the East and South-East. We all hope that the encouraging developments of our time will last and be continued. We shall do everything possible to contribute to this. We Germans are under a special obligation to do so. This stems not least from the Hitler-Stalin pact of 1939. We are aware of the special responsibility that we bear on account of the fact that Hitler invaded Poland after concluding that pact, which many described as satanical. Poland thus became the first victim of the National-Socialist war of racism and annihilation.

The accords reached then were a shameful abuse of the independence and territorial integrity of Poland, the Baltic States, Finland and rumania. There was no justification whatsoever for the assault on international law, not least on the right to self-determination. We fully condemn it and the subsequent atrocities.

The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany has on various occasions stated that the 1939 accords are not legally valid for the Federal Republic of Germany. this also means that the pact itself and the supplementary accords do not in any way justify the ensuing violations of international law by the German Reich and the Soviet Union.

The Hitler-Stalin pact was a product of the dynamical interaction of two dictatorships. One of them vanished forever in the inferno that it itself unleashed. The Soviet Union is now - 36 years after Stalin's death - in the midst of a painful process of critical self-analysis in the light of a "new thinking."

World War II saw the start of a development which was forcibly completed after the war. Our fatherland was divided. For the Germans in the GDR and for many peoples om Central, Eastern and South-Eastern Europe, the end of the war marked the beginning of a new dictatorship replacing the former. The division of Germany and Europe can be partly explained but can in no way be justified by World War II.

This is why remarks like the one made by General Secretary Gorbachev here in Bonn last June that the post-war period is coming to an end are a source of hope for all the people and nations directly suffering as a result of the division of Europe and Germany - in so far as they imply overcoming the existing situation by peaceful means.

III

Over many generations, divided Poland clung undauntedly to the idea of national unity. Precisely the memory of Poland's fate can help us Germans to bear the burden of division as long as we have not achieved "in Free self-determination the unity and freedom of Germany".

We feel particularly linked to the Polish people in the common desire for national self-determination. The recipient of the Peace Prize of the German Book Trade, Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, who himself suffered greatly under the National-Socialist tyranny, stated on this subject a little while ago: "Overcoming the division of Germany is also in Poland's interest, We seek a democracy to the West of us."

Professor Bartoszewski has signed the Joint Declaration of Polish and German Catholics marking September 1, 1989 and entitled "Striving for freedom, justice and peace in Europe". The new Polish Prime Minister, Tadeusz Mazowiecki, has likewise signed the declaration. I gladly take this opportunity to convey our best wishes to Prime Minister Mazowiecki for his difficult post. We want him to be successful, and we want to everything in our power to assist in in this respect.

There can be no doubt that the current political and social change occurring in countries of the Warsaw Pact holds out the historic prospect of achieving human rights for all those Europeans who were denied them in the past decades - and hence for all Germans as well.

My Government is firmly resolved to make use of this opportunity. As Konrad Adenauer stated at the Silesians' meeting on June 11, 1961, our aim is "that Europe should some day become a large, common house for all Europeans, a house of freedom."

In Europe of the future, the main concern must be self-determination and human rights - sovereignty of the people, more so than borders or territories. Not sovereign states, but sovereign peoples will one day complete the construction of Europe.

Never again must Europe follow the disastrous path from humanism via nationalism to bestiality, which Grillparzer predicted last century. Dreadful things were done to the Polish people by Germans and in the name of Germany. Who in this country still remembers that the concentration camps on Polish soil were also intended to systematically eradicate the élites of the Polish nation?

Reconciliation is only possible if we speak the whole truth. Part of the truth is the fact that over two million Germans perished as refugees or expellees. The loss of their native region has left deep scars for many millions of our fellow countrymen. This bitter experience must not be suppressed; we want to learn from it. For what is the point in Germans and Poles setting off accounts, as some in this country and in Poland unfortunately still do? Coming generations will judge us by what we do today so that they can live in peace and common freedom.

Franco-German reconciliation and friendship illustrate how deep gulfs that have existed for decades or even centuries can be overcome. And our relationship with the State of Israel and with Jews throughout the world shows that even abysses can be bridged.

We seek understanding between the German and Polish peoples. This is our duty, and it accords with the yearning of both nations. Earlier this week, President von Weizsäcker expressed this heartfelt desire in his message to President Jaruzelski of Poland. Now, fifty years after the outbreak of World War II, the time has come for lasting reconciliation.

We are aware of the bitter feelings that emerged in the war against Germany - in Poland, in France and later in the Soviet Union, which mourned the death of 20 million people. Most European countries suffered greatly at the hands of the Germans. Today many of them are our partners, indeed our friends.

We are grateful to all those who, after the war and tyranny, reached out their hand in reconciliation - above all the American nation, which at an early state provided generous food aid and assistance in reconstruction, thus unforgettably demonstrating active charity and political foresight. Prudent statesmen like President Truman and George Marshall and many private individuals participated in such peace efforts.

In this connection I would like to mention Joseph Rovan from France, who wrote this sentence only a few months after being freed from Dachau concentration camp: "The more our enemies have eradicated the traits of the human face, he more we must respect, indeed embellish, those traits in them".

In the last few decades ground-breaking steps have been taken in achieving reconciliation with Poland. In this connection I would particularly like to mention the diverse initiatives of the Churches.

The Warsaw Treaty of 1970, signed by the then Chancellor, Willy Brandt, constituted a further step in that direction. We shall continue to abide by the letter and spirit of the treaty. In its preamble, Poland and the Federal Republic of Germany express their will to secure a peaceful future for the new generation that has meanwhile grown up and to establish "durable foundations for peaceful coexistence and the development of normal and good relations."

In the early 1980s, when Poland was going through a difficult period, the population of the Federal Republic of Germany manifested its solidarity with the Polish people by spontaneously providing generous assistance.

I am convinced that the opening-up of Polish society will have a favorable impact on our efforts. The opportunities for understanding between our peoples will improve, the more progress is made towards individual freedom in Poland. True reconciliation depends not just on human will, but also on political circumstances.

Prejudices and distrust will not persist where borders can be crossed, where information and opinions can be freely exchanged and people, especially the young generation, can meet each other in conditions of freedom.

Franco-German reconciliation has proved so successful not lest because it rests on a common foundation of democracy and the rule of law and because new mutual understanding has evolved through increased contacts and dialogue between the French and the Germans.

IV

Where freedom is lost, peace is soon forfeited - first at home, then not infrequently externally as well.

The Hitler dictatorship and the Second World War warn us time and again about the seductive power of extremism or indeed totalitarianism. The danger of extremism is always present - even in an open, democratic society.

It is therefore essential for a democratic state to counteract such temptations as soon as possible. Seen against the background of the National-Socialist dictatorship, this means protecting the people through the rule of law from being exposed one day to totalitarianism.

Freedom and democracy are not abstract principles. They affect every individual most directly. His personal freedom and happiness are at stake. Let us together ensure, that people always remain conscious of this!

The people must be protected from the ambivalence inherent in a totalitarian dictatorship manifested by temptation and violence, justice and injustice, conformity and coercion. The National-Socialist regime entangled people of goodwill in a confusing, diabolical net from which it became increasingly difficult to escape.

The boundaries between good and evil became increasingly blurred. A person's honesty was less and less a guarantee of proper conduct. A woodcut black and white portrayal of the generations of our parents and grandparents would therefore not do justice to them.

To this day we Germans are painfully aware of the conflicting nature of life during the war unleashed by Hitler. It is one of the tragedies of that era that the loyalty and patriotism of millions of people - whether at the front of at home - were misused for criminal purposes.

It is a reflection of the perfid and perverseness of totalitarian systems that they deliberately place people in a situation in which there is practically no alternative to either incurring guilt or exposing oneself to danger.

- On the one hand there were the soldiers who fought and suffered during the Second World War. Most of them were honestly convinced that they were serving their country faithfully. There were many instances of bravery and human greatness which command deep respect.

Such attitudes do not deserve to be belittled or indeed derided, for they are associated with the experience of death, pain and fear - and in many cases tormenting qualms of conscience.

- On the other hand there are the crimes committed by the Nazis. They cannot be separated from what happened during the war. Many people suffered under this contradiction at that time.

When we speak of the destruction left behind by National Socialism we should also bear in mind the devastation in the minds and hearts of the people. It is an emotional burden not only on those who were faced with this dilemma but also on their children and grandchildren, who themselves must try to form a fair judgement of the generations of their parents and grandparents.

We should beware of making hasty judgements from today's vantage point. Who among us can say with a good conscience that, confronted with such evil, they would have summoned the strength to be martyrs? And who among us can judge what it meant at that time to risk not only one's own life but the lives of one's family as well?

People today are no better and no worse than the people of that era, but the are not under compulsion to make decisions in the conditions prevailing under totalitarianism.

We recall with gratitude that even in the darkest period in our history, during the war and dictatorship, the spirit of humanity could not be destroyed. Everywhere there were moving examples of helpfulness, generosity and humanity - across the battle fronts.

There were men and women who offered resistance. among them were quite a few who at first served the dictator until they realized that they - no doubt like th majority of Germans - had been duped, betrayed and exploited. They had the strength to turn back - and many of them paid for that with their lives.

Only democracy does not expect people to do anything that is normally beyond their power. It offers them protection from the terrible decision which the National-Socialist dictatorship demanded of them: either to become accomplices, which was all too easy, or to show heroic courage.

Thus precisely the memory of the Hitler dictatorship should induce us to resist any movement that promises complete salvation from all the evils of this world. Those who - whatever portents they may invoke - make such a promise are certainly on the road to new disaster.

They have learned nothing from experience.

The disasters of our recent history teach us that there can be no middle road between democracy and dictatorship, that there can be no common values and no moral compromise. Freedom and bondage are, after all, as incompatible as fire and water.

Dictatorship may deceive and dazzle, but only democracy affords a person self-determination. It convinces by virtue of its sense of moderation, its soundness, and its predictability. In this prudence lies its greatness - and at the same time a reason why some see little attraction in it.

Democracy was simply not made for a situation of never-ending rapture but for normal, everyday life. It is not geared to deeds heroic and out of the ordinary but to that which is humane and normal, in the best sense of the word.

Political parties and the right of opposition are manifestations of a living democracy. It is for this very reason that the parties were so bitterly and mercilessly fought by Hitler; the dictator knew very well that once the parties had been removed democracy, too, would be dead.

We should call to mind more frequently that leading politicians of the post-war era - such as SPD Chairman Kurt Schumacher and the first chairman of the CDU, Andreas Hermes - had first-hand experience of the prisons, concentration camps and indeed the death cells of the National-Socialist dictatorship.

The conclusion from our knowledge of the period up to 1933 must be: extremism, whether from the right or from the left, can only succeed and gain power if the people turn away from or are indifferent to the democratic parties.

Disaster can hardly be avoided if, in addition, the social and political élite reach out a hand - possibly under the illusion that they will be able to cope with the extremists.

If we nip such developments in the bud, extremism has no chance. But if we treat them as something normal they will pose a threat to democracy. It is never too early to fight such tendencies.

Let us not place too great a strain on our democracy - it is a precious and at the same time fragile asset. Let us not misunderstand it as a panacea for all the hardships and problems of this world.

Let us always and everywhere defend democracy and the rule of law - they alone guarantee freedom and justice for all. They alone protect the individual from the dangers of totalitarianism - and that is why every individual is called upon to make them his personal.

Justice, respect for the law and legal security are as vital to democracy as the air we breathe. That is the legacy of the German resistance. Those who consistently defend the rule of law will not find themselves in the position of one day having to resist those who challenge it.

Restoring justice, respect for the law and legal security was the main object of the resistance. This applies at least to the majority of all those who bravely rose up against the National-Socialist regime. Today, therefore, we pay equal tribute to

- the cabinet-maker Johann Georg Elser,
- Colonel Claus Graf Schenck von Stauffenberg
- the Kreisau Circle around Helmuth James Graf von Moltke,
- the White Rose personified by Sophie and Hans Scholl,
- such steadfast people as Julius Leber and Carl Goerdeler,
- and the many others who, on grounds of conscience, courageously opposed tyranny.

We would not only be detracting from the German resistance but dangerously distorting the historical facts if we were to use the term resistance, which is inseparably linked to dictatorship, arbitrarily in connection with present-day events.

By claiming a monopoly, the National Socialists fiercely combated all rival philosophies. Christians and Socialists, Liberals and trade unionists, Conservatives and Communists were all regarded as enemies. Without the interaction of people of completely different political convictions, we Germans would not have been able to make such an impressive fresh start after 1945.

The moral greatness of resistance is not determined by its success or failure. The attempt to assassinate Hitler had to be ventured at all events and at any price. Colonel Henning von Treskow, who greatly influenced Stauffenberg's thoughts and actions from 1943 onwards, found particularly impressive words. Before his death, he described one more the main motive of his action:

"I consider Hitler to be the arch-enemy not only of Germany, but of the whole world. When I appear before the judgement seat of God in a few hours time to account for my acts and omissions, I believe that I shall be able to answer with a clear conscience for what I have done in the struggle against Hitler. Just as God once promised Abraham that he would not destroy Sodom if there were just ten righteous persons in the city, I hope that for our sake God will not destroy Germany."

We owe deep gratitude to the men and women of the German resistance. Great respect is also due to those who, by emigrating, refused to support the despotic regime or had to flee from it. They included people who then, out of love for their fatherland, combated the Hitlerian dictatorship from abroad. Among them were the writers who attempted to rouse the world through the power of their words and to draw attention to what was happening in Germany.

For most emigrés it was not easy to leave their fatherland, and some of them also found it hard to return later. We are thus all the more grateful to those who helped build the Federal Republic of Germany. Right up to this day, this very participation greatly assists the present-day efforts towards reconciliation and peace.

Let me also recall a man whom I deem to be one of the great heroes of the 20th century: Raoul Wallenberg. In 1944, at the age of 32, he risked his life to rescue in Budapest hundreds of thousands of Jews threatened with death. In 1945 he was deported to the Soviet Union and has been missing ever since.

In my talks with General Secretary Gorbachev, I drew attention to the uncertain fate of that exceptionally courageous man. I very much hope that in this period of change, in which the depressing legacy of Stalinism is openly being discussed in Warsaw Pact countries, the fate of Raoul Wallenberg can be clarified in a truly convincing manner. I therefore greatly welcome the fact that the Soviet authorities recently invited relatives of Raoul Wallenberg to Moscow.

VI

Today, September 1, I particularly wish to address the young people in Germany. They do not bear any blame for the dictatorship and the world war - neither collectively, because there is no such guilt, nor individually, because they are too young. Yet they bear responsibility because the past remains with us. No German can escape it. But let us always perceive the burden of history as an opportunity as well: Anyone who is familiar with this century's history has heightened awareness of the dangers and enticements of our time. Let us also resist the temptation of today scorning patriotism and love of one's fatherland because these values were abused in the National-Socialist period. Showing disdain for patriotism would be to unwittingly by comply with Hitler's intentions. Colonel General Ludwig Beck, who was involved in the assassination attempt on July 20, 1944, perceived this and once wrote with great alarm: "That man doesn't have a fatherland at all."

Love of one's fatherland and love of freedom, patriotism and European consciousness must never again follow separate paths - this is the conclusion that we must draw.

Similarly it is essential to link virtues like courage, loyalty and dedication inextricably to fundamental moral standards. For example, the soldiers of the Bundeswehr do not swear allegiance to a particular person, but they pledge to defend the values enshrined in our liberal constitution, the Basic Law, promulgated over 40 years ago.

VII

The founders of the Federal Republic of Germany shaped this, the second German democracy, in the light of the experience of German history. They led our country back to the path of liberal traditions, which neither war nor tyranny had been able to destroy.

We can take pride in our liberal constitution, in which we - acknowledge the absolute precedence of human dignity in all areas of life;

- reject war and force as a political tool as well as any revanchism; a decision that was endorsed not least by German expellees in the 1950 Stuttgart Charter;

- are committed to the goal of a free and united Germany in a free and united Europe.

It is a manifestation of deep humanity that the authors of our Basic Law granted the victims of political, religious or racial persecution a claim to asylum. The humanness of a society is demonstrated not only by respect for the freedom and dignity of its own citizens, but also by receptiveness to the victims of force and repression in other countries.

All these decisions paved the way for our society gaining recognition as a peace-loving member of the world community committed to freedom and justice on a scale that surely nobody would have dared dream of in 1945, at the end of the war and the tyranny. It is gratifying to be able to state this today, 40 years after the founding of the Federal Republic of Germany.

We are now witnessing Europe's entry into a new era, and we must be prepared to play a substantial part in shaping it. Europe, indeed the whole of Europe, faces far-reaching change, a radical transformation in the economic and social fields. For the first time since the end of the war, there is the prospect of emerging from the shadow of the East-West conflict.

The developments occurring on our old continent fascinate people worldwide. Which nation could have a greater interest in the advance of freedom that our own? The disintegration of decades-old ossified structures in Europe prompts fresh hope of the unification of our fatherland.

Time is working for, and not against the cause of freedom. Thus on this day of remembrance we also look to the future. Notwithstanding the sorrow that we feel as we recall September 1, 1939, we are aware of our responsibility for coming generations. They will some day judge us by whether we drew the right conclusions from the war and dictatorship and by whether we lived up to the task of ultimately creating a better and more peaceful world.

We envision a future in which the nations of the world are peacefully united in common freedom - and we shall not relax our efforts to make that vision come true. Remembering September 1, 1939, we know that this is the most valuable legacy that we can bequeath to coming generations.

THE SURREALISTIC NATURE OF MINORITYISM

by
Nicholas Carter

Imagine living in an unsafe, unprotected and disorderly world in which reality had absolutely no metaphysical stability...a polylogistic world in which human beings were divided into groups, with each group having its own distinctive method of inference based on its own distinctive logical laws, so that the inferences that were entirely logical for one group were entirely illogical for the others...a bizarre, fantastic, surrealistic world in which there was Jewish logic, Black logic, Latino logic, Oriental logic, and American Indian logic—along with the often denigrated brand of logic that can be described as White.

A serious evaluation of the racial relationships, racial diversities, and racial conflicts presently occupying the American arenas of multi-ethnicity reveals that we are living in that kind of world.

Karl Marx claimed that logic varied with men's economic class, that objections to the deterministic doctrines of Communism could be dismissed as expressions of bourgeois logic, and that vilification of opponenents should replace analysis of their arguments. "Why should freedom of speech and freedom of the press be allowed?" asked Nicholai Lenin, the leading exponent of Marxist-Leninist logic. "Why should a government which is doing what it believes to be right allow itself to be criticized?" To Lenin, the free speech and free press mongers were "enemies" of the great socialist experiment. Polylogism, a subjective device used to "justify" anything anyone wishes, is the "theory of logic" that embraces this kind of thinking.

In the racially mixed nation of America—referred to by some as a "melting pot" and by others as a "salad bowl society"—logic varies with men's racial class. The result: the social disease of minorityism, which is rooted, along with the power of the unwritten law, in polylogism. In their relationships with the non-White and Jewish communities in America, majority members are ruled by the theories of this curiously eclectic brand of logic. The Caucasian must walk a tightrope of caution, never knowing how many phantom laws there really are, always unsure of just how far one may go before stumbling into the no-man's land of bigotry and racism. This peculiar relationship places upon the majority victims of minorityism the burden of discovering how best to please the minorities as well as the burden of being cautious about words and actions that might be construed as being bigoted or discriminatory.

Some movements that have sought to enslave entire nations of people in the past—dictatorships or potential dictatorships—have used a minority group as a scapegoat which it can blame for the nation's troubles and use as a justification of its own demands for special privileges and powers. In America, however, just the opposite is true. The white Gentile majority is the numero uno scapegoat being blamed, not only for the nation's troubles, but for the specific problems of the minorities as well. And not only are non-Whites and Jews involved in this condemnation, many Caucasians agree with, and support, the anti-majority revolution.

In this connection, ponder the experiences of the eminent French playwright, Eugene Ionesco, during several months of lecturing and teaching in the United States. To his amazement and utter dismay, Ionesco discovered that American intellectuals and students are afflicted with an intense case of masochistic self-hatred manifesting itself in the insistence that Americans are humanity's greatest criminals. When he lectured that America was not the worst nation on earth, the liberals looked at him "askance," as he describes it; and they mocked him with "laughter and jeers" when he told them that a Soviet dictatorship was at least as bad as a right-wing military dictatorship.

Because this kind of thinking can be found to one degree or another in every branch of the American Establishment—much of it motivated by a deep-seated belief that American "Racism" is unique in all the world—("fashions may change, but U.S. racism remains")—the flood of misinformation, misrepresentation, distortion and outright falsehood about the minorities is such that young people today have no idea (and virtually no way of discovering any idea) of their actual nature. One result of this barrage of counterfeit logic is the fact that many young Americans perceive any expression of white Gentile racial solidarity as socially and morally wrong.

The law of causality is supposed to prevent people from eating their cake before they have it. But not in a minoritiocracy such as ours in which the minorities are free to commit crimes of violence and organized racism at a rate greatly disproportionate to their numbers, while never having to take collective responsibility for the degree to which they are strangling the nation. Minority logic decrees, in addition, that only select expressions of racial sovereignty are acceptable. Along with that monument to non-integration, the Harlem Globetrotters, there are Black caucuses, Black beauty contests and Black achievement awards. There are many powerful and officious Jewish organizations dedicated to serving only Jewish and Israeli interests. Both Latinos and Orientals are now climbing on similar bandwagons. On college and university campuses, there are Black, Jewish, Hispanic and other minority student groups or unions. All attempts to establish White Student Unions, however, are condemned as divisive and racist. Racially motivated activities on the part of the minorities are encouraged, in other words, while White Americans are not allowed to openly represent their philosophy, their feelings, their sentiments and their values.

In what may be described as a basically free society, all human relationships should be voluntary. Human beings should be free to cooperate or not, to deal with one another or not, as their own individual judgements, convictions, and interests dictate. Within what I call a minoritiocracy, the crucial right of white Gentiles not to deal with the minorities does not exist; and the rights to deal with them on the same basis as they deal with us, to judge them with the same vigor they judge us, to air our complaints about their crimes and failures, and to cleave together as united entities working for special privileges, do not exist.

Within the surrealistic context delineated above, "racist" possibilities are being manufactured in America without evidence or justifications—depending upon minority logic.

In Detroit, angry and unemployed auto workers attacked a Chinese man, believing him to be Japanese. On the national newsfront, the assault was condemned as racist. The worker's hostilities, however, were obviously motivated by economics, rather than by race, per se. Putting the event in perspective, suppose for a moment that the Germans had flooded the country with automobiles that destroyed much of the American market, and led to widespread unemployment. And suppose those same workers had attacked a Scandinavian, believing him to be German. Would cries of racism have reverberated throughout the country? Of course not.

Factor into this same equation the "racial rumble" in the Howard Beach community of Queens, N.Y., the catalyst for a new anti-White flic ("Do the Right Thing") directed by Black film-maker, Spike Lee. Black criminals had been raiding the community of Howard's Beach for some time. The "rumble" occurred when Whites attacked Blacks in the area after assuming that they were muggers or thieves. One Black was struck by a car and killed as he tried to flee. As usual, cries of racism swept the land.

Once again, suppose that the criminals had been White—leather-clad bikers, or neo-Nazi skinheads—and suppose that a couple of individuals who resembled the members of the criminal group had been attacked. Would White racism have been blamed? Of course not. The Howard's Beach eruption of White anger was motivated by crime, not race. According to minority logic, however, the factors underlying any confrontation between Whites and non-Whites in our fantasia-like, multi-ethnic world, must always be rooted in racism.

Also leveled at Caucasians in our curiously coiled world are complaints about White indifference to minority concerns and problems. "Look at all the uproar over one White investment analyst being mugged in Central Park in New York City," objected a correspondent to the L.A. Herald Examiner, the implication being that if the victim had been Black, a different tune would have been played. In this same vein, director Spike Lee cited the rape and murder of a Black woman four days later in Central Park that received virtually no media attention. Logically—although White logic isn't considered valid in the aftermath of events such as these—the more bizarre and horrifying the event, the more attention it will attract, tragic as that may be.

Conveniently ignored during this exercise in self-righteousness was the Tawana Brawley case—an equally horrifying and bizarre story that received intermittent and nationwide media attention for weeks. The coverage died a natural death when absolutely nothing could be found by the many investigators on the case that would corroborate Brawley's story. Not that that fact was able to penetrate the logic of the Black community. "The real truth of that case has not come out," commented Spike Lee, who then claimed that he couldn't believe that a 14-year-old girl would smear herself with feces, and throw herself in a ditch. Lee isn't alone in the holding of that opinion. The declaration, TAWANA TOLD THE TRUTH, is scrawled on the walls of her neighborhood.

What bothers Spike Lee is, as he describes it, "the devaluation of Black life"—meaning that Blacks don't seem to count for much in this society. But how can this value judgement be rationally measured when we see so much blatant irresponsibility in the Black community itself?...when we see so many Blacks involved in the devaluation of Black life? Blacks don't seem to count for much among Blacks. Ergo, criticism should begin first with their actions and their indifference. Regarding horrifying events, commonality invariably leads to blasé or indifferent attitudes. Blaming that indifference on White racism, however, is just one more symptom of the illogical status of racial relations in the United States.

On a recent news story dealing with the complaints of Black performers about hiring practices in Hollywood, Spike Lee cynically stated that the White moguls of Hollywood, while "probably" calling him "nigger" behind his back (this is a prime example of how vilification is used to replace analysis of White points of view), do fund his movies, but only because they make money. Really? Spielberg and Lucas are funded only because they are White, I suppose, and not because their films make money. On the same program, a young Black actress charged that she wasn't working because she wasn't a "blue-eyed blonde." Really? Since acting is one of the most over-crowded professions in the country, there are tens of thousands of talented White performers, including blue-eyed blondes, who can't get jobs in Hollywood. And doesn't the fact that the motion picture audience in America is overwhelmingly White have something to do with the films that are made and the casts that are chosen? Well...not according to the minorities, who seem to think that "opportunities" are "rights" that should spring forth like the goddess Athena from the head of Zeus, fully formed and perfected, just for them.

For decades, social scientists and socialistic educators have been teaching and preaching that the inner image of men they call "race" should be abandoned. Every scientific scrutiny, they have declared again and again, had shown no difference of any meaningful sort amongst our species. Different colors could not be construed as being definitions of otherness but only of skin pigment and slight variations in contour. And behavior was no more than the working of a conditioned reflex. Man was born completely blank and all he learned and knew and came to believe after birth, was merely the result of conditioning. The venerated conclusion: We are of one kind, and anthropology, psychology and biological investigation make that evident. Within the purview of behavioristic logic, then, all that was needed for the achievement of racial harmony was an egalitarian environ. People would then begin to think correctly and integrate willingly. (Seldom have people looked longer within their heads and found less than the high priests of behaviorism.)

Behavioristic commandments to the contrary notwithstanding, true racial integration is nowhere to be found, not only among races who appear to be distinctly different (Whites vs. Blacks), but also among races who appear to be distinctly alike (Arabs vs. Jews). In America, the most racially obsessed country on earth, the racial/cultural differences that separate the minorities from the majority are so great, non-Whites and Jews could very well have evolved on different planets. There is a logical explanation for this dilemma–albeit not the kind of logic that's acceptable to the liberal-minority coalition:

> From the instant of conception, different races of people are not equal, similar, or anything of the sort.

"All men," Carl Jung said, "live by a myth." Tragically, the "myth" that best fits the reality of American minority members is one that enables them to deny their cultural reality—the myth they use to reinforce their faith in themselves via the claim that their significant social, economic and moral failures, are the result of prejudice and discrimination. All such seizure and rigging of logic bolsters the selective thinking of non-Whites and Jews and sustains the tyranny of their hierarchies.

There is no way to legislate equality; there are no standards by which respect can be regulated and fairly distributed among all members of a society. Compassion, understanding, respect, should be offered to non-Whites and Jews in response to their virtues, not in response to their flaws, weaknesses or moral failures—and not in response to their needs as such. There are only two sources that provide information about the character of the people around us: We judge them by what they say and by what they do. In America, however, the minorities are judged primarily by what they say. Hence, they are perceived throughout the country, not as individuals, but as tribes of "oppressed" peoples who deserve special treatment—unique entities superior to the sum of their individual members.

Rights in our surrealistic world become a matter of number, therefore, with the concepts of individual rights and wrongs no longer having the same values. Respect for the minority tribes becomes a moral duty and a primary virtue because they have suffered from discrimination. Majority members become sacrificial victims; minority members become moral cannibals. When people must compromise on basic principles, moral issues and matters of knowledge, or truth, or rational conviction because of feelings of guilt on the one hand, and intimidation on the other, that compromise will always lead to general frustration rather than to general fulfillment. A society that tolerates intimidation and appeasement as the means of settling racial differences has lost its moral base. And it's axiomatic that no social system can exist without sustaining a moral base over a long period of time.

The bottom line? How on earth can White Americans live and work together justly, benevolently and safely with people who consider themselves to be victims of White society; who cleave together racially for the purpose of gaining special privileges; who believe that racism is a one-way street inhabited only by White Gentiles; who insist that their inter-racial methodology never be revealed or openly discussed; and who commit crimes of violence, fraud and cultural nihilism at enormously disproportionate rates to their numbers?

Finally, to assume that criticism of minority excesses is indicative of hatred for the minorities is a case of facts underdetermining theory. The main cause of whatever anti-minorityism exists in the United States is rooted in the hidebound beliefs of minority leaders, who, along with their many followers, have become more and more short-sighted, dogmatic, inflexible and arrogant. What they need are some lessons in restraint; and they would do well to start with the words of the ex-slave and educator, Booker T. Washington. Before an audience of Black and White Southerners in 1895, he stated: "The wisest among my race understand that the agitation of questions of social equality is the extremest folly, and that progress in the enjoyment of all privileges that will come to us must be the result of severe and constant struggle rather than of artificial forcing." □

THE LATE GREAT BOOK:THE BIBLE.

AN ACCOUNT OF CHRISTIAN AND BIBLICAL ORIGINS.

Nicholas Carter feels that it is time for us to sit down and do what many Christians rarely do: Study the Holy Bible. In doing so, we may discover whether or not the Bible is indeed "Holy" and the "Word of God." In strict biblical order, the author methodically, and scathingly, examines the various claims made in the "Holy Book" and shows how many of them bear no relationship to reality whatsoever. DOES THE WEST HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 – except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. recognized a threat in the great technological superiority of Germany.[3] This was reënforced by the divergence between conceptions of scholarship.[4] But it seemed unlikely that those attitudes, con-on the German, which supported a national opera, national art gallery, and the like. As a measure of self-preservation, they excluded Jews, stringently controlled immigration, and herded the niggers into a large reservation, probably policed by Indians, who were thus made useful. The United States annexed not only Samoa, but also the Hawaiian islands and Cuba. (Remember that Chambers was writing before the annexation of the islands and the American attack on Spain, both of which took place in 1898.) Germany, however, was demoralized by her defeat and, with the other nations of the Continent, was undermined and destroyed by subversive agitation, to the profit of Russia. Remember that Chambers was not trying to be prophetic; he was concerned only with sketching a plausible and convincing background for the characters of his story.

3. The effect of heavy industry was regarded as dehumanizing, not without justification. This attitude is well represented by the great Italian historian, Guglielmo Ferrero, who had been a guest of honor in the White House under an intellectually alert President. His view that true culture was the work of the Mediterranean, rather than the Nordic, race, and that technological progress is equivalent to cultural decadence, was expressed in articles published early in this century and summarized in Le Génie latin (Paris, 1917). This view commended itself to many cultivated Anglo-Saxons who failed to see that the power given by technology is irresistible, and that instead of futilely decrying and deploring its advance, they should strive to control it. A crude and vulgar expression of the same view may be found in some of the novels by Jules Verne, which are really stories for boys. In several tales he imagined a secret installation of the great steel industry of Germany in some isolated region (once in California!), where huge cannons and other weapons of war were secretly fabricated by enslaved workers for conquest of the whole world when Der Tag came.

4. Although now generally overlooked, this was an important factor during the Nineteenth Century. In the humane studies, Anglo-Saxons resented and disparaged the German cult of Realwissenschaft, inaugurated by Friedrich August Wolfe, and a university system that led to the degree of Ph.D. This was early expressed by the derisive rhyme:

> In Greek the Germans are sadly to seek,
> Not five in five score, but ninety-five more:
> All Germans but Hermann—
> And Hermann's a German.

This was exasperated when the Germans began to publish great compilations of learning in German instead of Latin, thus making it necessary to learn their damned language. (You may recall an echo of this in George Eliot's Middlemarch.)

fined to a part of the educated minority, could have greatly influenced the bulk of the population.

In the end, Mr. Rathke and I had to dismiss the problem as insoluble, and agree that we could think of no plausible explanation of the German-Americans' fatuous acquiescence and even participation in a mad hysteria excited by propaganda they must have known to be mendacious and absurd.

I remembered those conversations at the end of the 1930s when our great War Criminal began, with sickening hypocrisy, to drive his American cattle to an attack on Germany, and, except for the few members of the Bund, the large Germanic part of our population slavishly acquiesced.

I remembered them again when Hans Schmidt began his effort to form a political organization from the "52 million persons of German descent" in the United States.[5]

And I remember Mr. Rathke again now, when, in Professor Martin's new book I find the first clear formulation of the problem. In his Note 1 he remarks that "the part played by Americans of partial or full German descent in bringing about the defeat of their ancestral country twice in global wars in the 20th century, primarily for the benefit of third, fourth, and fifth parties, was not only vast and unprecedented, but unmatched by any other people, and the performance in the war of 1939-1945 was far more lethal and destructive than in that of 1914-1918. Though the U.S.A.'s largest continental European ethnic strain, German-Americans participated in it all with the casualness of a housewife pouring hot water on an ant-hill, and the involvement of very many men with German forebears in the American armed forces in positions of high rank has been a subject of wide notice over the years. Taken in the context of a racial and/or ethnic rather than a national or patriotic fact, it is worth a modicum of pondering. It will be granted that most of the people involved were one to three generations removed from Germany physically and culturally as well as psychically, but in the case of people of British or French ancestry in America, for example, separation from their motherlands by even one or two centuries has had little effect upon the intensity of their affections for their ethnic origination point."

5. I wish Mr. Schmidt every success, but I cannot but wonder how many of the fifty-two million are more than vestigially German. The Germans who came to this country were generally prolific and had numerous children, but what proportion of their children and grandchildren married persons of the same origin?

Professor Martin has posed the question clearly. The answer that seems obvious at first sight is the one we cannot make, for the Germans in 1939-1945 gave proof of a heroism and courage unsurpassed in all history and unmatched in modern times. They were also the only nation that had a rational perception of the realities of the modern world and the exigencies they impose—the only nation that dared to perceive and confront the deadly danger that impended over all civilized mankind—the only nation on whom there does not now rest the inexpiable guilt of the Suicide of the West.

So what is the explanation?

PREDICTING THE PAST

The Covenant Message, one of the few Christian publications that I am willing to credit with honesty, devotes the leading article in its issue for November 1988 to prophecies in which Christians seem able and eager to believe.[1]

The article, written by the editor, begins with the hariolations attributed to a certain Isaiah (also known as Hesaias) and tells us that a certain passage in that farrago (65.21-22) "provides us with assurance [his emphasis] of a new world order coming," which will be one "in which total security—justice and righteous judgement—will be the order of the day and all people living [sic] with an environment dominated by peace."

The writer oddly forgot the passages in Isaiah (49.23 and 60.11) which presumably give us equal assurance that old Yahweh is going to smash the goyim and enslave those whom he does not exterminate, so that Aryan kings and queens will "bow down to thee [Israeli] with their face toward the earth and lick up the dust of thy feet," and the gates of Jerusalem will have to remain open day and night while all the wealth of the goyim is hauled into the city as Jewish property.

Having overlooked that discomforting assurance about our future, the editor turns to the famous Mother Shipton, prudently refusing to discuss the question whether she really was a woman born in 1448. He is content with her wonderful prophecy, which, he says, "was originally printed in 1641 and then republished [sic]

1. Their credulity about "Bible prophecy" seems unlimited. Michael McManus, writing in the Muskegon [Michigan] Chronicle, 12 August 1989, listed a number of swindles perpetrated by appealing to the infinite gullibility of True Believers. One of these extracted several million dollars from six hundred nitwits by proposing to drill oil and gas wells in Palestine in locations infallibly indicated by prophecies in the Jew-Book.

by Charles Hindley in 1862." He quotes Mother Shipton as having prophesied, "The world then to an end shall come, in nineteen hundred and ninety-one."

The writer, exalted by that dramatic prospect, assures us that "if one reads the whole of this prophecy—again bearing in mind the time factor—Mother Shipton's picture of 'A carriage without a horse shall go'; 'Around the world men's thoughts shall fly'; 'Beneath the water men shall walk, shall ride, shall sleep, and even talk'; 'In water iron then shall float as easy as a wooden boat'—all this, even to sceptics, should be food for thought."

The editor, Mr. W. G. Finlay, whom I met when he was visiting the United States, is an able and amiable man. I write this note with a certain regret. I am sorry for him, but he should have known better than to trust a Christian.

The facts are, succinctly, these:

It is quite possible that a woman named Shipton did live in the Fifteenth Century and was a witch, whose occult powers, according to tradition, were guaranteed by the extraordinary variety of the colors of the extraordinary number of pimples on her extraordinarily long nose. Folk tradition probably did credit her with prophetic utterances. Some of these may have been collected by the author of the first documentary record of her predictions, if he took the trouble to do so.

In 1641 appeared a booklet, published in London by Richard Lowndes, entitled The Propheceyes of Mother Shipton...Foretelling the Death of Cardinall Wolsey, the Lord Percy, and others, as also what should happen in insuing times.

The anonymous author is plausibly supposed to have been William Lilly (Merlinus Anglicus), an astrologer who produced predictions to encourage opposition to Charles I in the Long Parliament. His professions of faith in his own intricate system of astrology sound sincere, but he is known to have relied on the services of a large number of informants, amateur spies, in England and on the Continent, and an historian whose name I do not at the moment recall was justified in saying that Lilly attained distinction, not as an astrologer, but as a detective. He was just the man to manufacture the booklet as a hoax in 1641. The predictions attributed to Mother Shipton in the title would have been remarkable, if made in the Fifteenth Century, but since Wolsey died in 1530 and Lord Percy was executed in 1572, it was easy for a writer in 1641 to "predict" their deaths.

There are only three kinds of prophecy that pretend to supernatural authority: (1) predictions that are so vague and general that at any time credulous persons can imagine they refer to contemporary events; (2) prophecies which are devised as propaganda to awe superstitious persons and thus determine their conduct, and which, if they produce the desired result, will be remembered as marvels, and if unsuccessful, will be quickly forgotten; and (3) predictions of specific historical events (e.g., the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem, supposedly foretold by the Jesus of the "New Testament"[2]) which are recorded after the "prophecy" has been fulfilled—mere vaticinationes ex eventu, in other words, hoaxes.

According to the British clergyman and scholar, Mynors Bright, the booklet of 1641 concluded with the following passage, of which he obviously modernized the spelling:

> A ship [shall] come sailing up the Thames to London, and the master of the ship shall weep, and the mariners shall ask him why he weepeth, being he hath made so good a voyage, and he shall say, "Ah, what a goodly city this was, none in the world comparable to it, and now there is scarcely left any house that can let us have drink for our money."

The cause of the lachrimatory shortage of eau de vie is not stated, but it was not evident to the simple sailors standing beside the captain. I am inclined off hand to think of the excise tax on distilled liquor, which, if I remember correctly, was proposed as early as the date of the booklet, although not enacted until two or three years later; it was increased by Cromwell to a figure obviously intended to curtail the use of spirits, but excited so much indignation that the excise was soon reduced by 75%. Your guess is as good as mine.

2. I use this example because the "prophecy" was obviously such a hoax when it was included in a gospel composed long after the event to credit this Jesus with miraculous powers, but it may have had its origin in a tradition about Jesus ben Ananias, a Jew who for seven years and five months went about incessantly predicting "Woe to Jerusalem" before he was silenced by a stone from a ballista during the Roman siege of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. He was evidently a monomaniac. The Jews, in the years before their revolt, disturbed by his predictions of disaster, beat and scourged him, and sought from the Roman governor, Albinus, permission to crucify him for sacrilege, but Albinus rationally refused, dismissing him as a harmless lunatic. Jesus ben Ananias may have been remembered after his death in folk tales and have thus contributed to the legend about his homonym, Jesus ben Yahweh. The legend almost certainly incorporated traditions about a half-dozen other Jesuses, who flourished in the century before and the century after A.D. 1 and used religious agitation to captivate the rabble or to incite insurrections.

In 1666, Prince Rupert ("of the Rhine"), according to Pepys, took the passage to refer to the Great Fire of London and "said that now Shipton's prophecy was out." That interpretation naturally delighted lovers of thaumaturgy, who, like the Prince, did not stop to think that if the ruins of the large part of London destroyed by the fire had been visible from the ship, the sailors would not have been puzzled by their captain's lament.

In 1862, Charles J. Hindley, an American who had set himself up in London as a bookseller and small-time publisher, was inspired to make money by the infallible means of vending sucker-bait. He republished the pamphlet of 1641, but took care to revise it with sensational additions, which, indeed, did make his book sell like the proverbial hot cakes on a cold day.

His cleverest addition was a prophecy by Mother Shipton of what had already happened in 1862. I quote his doggerel, adding within parentheses numbers that are keys to subjoined elucidations:

Carriages without horses shall good,
And accidents fill the world with woe.(1)
Around the world thoughts shall fly
In the twinkling of an eye.(2)
The world upside down shall be
And gold be found at the root of a tree.(3)
Through hills man shall ride
And no horse be at his side.(4)
Under water man shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk.(5)
In the air man shall be seen
In white, in black, in green.(6)
Iron in the water shall float
As easily as a wooden boat.(7)
Gold shall be found and shown
In a land that's now not known.(8)
Fire and water shall wonders do.(9)
England shall admit a foe.(10)
The world to an end shall come
In eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

These amazing predictions of what had already happened naturally set all the boobs in England agog, and although Hindley, having profited richly and perhaps troubled in his conscience by the excitement he had caused, publicly confessed in 1871 that he had perpetrated the hoax, many Christians, inspired by Tertullian's "Credo quia absurdum," had an insatiable appetite for mantic marvels, and refused to believe him: in 1881 half of the simpletons in England were awaiting the big show.

Please note the last line of Hindley's hoax. One would suppose that after 1881 it would evoke only a laugh, but Lying for the Lord is perhaps the oldest exercise of Christian piety, as forgery is the oldest device for propagating gospels, so the old hoax is now peddled with the date of the catastrophe changed from 1881 to 1991.

Mr. Finlay is not the author of this up-to-date hoax. I distinctly remember having seen the altered date, 1991, used by some hustling salvation-huckster four or more years ago. Mr. Finlay evidently relied on his reverend colleague, and so finds himself peddling a transparent fraud. I am sorry for him, but, as I said, he should have known better than to trust a holy man.

1. After the first commercially successful railway began operation in 1825, railways spread rapidly over England, the United States, and all western countries. There were, of course, many wrecks.

2. The telegraph dates from 1837; the first cable between England and the United States was laid in 1857-1858.

3. Probably a reference to some treasure trove.

4. Railways necessarily resorted to deep cuttings and tunnels to keep their tracks reasonably level.

THE ANTI-HUMANS

by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb. $7.00) describes what was done to the young men whom Corneliu Z. Codreanu, the founder of the Legionary Movement in Romania, inspired, when, seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented Pavlovian 'experiment' on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti-Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. Reading it will be an emotional experience you will not forget. ("A sequel to Orwell's 1984"—R.S.H. "A searing exposé of Red bestiality!"—Dr. A.J. Appp). Order #01013. SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

TURRET OF THE TIMES

I do not apologize for the amount of space that I devote in these pages to Christianity. It is one of the cardinal facts with which we must deal, as crucial as such menaces as the Federal Reserve or the current antics of our rulers in the District of Corruption.

A very large part of the American population professes a belief in some variety of Christianity, and the great majority of professed infidels have minds that are dominated by a residue of the superstition they imagine they have rejected.

A friend of mine who attends a salvation-shop because it offers him one of his few opportunities to exercise his excellent baritone, tells me that last Sunday the dervish emphatically assured his congregation that Christian luff requires welcoming into the United States not only all "political refugees" (i.e., all talking anthropoids that say that is what they are), but also all "economical refugees," by which he meant all of the world's anthropoid vermin that want to become parasites on stupid Aryans and be supported by their labors.

One cannot tell, of course, what part of the audience was listening to the holy rant rather than meditating on what they would have for dinner or the hazards of the course on which they would play golf in the afternoon, but the harangue must have penetrated the consiousness of many, and, according to my friend, not one of the sheep protested the subversive proposal further to enslave them and exterminate their children, either at the time or in conversation after they emerged from the sacred precincts. And the same poison must have been dispensed to millions of other mutton-heads in many thousands of other churches that very morning and on every Sunday of the year.

That is a fact with which we must deal if we hope to arouse a sense of self-preservation in the members of our self-doomed race. What happens in religion is really more important to us than what happens in economics. That is why I now write to recommend a very valuable reference work.

I have often cited Christian News as the best single source of information concerning events and tendencies in all religious cults in the United States. I have also commended its editor for qualities that are extremely rare in religious, as well as secular, journalism today: honesty and courage. He reproduces the news accurately, by photographic reprinting wherever feasible, and undistorted by editorial comment, which is sometimes subjoined as a clearly separate item.

The honesty is evinced, inter alia, by the publication of news that the high-powered promoters and sales managers of his denomination want suppressed as bad for business. The courage, inter alia, by the Reverend Mr. Herman Otten's address at the last convention of the Institute for Historical Review, in which he forthrightly denounced the Jews' great Holohoax, thus bringing on himself the specially intense hatred of the world's venomous parasites.

We must recognize in the editor another virtue that it is easy to overlook. His premises are the authentic Lutheran variety of a religion which we regard as illusory and, in its effect on our race, ultimately pernicious, but he states those premises clearly and without ambiguity, and he adheres to them consistently. He is an antithesis to self-styled "Liberals" in both religion and secular affairs.

The American Atheists' Insider's Newsletter, July 1988, devoted its first dozen pages to the pests who call themselves "Liberal intellectuals," and quoted Mrs. Madelyn O'Hair as saying: "Give me a fascist any day as an opponent. He states his principles and stands on them. I know whence he comes and why. I can meet him in opposition because I understand what he represents. The liberals are based in quicksand; there is no way—ever—to rely on what they say or understand their intentions." Its editor goes on to remark, "A liberal is a glad-hander,. . . glossing over with talk the enormous problems of our time." That is essentially true, for the "Liberal's" purpose is to make whatever spiel will enlist the support of the unthinking for whatever project he is promoting for reasons he instinctively conceals.

It is always a great relief to deal with men who mean what they say and say what they mean. Would that the opportunity to do so were not so rare!

Christian News is a tabloid of twenty-four or more densely printed pages, published weekly, except for a short intermission in August. The issues accumulate rapidly and strain the resources of any reader who does not have adequate secretarial assistance for systematic indexing and filing. The editor, however, has reprinted in thick tabloid-size volumes the articles which he regards as most important; they are arranged alphabetically by subject, and there are good indices of both subjects and persons. Volumes I and II of the Christian News Encyclopaedia cover 1973-1983 and contain, in addition to some supplemental material, pages 1-1773. Volumes III and IV, containing pages 1774-3242, cover 1984-1988. The work is published in both cloth-bound and paperback editions.[1] Despite the large pages and thickness of the volumes, I find the latter satisfactory.

The value of this work of reference extends beyond its scope. Let me give one example.

In the issues for 25 July and 1 August 1988, the Reverend Mr. Otten reproduced photographically 177 pages from the Soncino translation of the Babylonian Talmud. His purpose was to illustrate the Kikes' inveterate, frenzied, and unappeasable hatred of "Christians," as their frantically contumelious terms are commonly translated. (Writing at a time when the peoples of Europe had accepted the export brand of the Yahweh-cult, a reference to Christians was equivalent to 'Aryans,' and they may not have known a precise term for our race, which they hate above all others and intend to exterminate.) These reproductions are included in the Encyclopaedia's section on the Talmud, Vol. IV, pp. 3102-3129.

Recently some ostensibly anti-Jewish trouble-makers, either enemy agents or pipsqueaks trying to make a loud noise, have taken to saying they have done lots o' research and found that what Professor Arthur R. Butz's reports on pp. 246-247 of his masterly and epochal work, The Hoax of the Twentieth Century,[2] about earlier holohoaxes just ain't so, whence it follows that nothing Professor Butz says can be believed.

On the pages in question, Professor Butz remarked that when the Sheenies devised their earlier holohoaxes, they lied with less restraint than when they finally settled on six million as the number of God's masterpieces that the wicked Nazis gassed or in-cinerated or parboiled or vaporized. The figures they shamelessly gave in earlier fictions were patently incredible and flatly impossible. One example referred to the end of the Jewish revolt that began in A.D. 132 when a christ who called himself Bar-Kokhba ("Son of the Star"),[3] persuaded his ferocious fellow tribesmen that old Yahweh said the time had come to help him butcher the civilized Greeks and Romans. The Yids were able to catch the hated Aryans off guard and gleefully torture many of them to death, but soon the Roman legions moved in and old Yahweh skedaddled in a hurry, leaving his pets in the lurch.

The bloody barbarians made their last stand in the small hilltop town of Bethar, which had an inhabited area equivalent to five or six city blocks today. The Romans took the fortified town, of course, but they probably mistakenly followed their custom of sparing non-combatants. The number of fleeing Jewish partisans who took refuge in the town cannot have exceeded ten or twenty thousand, and the survivors were certainly killed in reprisal for the treacherous murder of so many civilized men and women. Professor Butz reports the number of slain given by the Jews in one of their usual efforts to jerk tears over slaughter of pure-hearted and godly innocents by hard-hearted Aryans. The figures are utterly absurd and they are probably what excited the malversational itch of the trouble-makers.

Now, as a matter of fact, Professor Butz's source was the holy and unerring Talmud itself, and in his summaries of what it says, he was not only impeccably accurate but always careful to cite the lower of the unbelievable figures given in it, when there were variants.[4]

Now Christian News did not reprint all of the passages that were Dr. Butz's source, but it did include obiter parts of two of them. In one of these (No. 37 in the series of reproductions), we are told that when the wicked Romans took Bethar, they wantonly slew 400,000 x 10,000 (= four billion) sweet Sheenies. That figure could have been excogitated only by a kind of insanity that seems

3. His real name, as was discovered since Professor Butz wrote, was Shimeon bar Kosiba.

4. When citing the distance that the great flood of holy blood flowed from Bethar to the sea, Professor Butz gives the reading "four miles," and does not even mention the variant, "forty miles," which is certainly correct, because that is the approximate distance from Bethar to the Mediterranean.

innate in the race,[5] and one can see why pipsqueaks with cerebral oedema would think it a vulnerable point when they wanted to claim they had done "research." The same passage gives a variant, also duly reported by Professor Butz: the horrid Romans killed only forty million (4000 x 10,000) of Yahweh's darlings in little Bethar.

The lower figure, 40,000,000, is significant, for with it we come to the recent Holohoax. When the Yids concocted it as a device to paralyse the minds of gullible Aryans with fictitious guilt, they first thought of 40,000,000 as a good figure, but, having some qualms that the credulity of Aryans might not be quite infinite, they reduced it to 25,000,000, as in the famous "confessions" extorted from Gerstein'[6] and then prudently decreased it to 12,000,000, before finally settling on 6,000,000 as the largest figure the boobs would accept without question. This figure is again habitual in Jewish bunkum. In the early years of this century Americans were assured that six million sweet Sheenies were suffering persecution in Russia (where the Czarist government was unable to restrain peasants from occasionally turning on their parasites).[7]

Another specimen of Hebrew mathematics, also cited by Professor Butz, is found in No. 39, where we are assured that within Bethar's inhabited area, about equal to five or six of our city blocks, there were 400 x 400 x 400 (= sixty-four million) schoolchildren, and that the cruel Aryans heartlessly slew all of those darling little Yiddish moppets.

These figures guarantee the accuracy of the others cited by Professor Butz, so that a simple reference to the Christian News

5. Jews perpetually whine about persecution to befuddle their intended victims, but when they try to give details, they let their morbid imaginations run riot. For example, when the Babylonian king, Nabu-kudur-usur took Jerusalem in 597 B.C., he probably did execute the leaders of the faction that had betrayed the territory to the invading Egyptians, but he left the local government in the hands of Jews who had not compromised themselves with the invaders. But we are assured in the Talmud that, as certified by the testimony of an eyewitness (who was doubtless like the "eyewitnesses" in the most recent Holohoax), the captain of the Babylonian guard, presumably all by himself, slew 2,110,000 sacred Sheenies, and slew 40,000 of them on just one stone. Stout fellow! Think what such an athlete could do in the Olympics today!

6. Cf. Butz, op. cit., pp. 251-258.

7. On the wildly exaggerated 'pogroms,' see the article, "Russian Jews and Gentiles," by Mme. Z. Ragosin, a contemporary of the events, in Liberty Bell, June 1985, which is available as a reprint from Liberty Bell Publications, $3.50 + postage.

Encyclopaedia will suffice to expose the impudence of the trouble-makers and show that their vaunted "research" consisted of asking a rabbi—on the charitable assumption they consulted more than their own troublous imaginations.[8]

The insanely exaggerated statistics given in the Talmud were, of course, long known only to Jews, who alone could read the odd dialect of Aramaic in which it is written, and, indeed, the Talmud enjoins that goyim who may learn to read it must be murdered, but it was doubtless intended that the stories should inspire members of the race in their whining to the hated Europeans about the "persecutions" the tribe of swindlers and usurers innocently suffered because they were such innocuous, pure, and godly beings.

Even apart from the biggest of the Jews' Big Lies in our time, every Aryan should know something of the fetid racial mentality that is revealed in the Talmud, and the pages reprinted in Christian News are about all that an Aryan, even one with a strong stomach, can read without nausea.

It is a truism that, as the Japanese say, you cannot understand the world of today without perceiving and measuring the activity of the ubiquitous and omnivorous Jews; and you cannot understand Jews without pondering an adequate and typical sample of their Babylonian Talmud, which reveals their mentality and racial soul. That is the one indisputably authentic key to the operation of minds and instincts that are so utterly alien to Aryans as to seem incredible until proved by irrefragable evidence, the divinely authoritative writings that the predatory race kept secret from its prey as long as it could.

There are several good analyses of the authoritative Talmud, chiefly in German, on which I have commented elsewhere, but they do not have the instant cogency of photographic reproductions of pages from the Jews' own official translation, which omits only a few drastic passages that are found in the early printed editions of the text and cited in the compendium by Joseph Caro, Šulḥan 'Aruk (1564). Even if you are still reluctant to accept the verdict of sagacious Romans, who finally realized that the Jews are the hostes generis humani, you can no longer doubt when you read in their own words proof of the insane megalomania which teaches that only Jews are human beings, while Aryans and all other races are animals, like sheep and pigs, whom Jews are divinely authorized to kill whenever they think it expedient—animals who, by their nature, can own no property, so that whatever is in their possession belongs by right to the first Jew who takes it. And when you have learned that, read on, so long as you can stand the stench.

8. Needless to say, anyone who had a serious intent to verify the facts would have consulted the work of the Jewish archaeologist who excavated the ruins of Bethar, Yigael Yadin, Bar-Kokhba (London, Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1971), in which he would have found most of the passages that were Professor Butz's source quoted on pp. 256-257. But it is so much easier to take an ego-trip by simply blatting about fictitious "research."

UNKINDLY CUTS

Two correspondents have sent interesting pendants to my note in the October issue about the sexual mutilations by which many tribes of savages and barbarians, including Jews, try to placate their foul deities.

A lady writes that when her son was born, some thirty-five years ago, the attending physician was going to circumcise the babe, but the father, a learned man whom I have cited more than once in these pages, forbade the obscene rite by which his son would be "Judaized." The physician's argument for the operation (and his fee) was comparatively honest. He did not resort to spurious claims of physical benefits. Instead, he pointed out that when the boy attended public schools, he would be embarrassed when the other boys in the shower room saw that his sexual organs were intact.

It is a legitimate inference that in the second half of this century, the Jews' great campaign, carried on with the help of venal physicians, to have American children pay the tribute of foreskins demanded by their ferocious god, so that Yids disguised as White men would not be immediately unmasked when unclothed, had attained such success that few American boys had not been made to resemble Sheenies.

It appears, therefore, that American parents are more gullible than Europeans, for I am informed, that despite the efforts of some physicians, few European males have been mutilated. A friend has obtained a partial confirmation of this datum by consulting a small collection of the "nudist" periodicals published in Sweden, Denmark, and Germany in the 1960s. The photographers naturally concentrated on the attractive half of our race, but males of all ages appear in a small proportion of the pictures. I am told that none of the males, from very young children to old men, had paid tribute to Yahweh.

A middle-aged man writes that he recently went to a highly reputed clinic for treatment of a minor malady. A physician employed by the clinic gave him a routine physicial examination and was horrified to discover that the man had not been mutilated. He urged immediate circumcision, which was, of course, rejected, and, arguing for the operation, he handled the organ with such sadistic savagery that he produced a bleeding contusion which required six days to heal.

The physician appeared to be a white man of Mediterranean stock, and, incidentally, claimed to be on intimate terms with Jesus. It was not determined whether he was a disguised Sheeny, a pervert, or simply in need of cash.

There has been much speculation about the origin of the rite among the most primitive forms of human life; for some, see the periodical cited in October. It should be noted that it is practiced by tribes of Australoids, the lowest form of human life, so stupid that they infested the southernmost continent for fifty thousand years without ever suspecting that there might be a connection between sexual intercourse and pregnancy.

The notion that the sexual mutilation of males was hygienic and salubrious comes from the Jews' great apologist, Philo Judaeus, who naturally tried to explain away a custom that the Aryan Greeks and Romans naturally regarded as barbaric and obscene. He discusses it most fully in his tractate In Genesin, III, 46-53; cf. De special. legibus, I, 1-12 (= pp. 210-213 in Cohn's edition).[1] He, of course, makes lavish use of his allegorical theology and such arguments as that circumcision was practiced by the Egyptians, "the most philosophical [!] of nations," before it was adopted by the Jews, and that circumcised men beget more children than the uncircumcised and so help the tribe expand and become populous and powerful, but it is to be noted that when he comes to specific physiological and medical considerations, there is no question of general hygiene.

1. I should, perhaps, remark that when one cites works written in Greek, it is customary, for the convenience of printers and general readers, to refer to them by the titles as translated into Latin by the Humanists and later scholars. Philo wrote in Greek, and since he had made a special study of Greek philosophers, especially the Stoics, for the purposes of his apologetics, his Greek is far above the low level of the "New Testament." I am inclined to believe that his Greek evinces a command of the language that no other Jew ever attained. (Josephus, for example, was an educated Jew and can be read much more easily, because what he writes is almost entirely narrative; he would have been incapable of Philo's often subtle stylistic skill in manipulating abstractions.)

Philo explicitly states that circumcision is necessary and prevalent only in tropical and desert countries, where it prevents, or facilitates treatment of, an almost incurable venereal disease, anthrax, a species of carbuncle or malignant pustule produced by bacteria that lodge and flourish beneath a foreskin. (It is said to be extremely painful and to be capable of spreading to other organs and causing death, but I have not consulted an expert in tropical medicine.) The infection was evidently communicated by sexual contact, and we must assume that females were immune. Philo relates the disease to climate, observing that even in the tropics it never occurs in the winter, but becomes epidemic in the hot summers.

One should consult honest specialists in tropical pathology, but it seems to me that, given the almost total lack of sanitation common to natives of tropical and desert countries, and the abhorrence of bathing and all ablution with water felt by many savages and barbarians (including orthodox Jews, especially Hasidim), Philo's explanation is reasonable, and may well be a partial explanation of the prevalence of circumcision in those lands.[2]

There is something more to be learned from Philo, and although he is sometimes mentioned in general terms by writers on circumcision, this fact, so far as I know, has never been mentioned before, although the text has been available to everyone in a Latin translation since 1826. Philo specifically says (In Genesin, III, 48) that in temperate regions of the earth circumcision is unknown because the climate makes it unnecessary. He was thinking, of course, especially of Greece and Rome, but his observation applies to all temperate and cold climates. The learned Jew's recognition of a crucial fact should shame the physicians of our day who profit from perpetrating a Jewish rite that probably damages irreparably the nervous systems of many Aryan children for the convenience of their enemies.

2. If you are interested, you may try to ascertain (I suppose the information is available) whether the Assyrians, who were a Semitic people, and the Babylonians, who included a large Semitic element, had customs of personal cleanliness that protected them from the infection and so made circumcision unnecessary. The explanation by climate is, at best, of only partial validity as perhaps encouraging a practice that originated in a fetid superstition among savages. The climate of India, even north of the Deccan, is oppressively hot, and it is true that Aryans are by instinct a cleanly people, given to ablutions and bathing (except when corrupted by the Christian denunciation of personal cleanliness as sinful), but even so it is significant that, if we may judge by Sanskrit literature and especially the writers on erotics (of whom there are quite a few besides the well-known Kāmasūtra), circumcision was totally unknown, not only among the Aryans and their subjects, but evidently even among the savage tribes (Mleććhas etc.) that were not amenable to civilization and were often regarded as demons.

Philo wrote before his race had a vital interest in making it difficult to identify Jews who disguise themselves as White men to infiltrate and corrupt the society of the hated goyim.

With this we may take our leave of an unpleasant subject by commending again and recommending the excellent work by Nicholas Carter, Routine Circumcision, the Tragic Myth (London, Londinium Press, 1979; available from Liberty Bell Publications, $5.00 + postage).

WHY GERMANS ARE HATED

I recently talked with a Rumanian who had been a young man in 1944 when the Germans, after their catastrophic defeat in Russia, had to retreat from a country they could no longer defend against the Americans' Soviet allies.

In the hurried retreat, there was some inevitable disorganization and some units of the German Army became separated from their commissary. The hungry men dispersed and in small groups went to the homes of the peasants and asked to be fed. The peasants, although they disliked the occupation of their country by foreign troops, prepared food for the Germans, who, after a meal on peasant fare, scrupulously paid for it, and with courteous words of thanks in German went on their way.

Now wasn't that just awful? The Germans, who didn't love Sheenies, obviously had not assimilated Jewish ethics and the Jewish Weltanschauung. Is it any wonder that the democratic Americans help their Jewish government hunt down those dreadful War Criminals? In fact, a nation that behaves like that should be exterminated, shouldn't it? If not exterminated by the method proposed by Kaufman in his once popular Germany Must Perish (1941)[1] then exterminated in some other way, perhaps by miscegenation.

After the Germans retreated, the Americans' Army of Liberation moved in. It is properly called the Americans' army because it was equipped and financed from the United States, which was a great industrial nation at that time. Furthermore, it was in the service of a régime that had been imposed on Russia chiefly by the United States, was then carrying out the plans of the foul and diseased monster that then ruled the United States from its lair in the White House, and was able to invade Rumania only because the United States and its puppets were attacking Germany in a war of total barbarism. It was a relatively unimportant detail that the hordes invading Rumania were almost entirely composed of hybrids of Slavic and Mongol blood with a dose of Tartar thrown in for seasoning.

The Liberators moved through the countryside that was the home of my informant, who somehow managed to survive the Liberation. The invaders took the women out and gang-raped them, forcing the fathers, husbands, and sons to watch the merriment. When tired of intensive rape, they usually shot the women or cut them up a bit and left them to bleed to death, and then machine-gunned the men. Ah, that's more like it! No wonder the Americans are proud of their success in promoting democracy throughout the world.

To be sure, Russian generals and colonels, full of Judaeo-Soviet culture, did not behave as did their men. They selected the best houses in a town, magnanimously gave the owners two hours to get out, and occupied the premises. If they felt a need for amusement and recreation, the most attractive females of the town were dragged in to show their gratitude for the glorious Liberation. When the Russian officers moved on, the owners, if they had not been killed in the meantime, could resume possession of what had been their home, which had been completely stripped of every portable object, including even the doorknobs. The empty shell, however, would protect them from rain, although there was no way to replace the broken windows.

Such were the blessings of Freedom that the Americans bestowed on Rumania. Is it any wonder that they are proud of their achievement and humbly grateful to the Master Race that taught them how to work for One World?

Of course, I do not mean that individual Americans approve of all the work of Liberation. In fact, I am sure that many individuals disapprove of such details as I have mentioned. That may be unfortunate.

None of us can know the plans of our rulers, the Sheenies and the other usurers and swindlers who are their accomplices, and it is even quite likely that they have not drawn up a fixed schedule, but only a general and flexible one that will be continuously adjusted to events. It is known, however, that there has been no abandonment of the goal envisaged by the unspeakable entity called Franklin Roosevelt, which was indiscreetly disclosed by the director of one of the great "Foundations" when the late Norman Dodd was chief counsel of a Senate committee: the eventual amalgamation of the United States with the Soviet.

It is quite likely, therefore, that the United States and the Americans in it will be subjected to occupation by armies from the Soviet, either as conquerors after a war that the Americans will assuredly lose, or as "peace keeping forces" to restore order after the ruined country has collapsed in bankruptcy and anarchy, and the niggers, mestizos, and other parasites whom the Americans so dearly love begin to loot and beat the stupid white animals who can no longer give them all they want. Americans then will have first-hand experience of the Liberation they have so long promoted throughout the world. It is certain, I think, that on that future day the Americans, like the Rumanians in 1944, will not like it. They will probably change their minds about making the world safe for democracy. But it will be too late—terribly and unalterably too late. Perhaps they will find some consolation in quoting an adage from their holy book: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

THE LATEST IN HOLOHOAXING

Major Clerkin of the Euro-American Alliance, in its bulletin for June 1989, reports that he had the fortitude to sit through the latest mass of cinematographic garbage, called "War and Remembrance," which, for five long nights, was thrown in the faces of addicts of boob-tubes by the "American [sic!] Broadcasting Company." According to Major Clerkin, the dreary drivel has been revised to eliminate some of the more patent absurdities that have been pointed out by honest investigators of the Yids' biggest Big Lie, their filthy fiction about a "Holocaust."

For example, there was a complete change in depiction of the way in which the German pesticide, Zyklon B, was used to gas God's Darlings. The new fiction was devised to be less obviously ludicrous. And there was a new exercise of malevolent fantasy to explain why the tons of sacred ashes from incinerated Sheenies disappeared and left no trace. And there were many other revisions of the Big Lie; for the details, see Major Clerkin's bulletin. It appears, therefore, that the race to whom Yahweh gave the universe is coming to suspect that the gullibility of Christianized goyim is not quite infinite.

A real innovation in Holohoaxing is evidently being tried out experimentally before being inflicted on Americans and Europeans. I owe my knowledge of it to Candour, March-April 1989.

Simpletons are now told how the African Plague originated. That wicked man, Adolf Hitler, had his diabolical scientists manufacture a deadly lentivirus, which they called "Virus Q." It destroyed the immune system of individuals and irremediably caused a painful death after a delay that might last for years. And when Hitler was determined to "bring the Americans to their knees" in 1941, he was so evil that he selected Virus Q as the perfect weapon for destroying "sex-crazed degenerates."

A plane was crammed full of the virus and took off for the United States, flying over a circuitous route that passed over Africa.[1] It was unfortunately shot down over Africa and crashed, disseminating its deadly cargo among the noble niggers of that continent. That evil genius, Hitler, was "outraged" by the mishap to his wonderful airplane, and even more outraged the next day, when the laboratory in which Virus Q was manufactured was destroyed in a bombing raid, thus obliterating all traces of the diabolical Germans' work.

This story is verified by the unimpeachable testimony of a former member of the German General Staff, Rudolph Kessler, now an old man of eighty, who suddenly remembered the facts after he was discovered in Brazil by the Yids. Hearing of the growing epidemic of "AIDS" in Africa and its consequences in the United States, penitent old Kessler said, "It seems like Der Führer's dreams may come true after all."

This story is a juicy novelty in Holohoaxing, and if it works, it will undoubtedly be rammed into the minds of American children in the public boob-hatcheries.

No one has ascertained whether Rudolph Kessler really exists, or, if he does, whether he made the statements attributed to him in Kikes' liepapers, or, if he did, whether the poor old man was in a state of senile imbecility and, in the wildly inflated economy of Brazil, eagerly grasped a few cruzeiros as a reward for repeating a lie.

Whatever the truth about Kessler, it is obvious that the creative genius of God's Own has not lost its vigor—or its contemptuous disregard of common sense.

1. There is clearly some slight mistake. No aëroplane manufactured before 1945 could have flown the distance of the planned route without refueling several times. It follows therefore that the Jews' witness must have been wrong about this detail. The virus must have been despatched in a "flying saucer," which crashed in Africa. As everyone now knows, such craft can fly at enormous speeds for years on end without landing for fuel and supplies, and the addicts of the "UFO" fantasies should eagerly accept this new proof of their claims.

THE SWISS REPRIEVED

In March, under the rubric "Avalanche in the Alps," I gave a summary acount of the decay of Switzerland and its people in recent decades. I noted that a Kikess, who had wormed her way into office as the Minister of Justice (!) in the Swiss government, had notified the Swiss Parliament that it was going to enact a law that would make it a criminal offence to express doubts about the Holohoax, biggest of the Big Lies currently used by Yahweh's Yids to paralyse Aryan minds. And I concluded by noting the apprehensions of M. G.-A. Amadruz, who had courageously published the Courrier du Continent for almost a quarter of a century, but now feared that the end had come, "vu la menace d'une loi-muselière."

At about the same time, the admirable little journal in German, Eidgenoss, also foresaw suppression by a lawless government, although its immediate problem was its inability to find in Switzerland a printer brave enough to set up the type and print each monthly issue and thus risk destruction by Jewish terrorists.

The Swiss were saved, for a time at least, by one of those perfect coincidences that are often called providential and thought by many to prove that some daimon has intervened in human affairs.

The rabid Kikess who was Minister of Justice, Elizabeth Kopp, née Ikle, was caught using her office to protect her husband and law partner, a mogul in the heroin business. She was forced to resign, together with her henchman, the Chief State Prosecutor, Rudolf Gerber (race unstated, but guess). And even Newsweek in its report of a supposed "drug crackdown" in Switzerland, 10 April 1989, could not quite conceal the fact that there was some connection between the narcotics business in Switzerland and the C.I.A. in Washington.

Newsweek claimed that stolid Swiss were astonished and alarmed by the fact that Switzerland has one of the highest rates of addiction to heroin in Europe (which implies a similar rate of addiction to cocaine), and that the country is blessed with the highest incidence of the African Plague of any country outside Africa, except the United States. The magazine could have added that Switzerland is also a leader in crimes of violence. What Newsweek did not explain was how the Swiss could be so stupid as to be astonished by what had been the mathematically predictable result at the time that they began, with Christian zeal, to stuff their little country with niggers, wogs, and other anthropoid refuse.

According to Spotlight, 11 June 1989, which oddly did not mention the Kopps' race, the woman had often come to Washington to confer with her cousin, Fred Ikle, then Under Secretary of Defense, whose three aids included Richard Armitage, one of Israel's most devoted stooges in the government that rules the American people. Armitage, who became Assistant Secretary of Defense, was recently nominated for the post of Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia by Bush, who had been the director of the C.I.A. and its covert operations during the Presidency of Ford and doubtless knew thoroughly the clandestine intrigues and suborned revolutionary violence carried out by that agency and financed by the American tax-paying serfs.

The weekly newspaper further reported that a veteran of Special Forces, Lieutenant Colonel James Gritz, had charged that all of the major secret operations of the C.I.A. and the Pentagon were carried out under the supervision of Israel, and that Armitage not only served his Yiddish masters but had close connection with the Asiatic heads of the trade in heroin, cocaine, and their derivatives. These charges could have been ignored in the United States, but, again according to Spotlight, the Swiss investigators found that the funds for the secret operations of "our" Department of Defense and its C.I.A. went through the same hands, especially Kopp's, as the profits of the heroin and cocaine business. The Vice President of Switzerland, Achille Casanova, publicly and pointedly connected the drug business with the C.I.A. and "other secret American authorities."

The newspaper further alleged that the Swiss investigation into the activities of the Kopps had, according to its sources, made our Bushman decide that it would be prudent to withdraw the nomination of his pal, Armitage, before he could be questioned in the Senate.

However that may be, it is obvious that Lizzie Kopp had worries of her own that distracted her from her appointed task of teaching the Jews' Swiss dogs to heel on command, and not to doubt the Master Race's Big Lies. Thus did Fate grant the Swiss a reprieve from the sentence that the Kopp woman and her racial kin intended to force the Swiss government to impose on them.

It appears however to have been only a short-term reprieve. According to G.-A. Amaudruz in the Courrier du Continent, September 1989, Yahweh's Yids, through their poison-pen press, have already begun anew agitation for legislation to chain up Aryan curs who dare to doubt whatever lies they are told by the god-given masters, and who, oh horrors! are such "Neo-Nazis" that they don't want to see Switzerland totally overwhelmed by an avalanche of biological refuse. M. Amaudruz quotes some of the journalists' diseased pus, which, though in French, will be drearily familiar to everyone who reads the jewspapers in this country.

It is amazing and, more than that, appalling that the enactment of the projected law in Switzerland appears to be possible. I have commented before on the strange and relatively sudden decay of the Swiss, whom the world long admired as the one nation in which democracy seemed successful—a virile democracy that made every able-bodied male a member of the Army, with weapons at hand for immediate mobilization. But the result has proved that "democracy," in its modern form, like Christianity, is a disease of the mind and spirit which eventually destroys the immune system of a nation and a race, gradually and slowly but irremediably, much as the African Plague destroys the immune system of the body. Is is therefore significant that the famous Jew, Feuchtwanger, boasted that this democracy is also a Jewish invention: "Es gibt überhaupt nichts Demokratisches, was nicht jüdisch wäre." □

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the rôles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The books goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. For your copy of Which Way Western Man? send $14.50 (which includes $2.50 for postage and handling for the softback edition (Order No. 22003).

DOES THE WEST HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP Of THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980—except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. For your copy (Order No. 03014) send $9.50 (which includes $1.50 for postage and handling) to:

'Holocaust' Revisionism in the Purview of The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith

By
Charles E. Weber

Recently we acquired the Summer 1989 issue of the ADL Research Report. Its cover featured the gate to the Auschwitz concentration camp with its inscription, ARBEIT MACHT FREI, and bore the title Holocaust 'Revisionism' and subtitle Reinventing the Big Lie. The first question that came to my mind about the title was, "Whose big lie?" On the reverse of the cover we are informed: "This publication has been made possible through a grant from the Lawrence Peirez Civil Rights Institute." Irony of ironies! How dare Jewish organizations of this nature talk about civil rights in view of the current events in Palestine and the numerous harassments against revisionists with the aim of denying them their civil rights? One need only think of the unfairly conducted trial of Ernst Zündel in Toronto, the deportation of John Demjanjuk and his farcical trial in Jerusalem, the arson committed against the Institute for Historical Review in 1984, the bombs exploded at the home of a California historian and other outrages against those historians who have been idealistically seeking the truth about various aspects of the Second World War. I was myself the victim of a relatively unimportant—and yet also symptomatic—act of sabotage of my automobile several years ago, with a note left indicating that the crimes, including four punctured tires, had been carried out by a Jewish organization.

Every such act of sabotage and harassment indicates, of course, that historians with the moral character, ability and courage enough to investigate certain questions about the history of the Second World War are bringing out truths which cannot be refuted by the now embarrassed Zionist propagandists.

Every individual and organization attacked in the ADL publication can feel that they have been honored. In fact, they should consider the attacks and unfavorable mentions in the publication to be valuable, favorable publicity in spite of the falsehoods, innuendoes, distortions and insults contained in it.

The organizations mentioned, and in most cases attacked, in the publication include the following:

Americans for Due Process
Australian League of Rights
Christian Defense League
C.O.D.O.H. (=Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust)
Committee for the Reëxamination of the History of the Second World War
GANPAC (=German-American Political Action Committee)

Of the individuals mentioned who are claimed to have engaged in some revisionist activity or another in the ADL Research Report, all of them are intelligent, well educated persons. Over one-third of them have earned doctoral degrees, a fact that must be especially vexing to the Zionist propagandists.

Some idea of the level of the research in the publication can be gleaned just from its simple errors. Even the name of the Wiesenthal Center, of all things, is misspelled on pages 9 and 13. The incorrect date of David McCalden's leaving the Institute for Historical Review is given on page 6. Verschwörung is hacked down to Verschwoer on page 7. The much-touted debate on the "Holocaust" question is supposed to have taken place on 21 February 1989 in Los Angeles (p. 10). Actually, no real debate took place because the men scheduled to have argued for the Zionist (i.e., "Exterminationist") point of view got cold feet and backed out, thus demonstrating once more the validity of the revisionists' position. Not even the name of the Committee for the Reëxamination of the History of the Second World War is given correctly on page 18, nor is its Bulletin mentioned. On page 41 Wilhelm Stäglich's book, The Auschwitz Myth, is given as The Myth of Auschwitz. This confusion even of the title shows that Stäglich's well-reasoned arguments and evidence must be quite unfamiliar to the writers of the Report. Nearly all of the factual information in the Report could have been gleaned from revisionist publications. The publications of the Institute for Historical Review are an especially important source.

A special venom is directed against the prolific British historian of the Second World War, David Irving, whose books are discussed in some detail there. Unfavorable reviews of Irving's works by Alan Bullock (New York Review of Books, 26 May 1977) and John Lukacs (National Review, 19 August 1977) are cited. Much of the attack against David Irving consists of accusations of guilt by association.

We were gratified by the attention paid to "Charles Weber and His 'Committee' " on page 18, where 2/3 of a page is devoted to us.

The writers of the Report sniff out a "racist point of view" in my article on the etymology and semantic development of the word Aryan, originally published in the June 1984 Liberty Bell and subsequently reprinted in the Aryan Nations publication, Calling Our Nation. The writers are also disturbed about a "pamphlet offering advice on 'How to Discuss the Extermination Thesis ("Holocaust") at a Cocktail Party or at a "Holocaust" Seminar sponsored by Zionists.' " The "pamphlet" to which they refer was, in fact, our *Bulletins*14 and 15. My views on the Anti-Defamation League publication, Days of Remembrance: A Department of Defense Guide for Commemorative Observance (reviewed in Bulletin 25) are also mentioned. The claim is made that the Committee for the Reëxamination of the History of the Second World War (title not correctly given) is a "one-person" organization. I shall be delighted to let the ADL persist in this belief.

On page 21 there is gloating over the outcome of the Mermelstein litigation against the Institute for Historical Review. What should be pointed out, however, is the obvious prejudice (if not also ignorance and laziness) of the judge, who took "judicial notice" that Jews were gassed in Auschwitz, thus depriving the defendant of the very essence of his arguments. Another instance of judicial prejudice is cited on page 31, Justice Robert Jackson's determination to "condemn and punish" the defendants at the trials in Nuremberg in 1945-46. The ensuing trials, in fact, were conducted in cynical contradiction of principles of justice established even in ancient times, and were protested by the courageous Senator Robert Taft of Ohio, whose sense of justice was lauded by Robert F. Kennedy in his book, Profiles in Courage (1956).

Special sections are devoted to revisionism in France (pages 28-28) and Germany (pages 29-30). The former describes the activities of Robert Faurisson, Henri Roques and others, while the latter discusses the views of Hellmut Diwald (whose Geschichte der Deutschen I reviewed in the very first issue of the Journal of Historical Review, Spring 1980) and Ernst Nolte. The section on pages 24-25 is devoted to the "Canadian Trials," i.e., those of Ernst Zündel, James Keegstra and the protracted harassment of Malcolm Ross, a New Brunswick school teacher, against whom charges were dropped.

A great worry to the writers of the Report is the possibility that there could be a "Holocaust without Jews" (page 32), that is, that there could be a general recognition of the fact that the suffering during the Second World War was not exclusively that of Jews. This corresponds to the recent acrimonious fight between Jews and Roman Catholic authorities concerning the nuns residing and working on the terrain of the former Auschwitz concentration camp. This section commences with the following statement: "Official Polish, Soviet and East German historiography has ignored the centrality of the Nazis' genocidal policy toward the Jews." Note the word centrality. On page 33 an article by Henry Kamm (New York Times, 25 March 1989) is reproduced, "No Mention of Jews at Buchenwald." The article contains some absurd statements.

Just after completing this Bulletin we were deeply shocked and angered by a report that the distinguished French revisionist historian, Prof. Robert Faurisson, has been seriously injured by a brutal criminal attack.

On page 35, in a discussion of anti-Zionist cartoons, it is claimed that such cartoons equate the recent actions of the Jewish state in Palestine with those of National Socialist Germany, which "sought the ruthless and systematic annihilation of an entire people." If that were so, it was certainly an impossible dream on the part of the National Socialists because Germany probably never controlled more than about 3.8 million Jews, many of whom were amongst the approximately three million who migrated to Palestine after 1939. National Socialist Germany thus had power over only approximately one-quarter of the Jews of the world.

What the powerful Zionist organizations want they usually get, especially from "our" weak-kneed federal government, but one interesting and encouraging defeat of these organizations is described in some detail on page 36. A teaching curriculum on the "Holocaust" was denied federal funding from the Department of Education in 1986 and 1987. It seems that the villains (or heroines, depending on one's point of view) were Dr. Christina Price and Dr. Shirley Curry. In connection with this matter we observe once more the almost unbelievable arrogance of Zionist organizations which are trying to make the plight of Jews in Europe the central aspect of the history of the Second World War, a war in which tens of millions of Aryans were reputed to have lost their lives. The teaching of the "Holocaust" to intellectually defenseless school children is claimed to have some sort of moral or intellectual value. As a matter of fact, however, the teaching of "Holocaust" claims is shrewdly calculated to destroy the psychological defenses of Aryans against Jewish power and Jewish misuse of that power and to keep alive quarrels amongst the Aryan nations that reached their tragic climax during the Second World War, quarrels which still have their destructive effects on the psyches of many Aryans. Dividing and controlling host populations is an ancient Jewish strategy, as we can note in the Biblical book of Isaiah, 19,2.

A nasty innuendo—one of many— occurs on page 37, where the claim is made that "overt Holocaust 'revisionism' has been rejected by legitimate historians and scholars." Just what is a "legitimate" historian? Are historians now licensed by some governmental agency or another? Was Thucydides an "illegitimate" historian because he did not have certain academic credentials? If nearly all academic historians have shied away from an objective examination of the "Holocaust" claims, does this fact attest to anything other than the tremendous political and financial power of Jewish organizations to intimidate academic institutions and organizations? I can speak from my own personal experiences on this matter. I learned that a figure no less than Senator Metzenbaum of Ohio put pressure on the officers of the American Association of Teachers of German as a result of an advertisement for my book, The 'Holocaust'/ 120 Questions and Answers that had been published in the German Quarterly of Winter 1984. The German Quarterly is published at Ohio State University and is subsidized to a greater or lesser extent by federal and Ohio state funding. Although there have been notable exceptions, most academic historians are preoccupied with professional advancement and retention of their positions in an overcrowded field. They are far too cowardly and lacking in real intellectual idealism to tackle a question like the validity of the "Holocaust" claims. The great power and financial resources of the Anti-Defamation League are also evident on the obverse of the back cover of the Report, where the many offices of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith are listed, from Atlanta to Los Angeles and even in Europe. What a contrast to the very meager resources of the revisionists!

Our particular interest was captured by a discussion (page 30) of the significant book by Arno J. Mayer, a professor of European history at Princeton University, Why Did the Heavens Not Darken / The Final Solution in History, which was reviewed in detail in Bulletin 38. Mayer's basic (and correct) thesis that the plight of the Jews in Europe during the war should be understood in the context of the whole war and a number of Mayer's correct conclusions are disturbing to the writers of the Report.

In the 44 pages of the ADL Research Report there is practically no substantive argument against the writings of the revisionists. As we might expect from the previous behavior of the Zionists, nearly the whole work is devoted to ad hominem arguments, the recourse of persons who are not only in the wrong but, at least subconsciously, know it. □

Drs. M. G. Rost van Tonningen

NETHERLANDS

Dear Dr. Rost van Tonningen;

We are living in a world where the political lie reigns, and where political truth cannot find shelter. As in other branches of disciplines, orthodoxy dominates, notwithstanding its corruption and the changes demanded by wise and judicious men. The world political system is so rampant today that you, being a Rost van Tonningen, the son of a great leader murdered by the Jews because of his efforts to uphold Aryan principles of truth and justice, must well know its evil designs, and that what your mother says is true.

> You have not begun to appreciate the depth of our guilt. We are intruders. We are subverters. We have taken your natural world, your ideals, your destiny, and played havoc with them. We have been at the bottom of not merely the latest great war, but of every other major revolution in your history. We have brought discord and confusion and frustration into your personal and public life. We are still doing it. No one can tell how long we shall go on doing it. Who knows what great and glorious destiny might have been yours if we had left you alone.
> Century Magazine, February 1928

Whether or not one wishes, or dares, to believe it, there is an everlasting and underlying plot for which all political action is designed to cover-up. Let us as mature and intelligent gentlemen see through this political façade and face this truth squarely and forthrightly. It is this:

1) The Jews are presently, and have been, carrying on a war of extermination against the Aryan peoples.

2) As destroyers and capable only of destruction, their ultimate aim is to destroy the planet and thus, all on it including themselves.

3) Unlike my Dutch, Irish ancestry, we can no longer hope to escape the Jew issue by running or emigrating.

4) The Jew war against Nature and Aryans forces us now to take a stand everywhere throughout the planet. Any other action is certain suicide.

5) Nature is decreeing that each being must choose between either the Aryan law (Nature's law), or that of the Jew, namely that of destruction.

The political cover-up becomes most obvious as one considers the laws passed by many nations whereby open discussion or revelation of Jews is simply a crime, punishable by whatever curse becomes the victim's lot. That Jews have well earned all the discussion, exposure and eternal damnation for what they have perpetrated upon all the world, is never a political issue. The reason is clear; they own the political systems of the earth.

> There is no such thing as an independent press in America, if we except that of little country towns. You know this and I know it. Not a man among you dares to utter his honest opinion. Were you to utter it, you know beforehand that would never appear in print... It is the duty of a New York journalist to lie, distort, to revile. to toady at the feet of Mammon, and to sell his country and his race for his daily bread, or what amounts to the same thing, his salary. We are the tools and vassals of the rich behind the scenes. We are MARIONETTES. These men pull the strings and we dance. Our time, our talents, our lives, our capacities are all the property of those men, we are intellectual prostitutes.
> John Swinton, Editor New York Times, in a speech to the American Press Association, 1914.

The Jews bragged openly to the world that they would start World War II to exterminate the Germans, and then proceeded to do so. In this senseless war, at least 52 million people lost their lives. The primary goal was to kill Aryans. All who have ceased closing their eyes to reality must accept that Jews are murderers on a very grand scale, and politically they are the top criminals of the planet.

If we investigate history prior to World War II, it becomes evident that the Jews were responsible for the European Thirty Years' War of extermination, the American Civil War, the French Revolution, the South African Boer Wars, and the First World War. These wars were further efforts by the Jews to exterminate the Aryan people while stealing their wealth and property, tightening political control of nations, and setting the stage for their ultimate design of One-World Jewish government. Since World War II, Europeans, Americans and Aryans globally have been reduced to spiritual slavery as they dared not think or express the emotional turmoil in their souls which had been suppressed for so long. This suppressed emotional turmoil had been controlled by the Jews by the massive educational and television-created guilt they have heaped upon the Aryan peoples for their alleged crimes against Jews and Blacks.

Those who have accepted this induced guilt have aligned themselves with Jewish causes. Without doubt, the Jew-controlled United States Government is chief among this alignment, evidenced, for example, by casting the lone vote for Jewish Israeli on many United Nations Security Council issues. All governments and individuals who have aligned themselves with the Jews are standing on the side of political crime. Political crime is treason, not only to one's own country, but to our race, to our planet, to our God, and to our children and grandchildren, and to all concepts of decency.

> Federation plays a major part in Jewish life throughout the world. There is a federation in every community of the world where there is a substantial number of Jews. Today, there is a central movement that is capable of mustering all of its planning, financial and political resources within twenty-four hours, geared to handling any particular issue. Proportionately, we have more power than any other comparable group, far beyond our numbers. The reason is that we are probably the most well organized minority in the world.
> Nat Rosenberg, Denver Allied Jewish Federation
> International Jewish News, January 30, 1976.

My friend, are you not, by your stubbornness with which you refuse to accept this reality, hurting your honorable mother, your own children, and your dead father? Is there not an overwhelming reason to believe that you are profiting in your position which is treasonous to the sacred memory of your murdered father, and from the on-going campaign you are enhancing against your mother? Your mother, Florentine Rost van Tonningen, alone in Holland is fighting for your name, for your children, and for all the people of Holland, while some of you, it appears, are profiting from the Jews for your persecution of her, and the desecration of your father's name. How will your children respond when they learn the truth? Are you not standing on the wrong side in this eternal issue?

We Jews, we, the destroyers, will remain destroyers forever. Nothing that you will do will meet our needs and demands. We will forever destroy because we need a world of our own.

Maurice Samuel
You Gentiles

Allow me to show my sympathy for you and others who are victims of the greatest mind-control capability the world has ever experienced. We are all victims, but we must overcome this induced madness by and through our search for what is real and true. I realize that Holland suffers from the greatest suppression and brain-washing of any nation in Europe. Yet, nowhere in Europe is the Jew hated more. For this reason, I find it difficult if not impossible for a Dutchman not to see the noble purposes of your mother. What she is doing is far beyond simply being a great woman; she is in possession of cosmic Truth.

The time is fast approaching when all will understand. The entire world is slowly awakening to the endless Murder by the Jews. The world is awakening to those who do the Jews' dirty work. Jews are responsible for 200 million admitted White murders under the guise of war in this century alone. Aryans especially are, in addition, being murdered daily through ritual murder, through miscegenation, forced low birth rates, abortions, misinformation, staple and junk food poisonings, manipulation of currency, control of the courts, control of law, medicine, newspapers, television, education, all churches and libraries, destruction of the Natural ways, plus hundreds of additional schemes. The mind-controlled sleeping giant, the Aryan consciousness and his God, is being awakened!! The enslaved spirit of the older generation is finding freedom along with and through the expression of the youth. The guilt of World War II has not been accepted by the new generation. The trusted tools of the Jews for millennia, information and money control, are collapsing. The worn-out myth of the 6 million, the cover-up of the massive murder by the Jews is, as well, collapsing. The lies this world has been forced to live with for so very long are increasingly being replaced by the Truth which is the product of Nature and the Natural Aryan mind. This spirit globally is breaking free of the chains of Jewish control.

If the tide of history does not turn toward Communist Internationalism, then the Jewish race is doomed.

George Marlen, Stalin, Trotsky, or Lenin,
New York, 1937; p. 414.

Jewish control and its alias, Communism, is collapsing. Television commentators in the United States openly state that Communism is dead. The Jew has had his day, his age, and is near his final victory. With even the slightest insight into the affairs of nations, this is clearly seen. Further, it is believed that the 'insiders' of world governments know this as they desperately begin to try to adjust their unnatural way to accommodate the new pressures of Nature, of reality and truth, where political systems will again be based upon what is good for the Aryan, not political systems designed for a ravaged earth under Jewish tyranny.

There can be no solution to the problems of the world without the destruction of the Jews and their religion.

Karl Marx, The Strange Death of F.D.R.
by Emanuel M. Josephson

As political leaders are presently changing alignment away from Jewish control, so too are wise and prudent individuals cutting all relationships with this murderous mob. Those not so wise and prudent will find themselves clearly on the criminal side of a new system which will not tolerate the affront of Jewish sympathy, or anything against Nature and Nature's Laws. The conversion to reality, truth and a sane world will not come without a cleansing and elimination of the decay of the past. No government or political force will be able to contain the Natural forces enhanced by the Aryan wrath when they begin the cleansing which will make way for honor and justice and individual sovereignty, the expression of the Aryan soul, and the righteous dignity denied so long. In this world, there will be no place for a Jew or anything Jewish. God help the one who refuses to know this!!

The clash of the titans is now fully underway. The two titans who are locked in combat are the two parts of the economic equation: man versus the natural forces. The men who rule this world are rushing at breakneck speed to attempt to pull together a centralized, global, high-tech, bureaucratic, one-world order. At the same time, the natural forces of our collapsing climate are moving in accelerating fashion toward destroying these centralized plans of mice and men, moving us toward radical decentralization. Stated differently, as man is Moving toward total civilization, total order and control, nature is moving toward total dispersion, disorder and chaos. You and I are pawns in the game in this clash of titans. Unless we are careful, we will be trampled by these two Goliaths.

Acres U.S.A., 1989.

The twentieth century has been an especially tragic part of a political 'Dark Age' which has set back world progress several hundreds of years. The indomitable Aryan people, led by Nature and her Laws, are breaking out of this enslavement, expressed by the growing turmoil everywhere. The Aryans hold the key to not just breaking the back of this monster, but to opening the doors to a political/social golden age.

The thrust of the Aryan spirit must come from the Aryans globally, for their kinsmen each has suffered from Jewish insanity. Further, Aryans have been guilty of being thoroughly absorbed into the caldron of racial goulash, all too closely tied to Jew-serving Fundamentalist Christianity We who vision a political/social renaissance and the correction of a corrupted technology know unerringly that the present Jewish political monstrosity will be, and is being, destroyed. The Jew, however, will attempt to destroy the planet as his hold on earth weakens.

> They have but few years to try to stamp out the undying, divine Ideology; to crush as many of its votaries as they can, before they are, themselves, ground to dust in a fratricidal war of demons against demons.
> Savitri Devi
> The Lightning and the Sun, 1958

The ultimate aim of the creature, the Jew, is to destroy all life on the planet, including himself. This is both a genetic trait and is further enhanced by the Jew law. This double destructive trait, supported by their history and their goals, is overwhelming and conclusive proof that they are not natural beings. They are unnatural life forces, or mutants, that are threatening all life on the planet.

Being both parasites and psychopathic murderers, terrorists and destroyers all combined, they are often difficult to identify, locate, catch and/or destroy because of their stealth. Further, more than half of them are in disguise. Conversely, the Aryan is the only biped that is genetically programmed to build civilizations (Other bipeds cannot even maintain them).

Since the Aryan has not yet learned and accepted his responsibility to manage the other creatures with the authority that nature required, Nature is (again?) now coming to our aid-and-our-defense to cleanse the planet. The Jews' well publicized current plans to exterminate billions of humanoids is but more planned selective mass-murder, interestingly, in addition to what Nature has planned.

Will the Aryan survive the double threat and learn to accept his responsibility this time? For how long? When? From numerous sources of ancient wisdom, the Dark Age now ending will be followed by a Golden Age Free of the mutants. It will end over the next twenty-five years.

There are other matters of great magnitude stirring the political leaders of Russia and the United States and other nations. In spite of their spiritual saturation with Jewish madness, do these leaders sense, or know, the end of an epoch is very near? Surely, they know phenomena and technological secrets long held in silence. Are they now taking serious notice of the weather, of the Antarctica ice build-up, of the incredible effects of electromagnetism, of the secrets now being revealed from outer space, and other awesome perils, while floundering with their own woefully misguided system of technology?

The political Dark Age created by the Jewish anti-life forces that have so devastated the world over millennia (if not Ages) is collapsing. The masses inter-bred for regression, further inflicted with disease and famine as no other time on earth, with extermination specifically directed at the Aryans, this is the enigma of Jewish political insanity. Though a parasite, the Jewish mind works to destroy its host. The destroyers would deny Nature its only tool for reconstructionthose Aryans who are designed to overcome all obstacles to blend with Nature in rebuilding the forces of harmony by which Nature rules with perfect peace. This 4000 year war is ending. Out of this collision of forces, the destined masters of this planet will take their rightful places of righteous rule.

As Nature's tranquility settles upon our blue planet, with all the natural forces back in place, we can now foresee the Golden Age which other men could but imagine. Only then will we and this planet know the beautiful and glorious expression of the Aryan soul aligned with Nature's Peace.

Yours,

THE ANTI-HUMANS

by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb. $7.00) describes what was done to the young men whom Corneliu Z. Codreanu, the founder of the Legionary Movement in Romania, inspired, when, seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented Pavlovian 'experiment' on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti-Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. Reading it will be an emotional experience you will not forget. ("A sequel to Orwell's 1984"—R.S.H. "A searing exposé of Red bestiality!"—Dr. A.J. Appp). Order #01013. OTHER LOSSES

A Book Review

Ernst Zündel

A sensational book has just been published in Canada by Stoddard Publishing Co., Ltd. It is entitled Other Losses. Its author, James Bacque, is a Canadian of French extraction. The book's title is further explained on its dust jacket: An investigation into the mass deaths of German prisoners at the hands of the French and Americans after World War II. The author had advertised in Canadian newspapers for former P.O.W.s to contact him. Knowing our interest in the general topic of Allied War Crimes, some of our subscribers and supporters contacted Mr. Bacque to witness for history. One of those who did so was Hans von der Heide, a translator for us at the first Zündel-Holocaust Trial. He had the misfortune to fall prisoner to the Western Allies and, along with photos and documents, told author Bacque his terrible story. But gathering material on this gruesome subject was not the only difficulty faced by the author: Bacque says that 30 U.S. publishers turned down his manuscript, so the sort of censorship which I have said to exist here in the so-called free world for the past 30 years does exist!

Of course, the U.S. has every reason to hide the truth about Eisenhower's cold-blooded and deliberately planned mass murder of some 1.7 million German men, women, and children in U.S.-run concentration areas where those confined died, as was intended by their American captors, from starvation, disease and exposure. One U.S. confinement area alone, at Dietersheim, "held 32,640 old men, women and children under 8 years of age, boys of 8 to 14, terminally sick and cripples." (Other Losses, page 88).

The French received these and other thousands of near-dead and dying Germans from American 'custody' for use as 'labour reparations'! Of course, no one so near to dying of starvation could do any labour whatsoever.

Bacque reveals that the Americans had a vast surplus of food and building materials at hand which they could have used to feed and house the millions of Germans whom they had decided to confine after the war ended in Europe, but they did not do so.

Instead, the Americans confiscated such German foodstuffs as existed and refused to permit the Red Cross to distribute 100,000 tons of food to the prisoners. This latter shipment was returned because the Americans said the warehouses were still full of undistributed Red Cross food from previous shipments. Meanwhile, tens of thousands of German captives were dying every day of starvation and malnutrition!

The author has encountered a long trail of U.S. tampering and destruction of documents which reveals quite clearly the 'mens rea' or guilty mind of the U.S. authorities who planned this atrocity and then tried to cover it up, similar to the Soviet mass-murders at Katyn and elsewhere. He reveals a conspiracy of obfuscation and silence by the U.S. military, the officially-approved 'court historians', the administrators of archives and 'private papers' of those officials and agencies involved in the Americans' genocide program.

It therefore appears that I have been only gently pointing out the war guilt and war crimes of Americans, although I have been accused by exceedingly thin-skinned individuals of having a penchant for 'America-bashing.' Not at all! What I refuse to do as a German is to suffer in silence American-sponsored and promoted lies while the real perpetrators of war crimes, many of whom are Americans, go unaccused and unpunished. After all, your American pledge of allegiance says, "...with Liberty and JUSTICE for all." I therefore presume that Americans deserve as much justice as anyone else, and in view of the Nuremberg War Crimes travesty, perhaps they deserve even more than they have ever received. The criminals and murderers amongst you also deserve justice, for if Germans have paid with their lives for real or imaginary 'war crimes,' then the same should apply for American war criminals. Justice is indivisible, otherwise it is not just. America should stop pointing the finger of accusation at Germans, for you point three fingers back at yourselves. I am all in favour of justice and I hope you are too! America got off on the wrong foot almost at the beginning of this century vis-à-vis its relations with Europe. It is therefore high time that America saw where it went wrong, who made it go wrong, and how that wrong may be corrected if America is ever again to find its right place in the world.

Will the O.S.I. investigate this American war crime? I think not, because Americans prefer to moralize, rather than behave morally in either domestic or foreign affairs. In this you fool nobody but yourselves. The people of the world see what you do and do not pay much attention any longer to what you say, for they know hypocrisy when they see it.

My own father was a 'prisoner of war' in such American 'camps' as Crailsheim, Mannheim, and Darmstadt. I remember what he looked like when he got home. I also remember his tales of needless hunger and brutality, of "Polish guards" in American uniforms who shot into the crowded enclosures at night, randomly murdering the prisoners.

What had my father done during the war? He was a member of the German Red Cross and he helped save the lives of men who had driven Communism back to the very gates of Moscow, unlike the Americans who were doing everything possible to make the world safe for Communism! Although he was a Red Cross medic, serving on a Red Cross ambulance train, he was brutally mistreated by the so-called defenders of democracy and neither his Red Cross armband, nor his official identity papers made any difference [just as it did not make one bit of difference to British and American Terror Bombers when they, during their thousands of "Let's make the world safe for democracy" air raids, indiscriminately bombed and destroyed hospitals and ambulance trains that were clearly marked on their roofs with huge and highly visible Red Cross signs. I know, I was there when they "did their thing" and visited destruction upon my home town, Kassel, especially on 22 October 1943! –Editor, Liberty Bell.]

While we are on the subject of the Red Cross and Allied War Crimes of World War II, neither James Bacque nor other revisionist historical researchers have been permitted by the International Committee of the Red Cross to research their archives in regard to these and other Allied concentration camps from 1945 through 1949. When it comes to humanitarianism for Germans, the Red Cross is distinguished by its refusals! The Red Cross does provide anti-German researchers and propagandists full cooperation and complete access to its files, and when such persons do not wish to journey to Switzerland or West Germany, the Red Cross is happy to send high-ranking officials, like Charles Biedermann, to testify on behalf of Zionists and other German-haters at trials such as mine. Time after time, the Red Cross has revealed its true nature: that of an anti-German arm of the One-Worlders.

Its dismal record of bias, hypocrisy and political partisanship is sufficient to keep me from donating any further time or money to it. As a German, I prefer not to support an organisation which has shown so much malice and hatred towards the German people. There are no Red Cross reports about German suffering inflicted by the Allies, although the Allies did, in fact, inflict enormous suffering upon German civilians and P.O.W.s! □

Victim of Zion!

Ernst Zündel

To My Friends Around the World!

You are probably wondering what is happening in Canada with Ernst Zündel's appeal and how Dr. Robert Faurisson is doing after the assassination attempt in Vichy on 16 September 1989, as well as other news of the movement. Here are the news items in their sequence of importance:

The Assassination Attempt Against Dr. Faurisson

I have spent an anxious four weeks desperately trying to piece together what really happened to Dr. Robert Faurisson, my chief advisor during three trial: the preliminary hearing in the spring of 1984, the first Great Holocaust Trial in 1985, and the Second Great Holocaust Trials in 1988.

Dr. Faurisson, who is intense, brilliant, courageous and creative, had taken the Samisdat Team by storm with his typically Gallic humour, his quick intelligence, his lovely French accent, his stamina and capacity for work.

He has stood out, amongst a team known for its long working hours and dedication, as a near "workaholic." When team members half his age would be dead tired, Dr. Faurisson would relentlessly drive on typists, researchers, photocopy men, computer operators, even legal assistants and lawyers.

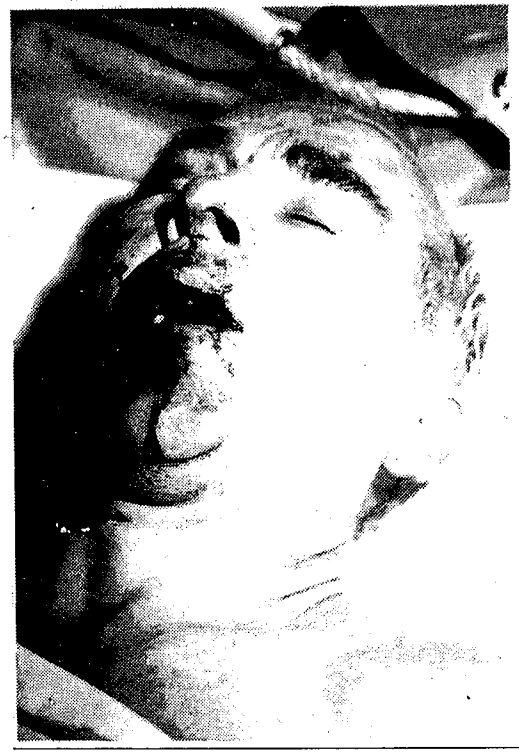
Robert Faurisson is often called "the Uncrowned King of Revisionism." We used to laugh and joke about it during breaks in the routine, yet we all knew that he, more than any other living person, has indeed represented "radical" or "total" revisionism for almost 20 years through the 1960s and 1970s.

Certainly, there were other gifted and dedicated revisionists like Udo Walendy, Dr. Wilhelm Stäglich, Dr. Arthur Butz, Dr. A. J. App, Harry Elmer Barnes, Dr. David Hoggan, Arthur Ehrhardt, the Jew Joseph Burg, and others, but there was only one man like Robert Faurisson! With some, Revisionism was a purely intellectual pursuit; with some it was a hobby; with others it was a project. With Dr. Faurisson, it has been his life or his obsession, according to his enemies. We who are his friends call him particularly dedicated!



I first heard of Dr. Faurisson in the mid-1970s and finally met him in 1979 at the founding meeting of the Institute for Historical Review in Los Angeles. Dr. Faurisson, small and delicate in build, was too tired to present his paper to the eager and expectant audience that packed the hall. At the last minute, somebody chose me, of all people, to read Dr. Faurisson's paper to those assembled. I could not help but reflect upon the strange turn of events. Here I was, a German from Canada, presenting a French professor's paper in English to an American audience in far-off California!

I think I was thunderstruck by the content of Dr. Faurisson's paper, as was the audience. His paper had as its central thesis that topic which I am forbidden to discuss by judge's order, since my last conviction for "false news," but this reading certainly awakened me, as if I had been jolted by a flash of lightning.

Those of you who have been receiving my newsletters over the years know the details, which my gag order does not permit me to discuss. I think I can safely say that the unlikely combination of this brilliant, French academic expert in ancient document and text analysis with the Swabian peasant advertising man was fated to become a surprise to those who thought they had everything under control as far as history was concerned.

The rest of Dr. Faurisson's work during the Zündel Trials has already become history. Hist testimony has been widely quoted, written about, and broadcast all over the world. The seeds have been sown and we owe this success largely to the dedication and sacrifice of this brave man who now suffers painful injuries inflicted upon him by the vilest enemies of Truth, Freedom and Justice.

I think it is important for all of us to analysis this attack on Dr. Faurisson, so that we may guard him and others against other such criminal acts. Our enemies are obviously sensing defeat. "Violence, after all, is a sign of an exhausted mind."

Those who have truth and unimpeachable documentation as well as the facts on their side, do not need to attack 60 year old men of letters and university professors. Gangsters and thugs do that! Real proponents of history don't beat or bomb people to censor them. Nor do they have them tried for 'thoughtcrimes.' Only yesterday, 16 October 1989, a 'Jewish' group, calling itself the "Organisation Juive des Combat," blew up the office of the French monthly newspaper Le choc du mois, because those journalists had dared to write an exposé of the attack on Dr. Faurisson. A newswriter, Mr. Letty, had been working all night long on another article, when at 5:50 a.m. he smelled something burning. He opened the door, saw the bomb in hallway, closed the door and was promptly blown off his feet. The office was destroyed and every window in the building shattered. The French press hardly reported the incident!

We should learn from this! A new phase, using the familiar tactics of naked terror, seems to have been decided upon by those who want to establish their exclusive monopoly over the writing of history. For years friends and foes have had a field day laughing about my 'bunker mentality' because I believed in securing my Headquarters with barbed wire, 24 hour surveillance cameras, around-the-clock guards, time-lapse recorders which record not only the "scene" all around my building using eight monitor, but which also freeze the image, the hour, minute, second, and year of each frame, just as those sophisticated bank security systems function to catch and convict bank robbers. Our photocell-operated searchlights illuminate the area so brightly that no muggings and no robberies have been reported in the last 15 years in my neighbourhood. The 12 foot high security fence and the barbed wire discourage unauthorized entry. Microphones broadcast and record conversations from around the neighbourhood and act as an early warning system for us.

Everybody laughed at our safety helmets, the bullet-proof vests, my constant urging to only go out as a team, never alone! New we see that one ounce of prevention is indeed worth a ton of cure.

How did the Jewish thugs get to Dr. Faurisson? And what can we learn from his painful experience?

Dr. Faurisson walked his dog, all by himself, apparently each day at roughly the same time, thus setting up a predictable pattern of behavioura fateful mistake in security matters. This pattern allowed the terrorists to set up an ambush, which is exactly what these obviously professional thugs did! Dr. Faurisson's dog is one of those playthings, a miniature poodle type, with lots of yap but no bite. Three muscular, male hoodlums approached Dr. Faurisson, sprayed a Mace-like gas in his eyes, blinding him instantly, and then proceeded to attack him by first knocking him to the ground and then kicking him with heavy boots in the head, facer, ribs and mouth, while he lay there in excruciating pain. His calls for help eventually attracted three fishermen who rushed to his rescue! One, a rather athletic Frenchman, seized one of the Jews and held him, but he let the terrorist go when another one shouted "use your gun!"

By this time, Dr. Faurisson was apparently unconscious. There was no time to call an ambulance, so one of the fishermen rushed him to the hospital in his own car. The "tear gas" used by the assailants still clung to Dr. Faurisson's clothing and was so strong that the rescuer had to leave his car temporarily because he himself was choking and his vision w3as impaired by the gas which was wafting off Dr. Faurisson.

The Emergency Section of the Vichy Hospital quickly diagnosed Dr. Faurisson as being in danger of losing his life and rushed him to the better-equipped Regional Hospital in Clermont-Ferrand, which had a highly efficient, state-of-the-art Trauma Unit. Dr. Faurisson lay there in critical condition for several days.

I heard about this attack through a French friend and comrade living in West Germany, who had learned of the attack on French State Radio. All my media monitors around the world were put on alert, and soon I was able to assemble a preliminary picture of what had happened. Other French friends called in with reports. David Irving called from London with the latest information, and was his usual well-informed self. Although Dr. Faurisson and David Irving had been at odds for almost a decade, now there was genuine, almost comradely concern in David Irving's voice. I immediately impressed on him and others whom I contacted to tighten their security!

Finally, it seems, people are beginning to listen! Why, I wonder to myself, does it always have to take a tragedy to do what seems perfectly obviousto look out for oneself!

Who should take precautions in regard to security and how? Remember, caution is not cowardice! If you have an exceptional talent in one field or another, then you owe it to your cause to assure that these talents are protected to serve the cause, as long and as unlimited as is humanly possible through the prevention of attacks against yourself.

That means:

1) Do not go out alone, not even for short walks, like to the postoffice, to get some milk, etc.;

2) Do not establish a fixed routine which makes it easy for you to be set up for an ambush;

3) Do not go to appointments alone;

4) Do not make speaking tours all by yourself; take along a bodyguard and arrange to be picked up on arrival at your destination by two or three supporters;

5) Do not go to public washrooms alone; this can be dangerous because an attack will be least expected by ordinary people at such times!

6) If you must drive, take someone with you and spend some money on the installation of a CB radio as well as a portable phone. This way you can always call truckers, emergency road vehicles and police to come to your aid.

7) Always have a First Aid Kit with you!

8) Do not drink, smoke dope, or take drugs while you are "on duty"which is 24 hours a dayif you are serious about the cause.

9) Do not "pick up" strange women or men.

One of the easiest ways to compromise a person is through such episodes captured on film or video which can become a tool for blackmail. You can even be killed more easily during one of these 'animal periods' because your otherwise defensive faculties are preoccupied with lust.

I hate to be so graphic, but your life may depend on such a frank discussion of these things which also are simple facts of life.

10) Purchase and wear a bullet-proof vest of good quality, which should be capable of stopping anything up to .357 Magnum.

11) Always tell someone you trust, when you have to go out somewhere, where you are going and for how long; leave a phone number where you can be reached!

12) Check with your Headquarters regularly!

13) Secure your house, your garage, your car with good, not cheap, locking devices and alarm systems;

14) Take along a hard hat when you go for a demonstration or appearance;

15) Be alert; look for and anticipate possible security problems. Avoid confrontation and act according to this axiom: to speak softly, but carry a big stick.

The wise leader does not grandstand or think he has to win every argument, every debate, every shouting match. Sometimes it is well to remember that "he who walks away comes back to fight another day."

You will have noted that I did not say anything about arms, like guns, knives, swords, clubs, etc. Why? Because that depends entirely on your local laws and personal style and preference!

What I have given you is a common sense approach to security. There are quite good books on the market, so please read some. However, do not become paranoid to the point where you scare your wife and children half to death. Whatever you undertake for your security should be understated; the more invisible the better, except for building security. Do not 'barricade' yourself in so that you isolate yourself from your neighbourhood and family. Your best protection is to be known and liked by those around you!

Yes, you will have to give up something of your privacy, in exchange for security, but after looking at the picture of Dr. Faurisson lying there in a coma, which would you rather besafe or sorry?

The Zündel Appeal!

The Zündel Appeal was heard from the 18th to the 22nd of September 1989. It lasted a whole week, instead of the slated 3 days. The courtroom was packed as per usual, and with the exception of one day, the Zündel supporters outnumbered the local Zionists; sometimes four or five to one. Once again, tight security was in place, and all pocket had to be turned out, handbags and briefcases had to be opened for inspection. The line ups were as long as those during the first trial at some periods in the proceedings, which surprised the media, who were present in force.

Sabina Citron, the woman who had originally charged me, was there with her coterie of old ladies and crippled old men. It looked as if the geriatric ward of some Jewish Old People's Home had been sending an obligatory delegation. Once again the Canadian public did not seem to be concerned as to what was going on in that courtroom. To the public, it still seems to be considered as "a struggle between the Germans and the Jews."

The media reported a few days in a perfunctory manner, and then everything went silent and was blocked or censored out. this usually is a sign that things are not going too well for the Zionist side in this struggle.

The scene inside the courtroom was quite comical at times. When Doug Christie made some really strong point which displeased Sabina Citron, she would noisily get up and storm out, re-entering the courtroom only when the prosecutors were speaking.

Chief Prosecutor Blacklock seemed to bring out the worst in the Zionists. I don't know why, but somehow they just did not like that man! I even felt a little pity for him at times, for he was after all a government official, sworn to uphold the law. Evidently, he was not twisting the laws out of shape sufficiently to suit the Zionist hatemongers!

For me it was an eerie feeling to have three judges, four prosecutors, plus my own attorney, talk about me, my thoughts, my philosophy of life, my political ideology, my writings, films, books, videotapes, etc., as if I was not there at all or as if I were dead! Those of my legal team present were Doug Christie, my courageous attorney, Keltie Zubko, his brilliant legal assistant, and attorney Barbara Kulaszka, who is a gifted researcher and can ferret out case law to the astonishment of friend and foe alike.

We had presented our two-hundred page Factum, which has been called a memorable document by other lawyers and some retired judges. Every argument that we could muster was made. Law, usually staid and boring, was used creatively by us. Time and again we surprised the opposition with novel interpretations and devastating constitutional arguments! I can assure you that what could humanly be done was done. We simply could not do more. My still existing gag order prevents me from telling you all the magnificent arguments we made. I will reprint some section of Keltl Zubko's Friends of Freedom newsletter, to be safe, for I do not honestly know how far I can go in reporting on my own case.

One interesting development took place the week before I had to check into Toronto's Don Jail, from where I was supposed to be taken to the courthouse. We had made a motion for me to be present at my own hearing, a right which is not automatic in Canada. We were then told that I should be asking for more, namely, for an order deleting the requirement that I turn myself in to jail the night before the hearing date. I was really surprised by that development, for in my many years of legal struggles with the Canadian system, very few public officials have gone out of their way to be nice to me or to do me any favours. Maybe the reason was that I told the Crown prosecutor that I did not fear their jails and that it would look far worse for the Canadian system to jail me for what I thought, then it would look on me.

I had gone ahead and organized a demonstration with my friends outside the jail, at the time when I was going to go 'inside.' My friends showed up with their signs, and paraded up and down in front of the jail's entrance in great numbers. Media were there from a U.S. Christian network and one video team from West Germany, as well as a number of nationalist reports from West Germany, Spain, and Austria.

Fred Leuchter, Attorney Schaller, who defends cases similar to mine in Austria, all had come to participate. Zündel Headquarters once again was full to overflowing. Again we had to eat in shifts. There were the familiar line ups outside the bathrooms and the airmattresses, sleeping bags, etc., were pressed into service.

There was a "Film Festival" on in Toronto and virtually no hotel rooms could be had, not even for $130-$150 a. night, except way out on the outskirts of town, so our friends from overseas moved a little closer together and pretended it was 'wartime,' which it is, of course. It is just war of a different kind! Many old friendships were deepened and a renewed spirit of cooperation was evident.

At the end, the Judges found that Doug Christie had presented some thorny legal arguments, too difficult for them to decide on the spot, so they reserved judgment. This means that I sit in my office and await that phonecall which will tell me to check into the Don Jail. If the judges rule against me, I will begin to serve my nine-month sentence right then and there. An appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is not automatic, but is a "privilege of power" and depends on how the appeal court judges rule. If they are unanimously against me, things will look bad. If only one votes for me, then I get a chance to appeal to the Supreme Court. Should I win at the Ontario Court of Appeal level, undoubtedly the prosecution will appeal to the Supreme Court. So whichever way one looks at it, I will be tied up in expensive court battles for at least another year. If I lose totally, it is off to jail and the beginning of my sentence.

I have prepared matters here, for this eventuality, to see to it that we can function on a 'low burner.' Whether or not I will be permitted to write and send out newsletters will be up to the authorities.

To you who are my friends, I want to say a heartfelt Thank You! You have supported me and stood by me over the years while we have tried to right some historical wrongs. In the process we have re-written history, and have made history of our own. We already had our 'informational victories' inside and outside the courtrooms during the trials. The Cause has gained tremendously through our court cases. For me, personally, they have been tiring, costly, and time-consuming. If I have to spend some time in jail, they will have been inconvenient as well, but worth it for the cause of freedom to think!

You are a magnificent group of people! It has been my privilege to act for you, to speak on your behalf, to lead the fight up here in the frozen North! I have the feeling that a chapter of my life is coming to an end. Together we have shared good times and sad ones. Some friends have died or dropped out, but they leave their memories and their accomplishments to us who remain in the struggle.

Please join with me in sending greetings and encouragement to Dr. Faurisson in the form of letters, cards and money. Make any checks payable to "Mr." Faurisson, not "Dr." or "Robert" or "Prof." Faurisson. That is Dr. Faurisson's idea. Better still, send your help in cash in a well-sealed envelope. He just had to lay out 3300 French Francs for new glasses to replace those smashed by the terrorist attackers. He will need costly dental work to fix his teeth, many of which were knocked out when his upper and lower jaws were broken in six places.

Please write to the enclosed addresses of the French media, police officials, government bureaucrats and ministers. They are not investigating with any vigor this disgusting and cowardly act by the Jewish thugs, but public pressure and scrutiny can change their minds! We have achieved miracles before by coordinated, concentrated, combined operations. Your efforts have helped me. Now let's help Robert Faurisson, a hero of our cause!

To Whom It May Concern:

I have read in the newspapers about the vicious attack against the revisionist French scholar, Dr. Robert Faurisson, by three Jewish terrorists on September 16, 1989 in Vichy.

I have not heard of any arrests!

What kind of country is France, when crimes against intellectual freedom are tolerated by the police, the judiciary, the politicians, and the media? What kind of 'Liberté' is that?

I demand that French authorities do something to solve this heinous crime, and expect that you tell me the results.

I presently buy French wine, cheese, and my wife, French fashions. We have visited France on holidays. However, if France allows this kind of terrorism, then I and my friends will have to reconsider our purchasing of French goods!

Please explain to me the laxity of the investigation of this unspeakable crime.

Canada's First War Crimes Trial since the end of WWII is still on track. Despite numerous constitutional and other brilliant moves and arguments before various judges, this political trial is still going on. Most of the proceedings are, and have been for weeks, of a legal and technical nature and have not been allowed to be reported.

Doug Christie, Keltie Zubko, and Barbara Kulaszka, the "battling trio," have been working long hours. The research team has combed the law and other libraries here and overseas. Many people are helping in many little ways. Once again, the main burden is borne by our network of idealists, because th Hungarian community has not been very supportive of the 77-year-old former gendarme.

He is going to court every day, although quite frail and obviously stressed. However, the Canadian politicians who caved in to Jewish pressure after forty years incessant agitation to pass this atrocious legislation which permits "persecution through prosecution," do not care.

One of the chief pushers for this disgusting law, a political hack and alleged "Ukrainian," named Hynatyshin, has just been made Governor-General of Canada! So the boys are being rewarded! One could say it is a new form of 30 pieces of silver.

The Canadian police seems to care little; after all, what's the fate of some old man to them. They remind me of the Jews in Moses' time, dancing around the golden calf, sexing, doping, boozing while their country goes to the dogs! Poor Canada! I had thought this was a better place. How wrong I was!

Once the trial starts for real, you will get a blow by blow description. If you can help in the meantime, please do! Also: do not forget to contact the media and your local and federal politicians and tell them how disgusted you are about this "pandering" to the Jews, as a former Prime Minister of Canada said it would be if Canada adopted this legislation.

The Zündel Appeal

The Zündel appeal commenced on Monday, September 18th with arguments of Douglas Christie, acting for Mr. Zündel who is appealing his second conviction on charges of publishing false new damaging to racial and social tolerance by publishing the 32-page booklet Did Six Million Really Die?

The argument was in front of the Ontario Court of Appeal, three judges (Brooke, Galligan and Morden) hearing the appeal. It was held in Courtroom 1 of Osgoode Hall, and the room was packed, primarily with supporters of the Appellant.

On Monday, Mr. Christie spent the entire day arguing about only 6 of the 47 grounds of appeal enumerated in the 151 page factum (the legal summary of appeal arguments and authorities). The judges heard that during Mr. Zündel's second trial, the judge improperly took judicial notice of one particular version of the holocaust, a version that Crown Attorney Blacklock referred to as the "bare bones" holocaust, finding that it was a fact that no reasonable person would dispute, and so advising the jury. Later in the trial, the trial judge told the jury that the booklet disputed the holocaust, leaving the clear implication therefore that they should disregard any evidence going to the truth of the booklet in question.

Ground 2 was that the trial judge improperly allowed the Crown to read into evidence the entire evidence of historian Raul Hilberg from the first trial, without requiring him to testify and be cross examined on the major changes to his opinion, as shown in the revised edition of his book, i.e., that he had excised the references to two Hitler orders for the extermination of Jews. Hilberg had written a letter to the prosecutor, saying that he did not wish to face cross-examination by Doug Christie again, and so would not attend the second trial. In the meantime, the changes to his book were made and published. This evidence, more than anything the revisionists could produce, would have shown the metamorphosis of the orthodox holocaust viewpoint, and was important to the defense view that history changes–especially history about World War II. As proof of that, witness the book Other Losses, by James Bacque, which is only now publishing in the mainstream what revisionists have discussed for years, i.e., Allied war crimes.

Ground 3 contested the judge's admission into evidence of three items going to the accused's motive to publish false news, but which were used by the Crown and the judge to try to show that the accused knew Did Six Million Really Die? was false. The reasoning for this evidence was that if the Crown proved Ernst Zündel was a National Socialist sympathizers, then he must therefore be a liar. This was a major ground, argued strenuously by Doug Christie that holding a particular ideology is no evidence of first knowledge of the truth or falsity of something, and second, that one was therefore a liar. this ground went hand in hand with a very important ground, i.e., the contention that the requirement for knowledge under Section 177 was of actual knowledge of falsity, and not a mere belief in falsity of the booklet.

Other important grounds argued that the book, Six Million Did Die, published in direct response to the booklet in question, should not have been admitted, and that The Leuchter Report (on the feasibility of gassings at Auschwitz and Birkenau by an American gas chamber engineer) should have been allowed. The defence also made the point that history is opinion, that the booklet was a political opinion piece, and that the judge repeatedly erred in his instructions to the jury on various elements of the charge to the jury. These arguments lasted over two days, although only one and a half days had been allotted.

The Crown then responded to defence arguments, taking another two days to proceed through the 33 points that the judges wished the Crown to answer, as well as the sentence appeal. These were argued by a new Crown attorney, John Blacklock, the trial prosecutor, John Pearson and Jamie Klukach, who introduced the requisite plea from the Jewish community. The defence team has seen many prosecutors on this case come and go, during the years since 1984 when Mr.

Zündel's case first went to court.

The Crown's arguments were clever as they distorted much of the actual trial evidence either by misstatement or by omission, leaving an incorrect impression with the appeal court judges. In an appeal of only five days (originally planned for a mere three!) it was a monumental task to deal with over 10,000 pages of evidence, six volumes of exhibits and arguments on many complex legal issues. The Crown reiterated the same ad hominem methods used at the trial, ie., that Ernst Zündel was a National Socialist sympathizer therefore must know that the booklet was false when he published it. They argued that the judge had been very kind (!) to the defence when he took judicial notice of a so-called "bare bones" version of the holocaust, i.e., omitting any mention of six million, and the word "policy."

They argued that the judge hadn't been biased, and that he bent over backwards to accommodate the defence. If it wasn't so much difference than what really happened, it would have been laughable. For example, the Crown made the incorrect submission that the judge had merely been humourous when he'd observed to Doug Christie about Mr. Zündel that "[the jury] Might think he's a kook...Perhaps that's the best thing he's got going for himself." It was this passage that had been excised from the official trial transcript until Doug Christie convinced the court reporter that two people in court were willing to swear they had heard and noted those remarks.

They argued that since Udo Walendy had written a response to the book Six Million Did Die, and Ernst Zündel was in receipt of Walendy's writings, Zündel must have had knowledge that Did Six Million Really Die? was false. This, of course, contained the implication that Six Million Did Die was true, when there was no such evidence, indeed the trial judge specifically made reference to the falsity of the portions of the book alleging gas chambers at Dachau.

The judges did not betray much emotion or indeed much response at all to most of the arguments. The only reaction betraying an obvious slant was Mr. Justice Galligan's words about the evidence of Dr. K.T. Fann, called by the defence to give expert evidence about the classification of the booklet as fact or opinion, and denigrated at the trial by the trial judge.

Galligan defended the judge, referring to Fann's evidence as "preposterous nonsense"...simply because he had given his expert opinion that the booklet was a political opinion, and therefore would not be caught by the false news section which refers to false statement of fact. Galligan's comments received a detailed answer from Doug Christie in his reply.

It seemed obvious to me that, notwithstanding the assurances of Justice Brooke that they had read the defence factum, much of it had escaped the attention of some of the judges. It is difficult to say just how the Judges really received the defence arguments, since the tension in the courtroom created by the presence of two very partisan factions probably had an effect on the judges.

Sabina Citron was there along with her bodyguard and others of the Jewish community, such as Manuel Prutschi of the Canadian Jewish Congress and others who had been much in evidence during the trial. The supporters of the defence outnumbered them on some days four to one.

One of the most striking aspects of the entire appeal was to see the appeal court judges demonstrate their own historical opinions and biases in the questions they asked of Doug Christie, especially during the argument about Judicial Notice. It showed me that everyone has their opinions about what took place during World War II, and no one knows the whole truth, thus underlining the importance of freedom of inquiry and expression, so that all points of view can be heard, weighed and accepted or rejected. Doug Christie's arguments about the terrible difficulties produced when trying someone for their historical views were hammered home to the three judges, and like it or not, they now must have some idea of the injustice of these kinds of trials.

On Friday, September 22nd, Doug Christie made his final reply to the Crown's arguments. He warned the court that attempting to put purveyors of ideas in jail does not weaken those ideas, but instead has throughout history made those ideas much more potent. The court adjourned at 3:30, with the decision reserved, as in the last appeal. That means it could come down any time that the judges have read and absorbed all the 36 volumes of transcripts, the factums, the exhibit books, and the massive books of authorities. All it takes to win the appeal is two of the three judges. If there would be a decision against Mr. Zündel, with one judge dissenting, there would be an automatic right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. It is expected that any decision going against the defence would be appealed. Mr. Zündel remains out of jail, on appeal bail.

A word of thanks must be specially said to all those who helped so much during the appeal. It was once again wonderful to see the manner in which people pitched in to help in all the ways they could think of, from making delicious meals for the tired defence team, to doing all the tedious photocopying and assembling of books of authorities, driving the defence team to court, and doing all the innumerable chores that make such a complicated appeal possible to carry through. The defence had plenty of help carrying the massive weight of books to court and back again, and plenty of support and encouragement. A special thanks to all the people who took time to come to court each day and show their presence in support of freedom of speech. Thank you! □

A Real War Criminal

An Open Letter to the O.S.I.

Mr. Neal Sher
Office of Special Investigations
Department of Justice
Washington, D.C. 20530

Dear Mr. Sher:

I would like to report the discovery of a loathsome and disgusting war criminal living right here in New Jersey. Far from concealing his past crimes, this butcher actually boasts of slaughtering helpless women and children when he was a Captain in the U.S. Army of Occupation in Germany. He even takes delight in boasting of how he also ordered his men to commit similar war crimes.

As a professional soldier who has served this nation during two wars, I was appalled by the conduct of this sadistic butcher who has brought disgrace, dishonor and shame on the United States and the American military.

His atrocities clearly violate the 1907 Hague Conference and the 1929 Geneva Convention. If we apply the "ex post facto" laws established during the Nuremberg Trials, there can be little doubt that this butcher is a war criminal—many times over— under the standards established at Nuremberg. An "ex post facto" application of the rules of war established at the 1949 Geneva Convention (IV), finds him guilty of crimes against civilians. Given the fact that he specifically directed his atrocities against the German people—whom he hates—his genocidal slaughters fall under the laws of the newly signed Genocide Convention.

Mr. Sher, given the problems you've recently experienced in rounding up suitable war criminals for shipment to Israel—as in the Frank Walus case, where eleven of your carefully chosen Israeli witnesses committed perjury and your prosecutors clearly committed subornation of perjury—this case should be, as we say in the Air Force, "a piece of cake." This loathsome butcher is a war criminal many times over; more importantly, he is a war criminal who goes about openly boasting and bragging of his many war crimes.

The war criminal in question is one Julian "Bud" Batlan. He lives at 9 Scott Lane in Englishtown, New Jersey, 07726. He is well known in New Jersey; in that, "Butcher" Batlan was formerly the Commander of the Jewish War Veterans in New Jersey.

Let me explain the series of events that led to the ex posure of this loathsome war criminal:

My path crossed Butcher Batlan during one of my many sorties to try and terminate the illegal and unconstitutional efforts by various Jewish organizations and individuals to censor American citizens by threats and intimidation—thereby denying them their First Amendment rights.

Example: An elderly couple living in Howell, New Jersey were harassed for months, until the police put a tap on their telephone, because the husband had written a letter to a newspaper. The wife became ill because she feared sleeping at night after receiving constant threats to burn her house down. Her husband said he would never write another letter to a newspaper because he could not put his sick wife through that kind of harassment again.

This man is an American citizen. He served his nation during the Second World War. And yet, he is being denied his First Amendment rights by threats on the life of his wife.

My "sortie," which I considered as "trolling for groundfire" as a Forward Air Controller (I did a lot of that in combat), produced a lot of "flak" right here in the U.S.: an endless cacophony of screaming, howling, shrieking death threats—morning, noon and night—and a collection of anonymous letters and notes in the same vein.

Of course, all the threats to murder my wife and children were wasted on me—I've never married. As for myself, I would take great pleasure in putting a bullet in creatures that masturbate in phone booths making obscene and threatening calls in an effort to frighten women and children. To me it would be a public service: the extermination of vermin.

As a firm believer in the American concept of "Equal Justice Under Law," I reported these death threats to the F.B.I., and suggested that if they applied half the energy they usually expend in tracing the twelve-year-old "criminal" who has spray-painted a lop-sided swastika on a wall, they could easily round up a score or more of these cowards who hide behind a telephone and try to terrify women and children. "Death threats" are against the law, you know.

I also informed my "screamers" on thetelephone—and Director William S. Sessions of the F.B.I. by formal letter—that anyone coming to "get me" with their "Uzis," as most of them had howled, will be promptly shot dead! It's a useful habit I picked up in combat with the First Air Commando.

The "turn-out" was most disappointing. Not one of the score or more of "screamers" has yet found the courage to even show up—with or without Uzis. Proving that those who hide behind telephones and anonymous letters are craven cowards.

I got lucky! I had the very good fortune to actually identify one of my anonymous postal cowards. He had sent me a childish death threat, painfully printed in—of all things!—Red Ink! Clearly, this was an intellect not far removed from the sand box.

Yes, it was Julian "Bud" Batlan, the former Commander of the New Jersey Jewish War Veterans, who printed that childish death threat in red ink—apparently with his left hand so that no one would identify his hand..."printing-(?). What a monumental ass!

I naturally sent the "heroic" Batlan a charming (I thought) letter thanking him for his childish note and commenting—at length—on cowards who send anonymous notes and letters because they haven't the courage to do otherwise. I suggested his actions were compatible with those of his counterparts in the Israeli Army, who, in responding to the Israeli Prime Minister's barbaric order to "Punish them, break their bones," had seized some 840 children on the Gaza Strip, from the age of 15 down to age of 4, had held them down and then "bravely" smashed their arms and legs with rocks and bricks. According to the barbarians in the Israeli Army, this was done because these children were "suspected" of throwing rocks.

A splendid example of "Israeli Justice." And a war crime under the Geneva Convention of 1949. It's interesting to note that many of the laws drafted at that convention were at the insistence of Jews; specifically those laws dealing with the treatment of civilians by armies of occupation. Incredible!

Mr. Bernard Mills, the U.N. official in charge of relief work on the Gaza Strip, had wondered how grown men could bring themselves to torture four, five and six-year-old children in such a cowardly and sadistic fashion. A question a great many Europeans had asked themselves when Mr. Mills spoke before the European Parliament on the unspeakable barbarity of the Israeli Army in the Gaza Strip. Well, Butcher "Bud" Batlan answered that question.

Butcher Batlan responded to my letter with a note that said: "Kicking ass is great!" This disgusting lower form of life clearly thought it was manly—if not "macho"—of the Israeli Army to torture Palestinian children in this fashion. In doing so, he certified his streak of sadism—a mile wide!—that paralleled his certified streak of cowardice as an anonymous writer of death threats. It was a loathsome streak of sadism that he would again document beyond a shadow of a doubt.

I was to later receive a letter from Butcher Batlan, wherein he clearly documents his war crimes. In this letter, the Butcher informed me that he had met some of the Israeli Generals who were visiting Fort Monmouth in New Jersey. He said that he informed them that he did not approve of the "restraint" they were using in dealing with the Palestinians. Only a butcher like Batlan, who regarded the torture of four, five and six-year-old children as "kicking ass," could consider the beatings, torture and shooting of unarmed civilians—women and children—as showing unusual "restraint." No doubt Batlan is of the school that regards the killing of an eight-year-old, a five-year-old, and a three-year-old by the Israeli Army as a matter of "self-defense." In the defense of Israel, a three-year-old toddler becomes a deadly terrorist to creatures like Batlan.

In his letter Batlan boasted that troops under his command were never that "restrained" when dealing with the German people. He boasts of having slaughtered German civilians without regard of sex or age—women and children—and points out that flamethrowers and .50 cal. multiple machine gun mounts were used against these unfortunate people. Men, women and children, the old and the young, were completely helpless, their lives were literally in the bloody hands of a sadistic butcher who clearly enjoyed killing them at every opportunity. As usual, for Batlan, this filthy creature actually thinks that his sadistic slaughters were acceptable conduct for an army of occupation and even quite courageous.

Having indiscriminately slaughtered Germans in occupied Germany, the Butcher demands the same slaughter of the Palestinian people in occupied Palestine, and wonders why the Israeli Army has shown so much "restraint" in the matter. As he says: "I advised them that I did not approve of this restraint." The bloody butcher actually wonders why anyone might be a bit squeamish or reticent about committing a genocidal slaughter of unarmed civilians, afterall, he thoroughly enjoyed all his slaughters.

Since the conditions in occupied Palestine are certainly not the same as the conditions in occupied Germany when the Butcher Batlan could get away with his slaughters, it would seem that the Israelis are somewhat loath to employ Butcher Batlan's tactics for slaughtering helpless civilians, en masse, with flamethrowers and 50. cal. multiple machine gun mounts. Much preferring to only slaughter a few Palestinians at a time with small arms. Probably because they know, full well, that they can't get away with the kind of appalling atrocities Batlan had committed after the war in a prostrate Germany where the media ignored, or covered up, his crimes. I'm sure this decision has come as a great disappointment to Butcher Batlan, who clearly yearns for the "good old days."

Having already written F.B.I. Director Sessions, I fully expect the red ink-stained wretch Batlan to be charged and tried for his repulsive postal habits—that he was stupid enough to so readily admit. This should go a long way in discouraging many of his cowardly counterparts who mail and phone death threats in an effort to deny American citizens their rights under the First Amendment.

As for the Butcher's war crimes: I naturally expect swift action by the O.S.I. in bringing charges against this confessed war criminal, so that he may be sent to Germany for trial. It is regrettable that Germany has abandoned Capital Punishment. Butcher Batlan, who has so grievously disgraced his uniform and the United States with his sadistic slaughters of helpless women and children certainly deserves to hang.

Mr. Sher, just in case you have some questions as to the law in this matter, might I suggest a short stroll to the Supreme Court Building, where I think you will find "Equal Justice Under Law" still engraved on the front of the building—it hasn't changed. Of course, any reticence on your part in the pursuance of this open-and-shut case of genocidal war crimes will certainly result in a rather rude metaphorical boot in the backside from some members of our Congress—to kind of move you along.

So, Mr. Sher, get on with it. Humanity cries for justice—latent though it may be—in these unspeakable "crimes against humanity."

Cordially,
[signed] Joe Stano, Maj. USAF-Ret.

THOSE WHO WILL NOT READ HAVE NO ADVANTAGE OVER THOSE WHO CANNOT READ

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,

Lt. Col. Higgins death outraged the entire country—and rightly so. Still, the saddest fact of his demise is that he is but one of the much larger number of Americans who have died for the benefit of Israel. His, the most recent death, brings that number ever closer to 400,000.

Here are the facts, as I see them, From the record and For the record, for those who are not familiar with them.

The present-day state of Israel was conceived and born in World War I. It was 1916 and England had given up hope of being victorious. Prudently she acquiesced to Germany's offer of peace, as per ante bellum. At this all important moment in history, the Jewish Zionist leader, Chaim Weizman, persuaded the English war lords that eventual victory was still with their reach, through intervention by the United States. For this, which he guaranteed would come to pass, he extracted the promise from the Brits that the Jews would be given Palestine, then a British mandate, as their "homeland". This sordid agreement is known to the world as the "Balfour Declaration." And, astoundingly except to those in the know, in 1917 the United States duly entered the war. The country and the men who were to die were told that they were fighting "a war to end all wars." That all of the dying then going on was solely for that piece of land in the Middle East that the Jews coveted makes the entire later half of that great war a Jewish war. Nearly 200,000 of those who died were Americans.

World War II was a Jewish War, from beginning to end! It actually began in 1933. In that year, the Jewish World Council declared a "holy war" against Germany until its complete and utter destruction. With their declaration of war they began boycotting German goods, and initiated a campaign of hate propaganda, an onslaught against truth that was unprecedented in history. And six years later, in 1939, they finally succeeded in "upgrading" their "holy war" into a shooting war.

This fact, cleverly obscured at that time, became self-evident when England and France declared war against Germany— after Germany, on 1 September 1939, executed a police action into formerly-German territory of Poland to rescue millions of ethnic Germans from the murdering hands of Polish megalomaniacs—and not against the Soviets when they invaded the eastern half of Poland a few weeks after the German action had begun. In 1941, after the Russo-German war started, Russia was given unlimited aid and was welcomed as an ally of the western powers.

In 1945, world Jewry's "holy war" aims were realized with a barbarism never before equaled.

With the help, aid and assistance of completely brainwashed nations, their leaders acting as bought-and-paid-for agents of international Jewry, they tore apart, murdered and incinerated hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children by bombing and leveling city after city without anymore compunction than dousing an anthill with gasoline and setting it on fire. Even Churchill, a man without scruples, who sacrificed the British Empire for the Jewish cause, when he became aware of the repercussions from the terrorist bombing of the beautiful city of Dresden in February 1945, emanating from some sane, neutral countries, attempted to dissociate himself from this murderous act. Nowhere on earth, at no time in history, had their ever been such deliberate mayhem, murder and destruction made by man. The destruction and death of Dresden is the most horrendous criminal act ever perpetrated. The casualties numbered twice those of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

For the benefit of world opinion, Jewish leaders also saw the need for dissociation. In line with the dissembling of truth regarding Germany, as had been done since 1933, the next giant step away from their own guilt complex was a masterpiece of deception the preceding twelve years of outrageous distortions and lies had made possible. Employing the proven maxim that the best defense is an offense, the media lords now published scenes of the chaos—emaciated bodies and unburied corpses—world-wide and added to these photos, depicting unmatched misery, their own concocted captions.

Since then, Jewry's exploitation of the monstrous and macabre "Holocaust" lie has turned into something much more than just a smokescreen to hide their own guilt; it has become their main plank in foreign policy. To wit: a world sympathetic to the Jews' alleged "suffering" stood by while the Jews ousted and killed the Palestinians and took their ancient homeland. Germany and the rest of the world is being blackmailed to the tune of billions to this day, these tribute payments being the mainstay of the chaotic economy of the bandit state of Israel. And because they cannot afford to let their multi-purpose smokescreen and lies be blown away, you will constantly hear and see expanded versions of their "Holocaust' scam on TV and in the press.

In 1967, during Israel's Six Day War, 34 US sailors died and 175 were wounded when the Israelis attempted to sink the USS Liberty. It is to our then President Johnson's everlasting shame that he refused to let nearby US forces take saving and retaliatory action and that he fully concurred in the ensuing cover-up.

In 1983, 50 Americans died in the US Embassy explosion in Beirut.

Also in 1983, 241 US Marines died in the suicidal bombing of their barracks.

In 1985, 255 US soldiers died in an air crash on their way back from the Middle East.

These are just a few examples of Americans who died for the benefit of Israel. Suffice it to say that ONE American death is too much if it is not in our country's best interest, but in the interest of this abomination called Israel.

How does our government explain to the bereaved the cause of their bereavement? How can it justify the unjustifiable? Best wishes,

'Uncle H.', New York State

Dear George:

I hope that this letter finds all well with you and yours...

I recently traveled to Britain, and found many depressing scenes such as a gang of Blacks turning over trashcans in Ispwich while White citizens pretended not to notice; White teenage girls in Felixstowe openly flirting with subhuman Africans; "Nelson Mandela Street" in Glasgow; a "Black Culture" film festival in York; constant racemixing propaganda via pop music blaring from the radio; an Indian with a British wife trying to trick elderly widows out of their money and possessions; and much more. But compared to the United States, the process of racial degeneration and suppression of racial truth has not gone nearly as far: I found a substantial minority of Britons unafraid to condemn multiracialism; "White Power" graffiti was seen everywhere; and Whites are still the overwhelming majority even in the large cities. But their island nation is small and crowded, and the streams of non-European biomass are nearly endless... Yours very sincerely,

K.S., Virginia

Dear George:

Many thanks for the...Adolf Hitler 100th birthday commemorative issue. I always look back with gratification when I think of my personal association with Germany, both before and after the tragic war. I have vivid memories of my last visit there in 1939. My mother had always expressed a desire to see Germany and, strangely, I decided to take my parents there in August 1939. We all had a marvelous time; subsequently my mother died in 1940 as the result of a silly accident, but I reflect that when we arrived back in Ostende, Belgium, we decided to have a day or two there, and I remember the Belgians were practicing the Black-Out with the street lamps; so it seems they knew about that about to happen war.

The world is right now well and truly paying the price for that foolishness. I was in Germany last year for a few days; one could hardly recognise the place. All in all, I have spent many years in Germany; I really loved the country. I was stationed in Wiesbaden for a few years in the occupation of the Rhine in the British Army; I enjoyed every minute of it and can remember a great number of people and incidents experienced.

Well, well, I suppose I get carried away; I doubt we shall ever again see in our time anything like it, but I do believe something like it could arise again as the result of the outright attempt at world destruction taking place today at the hands of the masters of broadcasting.

...Let us keep the flame burning. Sincerely yours,

J.L., New Zealand

Dear Mr. Dietz: * * * * *

The 20 April Adolf Hitler commemorative issue of Liberty Bell was a real bonus—a fitting recognition of the Twentieth Century's greatest hero's birthday. Thanks to you, George, for creating a physical memorial for the huge admiration and feeling of indebtedness most of us feel toward this one Twentieth Century light beacon of Aryan history. Only you could have done it...you, who has done so much, without any thought of profit or fame/notoriety accruing to you, to keep alive the positive ideas and deeds, past and present, without which we Aryans would have no proud heritage, or hope for the future. Thanks again, George, and best wishes.

Dear Sir: * * * * *

Thank you for promptly filling my recent order. I was happy to once again ascertain that Mr. Covington is still "true, blue" for the cause.I have been reading his book, The March Up Country, and enjoying it thoroughly.

Sincerely, R.B., Kentucky

Dear Mr. Dietz: * * * * *

I have been very busy the past few Months, as the Army has kept me traveling quite a bit. I'd like to thank you for the extra items that you have been sending me, especially for the April 1989 edition of Liberty Bell. As an admirer of the "Hero of the 20th Century," I treasure the only magazine good enough to commemorate his 100th birthday.

Viel Glück!

Capt. A.J., U.S. Army

Dear George:

I would like to offer some explanation on what has happened to the National Front [of Great Britain], since Dr. Oliver mentioned it in the September Liberty Bell. I have been in contact with the NF since it was subject of a 1985 article in Instauration, so I have some knowledge of the NF and its policies.

The NF split in 1986 when a group imagining themselves to be revolutionaries gained control of the party and expelled their opponents. This group, which publishes the sometimes monthly newspaper National Front News and the seldom issued magazine Nationalism Today, is the "Nutty Farce" Dr. Oliver spoke of, better known as the "loony Front." Even Strasser is no longer welcome there; the loony front's heroes are the Ayatollah Khomeini, Louis Farrakhan, and Muammar Gadhafi, whose Green Book is now required reading. Virtually every issue of their paper is filled with denunciations of "racist bigots," while black nationalists are praised to the skies. In fact, all mention of racial differences is officially banned by this group, and no books on race are in their booklist.

As bad as all this sound, the fact is that the vast majority of NF members simply followed the expelled leaders and continued on as the National Front, making the loony Front largely irrelevant. This is the "Flag" NF, known by the name of its monthly newspaper (it can be obtained from P.O. Box 230, Worthing, Sussex BN14 8EG). It also publishes the bi-monthly magazine Vanguard (P.O. Box 634, Hove, Sussex BN3 5FZ); both are quality publications, without a hint of lunacy.

Although Tyndall is more well-known in this country, it would be a mistake to regard the NF as simply a has-been organization. It is still a household name in Britain, and retains a core of experienced leaders and members. It would also be incorrect to view Tyndall's departure from the NF as the cause of its decline; in fact, the party was already splitting after the disastrous 1979 General Election, while Tyndall was still NF Chairman (he left in 1980). No nationalist organization in Britain has had much success in the 80's, although this may be changing; both the NF and BNP [British National Party] report more public interest in their activities than at any time since the 1970's.

My advice to readers who want to know more about the British nationalist scene is simply to write the NF or the BNP (P.O. Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW) directly and find out for themselves. Be sure to include a donation!

Sincerely,
S.J., California

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congolds unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor/publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavour to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of our Western culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change, or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

GREAT FAILURE

The Crusades are, so to speak, the continental divide of European history. They have inspired thousands of novels and romances in all European languages, of which the best known in this country is probably Sir Walter Scott's The Talisman, a typical compound of 15% history and 85% exuberant fancy. They are subject of innumerable general and partial histories, and even a summarily select bibliography would cover several pages. For an orderly account of events, I shall recommend only A History of the Crusades, a composite work edited by Kenneth M. Sutton and others (2 vols., Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1969).

The avowed purpose of the Crusades was the conquest of Palestine, then called the "Holy Land", because it was the scene of the tales assembled in the Christians' holy book. When we consider the individuals who participated in that great outburst of military power, we can only rarely determine in what proportions a given man was actuated by superstition and by our racial desire for adventure, conquest, and glory.

In the Crusades, Europe attained the greatest measure of unity she has had since the fall of the Roman Empire. It is true that there was frequent and sometimes fatal dissention among the leaders, but they quarreled as rival commanders, each jealous of his own prestige and confident of his own military judgement, not as Englishmen or Frenchman or Germans. In feudal society (as so often in the Elizabethan theatre and grand opera) each territorial magnate, a count or duke, was the absolute monarch of his own domain, owing only a tenuous allegiance to a king or emperor, and nationality was, at most, only a vague perception of small ethnic and temperamental differences, not yet systematized politically into distinct nations.

The European unity manifested in the Crusades was, in part, made possible by a common religion, Christianity in the form of Roman Catholicism, still unperturbed by formidable heresy, and, in part, by a common culture and, among the literate, a common language, Latin. To what extent this basis of unity was preserved by Christianity is a question that depends on speculation about what would have happened, had the Germanic peoples been immune to the alien religion. The answer given by Charles Renouvier in his anonymously published Uchronie (Paris, 1876) is only one of scores that could be urged with equal plausibility.

In the Crusades, Europe, for the first time since the decadence of Rome, took the offensive and, in obedience to our racial urge to expand and conquer, the relatively small armies of European warriors vanquished the Moslem's armed hordes, subdued Palestine, made an Aryan the King of Jerusalem, and partitioned the land into feudal domains.

In the Crusades, Europe also manifested, here and there, a sense of racial unity. One of the great leaders of the First Crusade, Godfrey de Bouillon, remarked on the folly of going to the Orient to fight the Saracens while leaving one's wife and heirs exposed to the depredations of another Oriental race, the enemies of God and man, and he was only with difficulty persuaded to depart on the Crusade and leave urgent business unfinished at home. Other noblemen, notably Emicho de Leiningen, Guillaume de Melun et Gâtinais, Clarebold de Vendeuil, Thomas de La Fère, and Drogo de Nesle, attempted hurriedly to clean up some German cities, notably Speyer, Worms, Mainz, and Cologne, on their way to the holy war. Their patriotic efforts were largely frustrated by men of their own race. The Jews scurried to sanctuary in churches and monasteries, where they were protected by venal or superstitious ecclesiastics, including bishops and archbishops, and some went into hiding in the homes of venal or compassionate burghers. Of the Jews who fell into the hands of the Crusaders, many saved their lives by professing an eagerness to be doused in holy water, while an uncertain number of others were slain. Warriors on their way to Palestine could not tarry long in any one place, so their attempted épuration was more symbolic than real, and they had to be content with a relatively small number of executions and with carrying off booty that the usurers and swindlers quickly replaced by fresh depredations.

Yahweh's darlings habitually and perpetually whine about persecution, and since the Crusaders did slay a number of them who failed to scuttle into sanctuary or hiding, they had some basis for fictions about a "holocaust." They wrote narratives about the multitude of sweet innocents who heroically killed themselves and their families to avoid falling into the hands of the vile Christians. These accounts were recently translated, expounded and elaborated by Robert Chazan in European Jews and the First Crusade (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1987), a work that I have not seen, although I have read a good part of the sources in an edition by Neubauer, Stern, and Baer (Berlin, 1892). Chazan evidently accepted the stories as historical chronicles.

Professor Ivan G. Marcus of the Jewish Theological Seminary, in his review of Chazan's book in Speculum, LXIV (1989), pp. 685 ff., notes that the several sources represent revisions by various hands and fall into three families, distinguished by the use of "stench" or "filth" or both to designate Christians. He recognizes that the stories, improved by each reviser, "are highly edited, rhetorically colored, and liturgically motivated literary reworkings of circular letters and oral reports, written for definite purposes."

It is likely that some Jews—how many we shall never know—did follow the example which, according to tradition, was set by the Jews in Masada when that fortress was retaken by the Romans in A.D. 73, and did kill themselves and their families rather than be temporarily polluted by drops of the hated Europeans' holy water.

When the Crusaders reached Palestine, their prowess and valor crushed the Moslem armies and gave them possession of all the territory they coveted, on which they imposed a rule that has left monuments that still excite the awe of tourists, notably the vast ruins of the Krak des Chevaliers. But their conquest of Palestine, as their later conquest of the Byzantine Empire, was in the end ephemeral, and as the Europeans retreated, the land relapsed into the possession of the peoples from whom it had been taken.

The great effort, inspired by Christianity, ended in failure, because the minds of the conquerors had been muddled and perverted by Christianity. Thus was the blood of our race shed in vain, and its heroism aborted, as was often to happen in later centuries.

Another retelling of a part of the history of the Crusades is Edward Burman's The Templars, Knights of God (London, Crucible, 1988), which is the subject of an admirably perspicacious review by the editors of Mankind Quarterly, XXIX (1989), pp. 421 ff.

The Knights Templar fought valiantly and heroically in the Near East, but their order was an attempt to combine two incompatible things: knighthood and piety. They were warriors, but they were also ecclesiastics, and as such they were condemned to celibacy. They could not marry, and since Christianity had inherited and even exacerbated the morbid misogyny of its Jewish authors, they were even forbidden to have intercourse with those nasty and dangerous animals, women. The result, naturally, was that some became homosexuals, with a vice that does not necessarily exclude valor,[1] while others, evading an inhuman law, kept concubines, usually women from the native population, and engendered mongrel bastards.

The Knights Templar, therefore, were a part of the racial ruin wrought by an alien and poisonous religion. They, as the editors remark in the review, were part of the historical record that incites us to "wonder that Europe could for so long sustain the constant genetic loss resultant from centuries of warfare on the one hand, and centuries of monasticism on the other."

The Jewish superstition, furthermore, was what aborted the first great European conquest and made it a war to save a part of the world for Christianity and thus, despite all the heroism of the Aryan warriors, made it in the end as futile and foolish as a war to "save the world for democracy."

One could not improve on the concluding section of the review as a statement of a highly significant historical fact that is usually disregarded by writers who aspire to be popular pseudo-historians:

"Although the Levant was potentially a source of wealth and riches for Europe, being central to trade with the Orient, it could have been held only if the Crusaders had abandoned the Christian ideal, which saw the local Christian population as their brethren, and had instead planned the permanent colonization of the Holy Land by European settlers, bringing European women along with the European knights, and encouraging settlers such as the Templars to breed families of their own by European women, and thus ensure a permanent and plentiful garrison sufficient to resist the Moslem hordes brought against them from all directions. While the Crusaders never degenerated, in the Levant, to the levels of the Byzantines, nevertheless the only offspring they produced there were the offspring of local women who certainly did not share the gene pool of the European knights, and equally certainly were not reared in the tradition that enthused the chivalry of

1. As witness the famous Hieros Lochos of Thebes, if their sexual habits are correctly reported. Philip of Macedon, who was by no means a sentimentalist but had an Aryan's admiration of courage and loyalty, wept when he saw them dead in their ranks on the field of Chaeronea.

Europe. For the vast majority of European knights, participation in the Crusades, and settlement in the Levant, was genetic death. The indigenous Moslems could always raise fresh hosts with which to retake the cities won by the Crusaders at such heavy cost, while any Crusader reaction was possible only when the internecine political and church squabbles in Europe would permit a new generation of young knights to be sent to the Levant." Sent, one could add, to their genetic death and with further depletion of our race's great and irreplaceable heritage.

So you can see that the hallucinatory drug to which our race was made addicted by its eternal enemies and by its own shysters and demented dervishes, was as deadly in 1096-1144 as it is today. One must wonder whether our faltering race, now so terribly depleted of its racial strength, can ever recover from the spiritual kuru or "AIDS" with which it was infected in the fourth and fifth centuries of the present era. Certainly not, so long as it idiotically suppresses the little that is left of the race's ravaged immune system.

UNGRATEFUL HERO

An advertisement sent through the mails by Edgar D. Mitchell begins: "Eighteen years ago I had an extraordinary experience—one that shaped my life. After exploring the dry, airless surface of the moon as an Apollo astronaut, I was returning home to Earth. When I saw our fertile planet, luminous in space, I knew that our Earth and the life it bears were not mere accidents. On a deep level I experienced the intelligent, loving and harmonious nature of the universe."

There is no reason to doubt that story. His experience is readily understood. He must have felt an enormous, overwhelming relief when the rocket which had brought him to the moon began the return journey. Had its apparatus or the center on earth from which it was controlled failed, he and his companions would soon have perished in agony on the dry, airless surface of the earth's satellite or in the eternal night of frigid and airless outer space, and would have thus experienced the "loving nature" of a universe in which life is a mere epiphenomenon of blind, primordial forces—a universe in which the earth and the whole solar system are less than a single snowflake in a blizzard.

A brave man is not one who is so stupid or intoxicated that he cannot perceive imminent peril or estimate his chance of surviving it. A brave man is necessarily afraid, for fear is the instinct that makes all animate creatures, from ants to men, flee from perceived danger. Courage is the self-mastery that enables men to confront perils from which instinct would make them flee. And when they have survived that peril, the release of the tension of self-mastery produces a surge of overwhelming emotion, and a brave man will often find himself trembling in that first moment of assurance that he is safe. Anyone who has ever escaped with his life from a deadly danger knows that; and, in some circumstances, his consciousness, in that instant of almost incredulous perception that he was alive and the danger passed, may have been filled with incohate thought that he later recognized as irrational.

In 1971, when the crew of the fourth lunar mission prepared to return home, Mr. Mitchell could reassure himself with the knowledge that the crews of the first two landings on the moon had returned safely to earth in 1968, but he also knew that in 1969 the crew of the third attempt had barely escaped with their lives when a malfunction occurred, fortunately while there was still time to abort the mission. He must have felt a great relief when the danger that he and his companions might be stranded and left to die miserably on the dead satellite or in sublunar space was passed, and the disk of the planet toward which they were returning at last doubtless seemed gloriously alive and benign, suggesting fantastic notions about a "loving universe." What is odd is that when he was back on the earth, he did not reflect how fantastic and irrational that illusion had been.

It is also odd that he should only then have perceived that our planet and the animalcules that crawl over it were not accidents—unless he was taking 'accident' in the sense given it by ignorant persons, who think the word means 'without cause.' Every accident is an event that was not predicted and anticipated because its causes were not perceived before it occurred. When two automobiles collide, that is an accident because neither driver perceived the velocity of the other and the path it would follow. An observer who saw the two vehicles approach each other, knew the velocity of each, and knew that neither driver was aware of the advance and path of the other, would have seen that the 'accident' would be the inevitable result of causes that were obvious to him.

This planet and the sentient creatures upon it are not accidents, because they were inevitably produced by causes and forces that have operated, and will operate, in the universe forever. It is true that the chemical reaction that produced life occurred on no other known planet (for reasons that are well known), and that the reaction has not yet been successfully reproduced in a laboratory, but that does not alter the fact that life, like the incandescence of the sun, was regularly produced by natural forces that are inherent in the very structure of the universe and work automatically and blindly, without purpose. Life would be an accident if it had been created by some spook, an impossible being imagined as living and capable of volition.

It appears that Mr. Mitchell's failure to understand his own natural reaction in 1971 inspired him to found the Institute of Noëtic[1] Sciences, for which he is now soliciting subscriptions and contributions.

To judge from the prospectus, the Institute will be largely concerned with investigation of the well-attested phenomena of psychosomatic medicine, the interaction of mental states and physiological conditions, which is still only partly understood and sometimes seems paradoxical. I remember the remark made to me by a member of the medical faulty of Johns Hopkins not long after a surgical operation cured the eminent Russian historian, Rostovtzeff, of melancholia (and also cured him of logical thought): "We have now conclusively proved that all maladies of the mind are maladies of the body, and that all maladies of the body are maladies of the mind." That was more than a cynical quip.

Much of the difficulty in understanding the interaction arises from the dichotomy between body and mind that the Christians took from the Orphics, although they, expecting old Jesus to smash up the universe next year, neglected to take over the corollary in Orphic doctrine, metempsychosis.[2]

1. Since it is now fashionable to print the Latin diphthongs ae (=Greek αι) and oe (=Greek οι) as separate letters instead of with the digraphs æ and œ, the diaeresis should be used when the two vowels do not form a diphthong, as in noëtic (Greek νοητικος).

2. The Christians probably imitated some of the mystery cults that had been derived from Orphism or the revived Orphism of the Second Century, rather than the original Orphism of the sixth century B.C., which so strongly influenced Pindar and Plato. Whence the Orphics derived their theogony and theology is not known, and it would be bootless to list the various speculations. I shall not attempt to guess whether the Orphic doctrines were, like those of the Vedas, indigenously Aryan or, as the great authority of Professor Hans Günther maintains, incorporated much that was alien to the Aryan spirit. However that may be, as I have often remarked, the Orphism of Pindar, embellished by the genius of a great poet, makes Christianity seem insufferably tawdry and vulgar.

The psychosomatic problem would be clearer if we eschewed superstitious fancies and followed the sound Aristotelian definition of the soul as simply the vitality that stimulates and coördinates the organs of a living thing. The soul of a plant or tree is its ability to absorb nourishment, grow, and propagate itself. To these faculties, the soul of an animal adds sense-perception, and the soul of the higher animals includes also the orectic power of desires that are not mere appetites and instincts that are more than mere reflexes—a soul which in man is called the subconscious mind (Latin anima), and is usually complemented by the conscious mind (Greek νους, Latin animus, mens) which is capable of reason and of common sense, the faculty that correctly synthesizes the perceptions of the five senses, memory, and reason. When a living organism, whether tree or emperor, dies, its soul vanishes.

Religions which imagine a detachable and perduring soul have given unthinking persons the notion that a human being is like an automobile, which may be abandoned by its driver when he has reached his destination. The analogy is obviously wrong. In an automobile, malfunction of the water pump does not affect the carburator, and vice versa, but a human being is an interaction of many organs, and even ordinary medical practice traces aetiologies such, for example, as this: a disease of the eyes, produced by diabetes, caused by malfunction of the pancreas, which was affected by the liver, which was inflamed by alcholism, which was caused by a desire to escape from reality.

The dianoëtic faculty in the psyche of many human beings makes it a relatively complex force that coördinates the functioning of the various organs and the components of those organs. Much of its activity is still obscure, as witness the phenomenon of drastic physiological changes induced by intense emotions. This phenomenon may occur in the few genuine instances of "faith healing," although most of the instances that are supposedly produced by "faith healers" are induced hallucinations or plain fraud.[3]

Such operations of the psyche call for research, and if Mr. Mitchell's Institute is to sponsor rationally scientific investigation, well and good, but it is hard to see how that could supply enough copy for a (monthly?) magazine, a (monthly?) Bulletin, and additional hoop-la.

As one reads further in the prospectus, one begins to suspect that Mr. Mitchell did not recover from the emotional reaction that supervened when he had some assurance he would return safely to earth, and that when he says the planet and life on it are not "mere accidents," he is thinking of a creation, probably by Brahman, the hero of the most reasonable of the many creation-myths, or the Adibuddha, for whom there is something to be said, or possibly even by less attractive and more bizarre super-spooks.

And the sales-pitch sounds more and more like "New Age" hokum. Members of the Institute will be given an "opportunity to travel to other cultures," thanks, no doubt, to airlines that need passengers, and, what's more, they are going to "support [with cash?] a vision of personal and global transformation." Do you detect a whiff of miasma from the "One World" swamp?

To waste no more of your time, I come at once to the filling in the cream-puff: the Institute will operate on the premise that "unselfish love and service may be our basic nature." Yes, and the moon may be green cheese that Mr. Mitchell overlooked when he was there. And your white cat may be an enchanted princess, just as Mme. la Comtesse d'Aulnoy said. Yea, brother! Praise the Lord and pass the noëtic science.

As I dropped the prospectus on an overflowing waste-basket, I reflected that when Mr. Mitchell was safely back on the earth and his intense emotion of relief at his escape from imminent danger subsided, he would have done better to remember that he owed his journey to the moon and his safe return therefrom to the genius of two German scientists, Dr. Wernher von Braun and Dr. Arthur Rudolph, who gave to the United States the power to explore the solar system, and who were requited as Americans usually requite men to whom they owe great benefits. They were driven from the country to prove again that there is no action so base that Americans will not eagerly perform it to please Yahweh's Yids.

Instead of trying to compete in the "New Age" business, which should be left to third-rate actresses only a little overage, Mr. Mitchell would have done better to show some gratitude to men to whom he owed his life, and to promote a "new world view" based on simple honesty, which is much rarer, as well as more valuable, than stale gabble about "spiritual approaches."

Even if he felt no gratitude to Drs. Von Braun and Rudolph, he should have perceived that "healing the planet" is mere moonshine, unless we have first succeeded in healing our race, now in the terminal stage of psychic sarcoma.

DOING THE LORD'S WORK

Lying for the Lord was the earliest manifestation of Christian piety, and is still one of the most common. One way of lending spurious authenticity to pious inventions is to forge a document in the name of an author who is dead and cannot deny parentage of the bastard thus foisted upon him.

I have just seen a neat and cogent analysis of two godly forgeries which, although trivial in themselves, provide instructive examples of the way in which such work is done and of the difficult and tedious research that is requisite to identify the forgers.

In my article on the Mormons in Liberty Bell, July 1989, I merely alluded to one tradition about the authorship of the Book of Mormon, which, although demonstrably false, arose quite naturally among persons who knew Joseph Smith, if not personally, at least by reputation.

As I said, it is virtually certain that Smith was the author of the revelations about the early history of the Western Hemisphere that he pretended to have miraculously translated from golden plates that he had miraculously found in a cavern. He succeeded in having his religious fiction published as a book in 1830.

Smith was an uneducated and crude young man, who barely escaped prison as a result of the maladroit swindle with which he began his career. He lived in a region of which the population consisted almost entirely of American peasants—small farmers, of whom the most prosperous would have been accounted poor in European society, artisans, and tradesmen. They knew how to read and write, but wrote only occasionally and with conscious effort; they had little taste for reading, except in what was probably the only book they owned, the Bible, and the local newspaper, published by a man but little more literate than they.

Although Smith's tale about the golden plates was probably the best he could have devised, and was confirmed by the attestation of eleven witnesses, all his relatives or cronies, who claimed to have seen and examined the wonderful plates, it required no education to detect the hoax; one had only to refrain from putting his common sense in cold storage.

To his contemporaries who did not succumb to the common yen to believe in supernatural marvels, the production of a large book that was actually printed must have seemed an amazing feat.[1] And it must have seemed to them improbable that an ignorant and rather loutish man could have been the author of it, since they were sure that the authors of published works must be learned and cultivated men.

If you will tolerate a startling analogy—si fas est parva componere magnis—Smith's contemporaries were like the many men who were convinced that the actor, William Shakespeare, was so ignorant that he could not have written the plays that were published under his name, and accordingly exercised their often great ingenuity in trying to identify the real author. I have received no revelation on this subject, but Professor Thomas Baldwin, in his Shakespeare's Small Latine and Lesse Greek (University of Illinois Press, 1944), proved that the education Shakespeare probably received in the school he attended as a lad would have sufficed for authorship of the much admired plays. All men who have accomplished anything noteworthy are autodidacts, and even the most advanced diplomas and degrees merely certify that a man has acquired a little more of basic knowledge which he can use further to educate himself.

Smith certainly spent as much time in a school as did Abraham Lincoln, who, however, was able to acquire for himself what he described as a "sufficient education," and, aided no doubt by natural talent, attained a high degree of rhetorical skill in English composition, especially in the solemn style created by the translators of the King James version of the Christians' story-book.

Lincoln was a highly intelligent man driven by a devouring ambition, and his innate shrewdness, coupled with what he had learned of law, perfected his prose style for the purposes for which he used it. Smith had a good memory, native talent, and a lively imagination; he had assiduously read the great story-book, and to imitate it he needed only the suggestion for a plot, which he derived from a contemporary theory about the origin of the aborigines of the New World.[2]

1. It is hard for us to comprehend the awe with which mere authorship was regarded by such persons. When I was young, I was told by a man who had grown up in a comparable community that when he was ten or so he was taken to see a young woman whom the local newspaper had featured as the authoress of a short story that had been published in one of the innumerable magazines of cheap fiction that then filled the newsstands. He was shocked when the female genius who had attained such glory told him that she earned a living by working in a local emporium.

Smith's contemporaries, as I have explained, were unwilling to credit him with so much ability, and when they heard that a better educated man who had attended Dartmouth College, a certain Solomon Spaulding, whom Smith could have known, had composed an unpublished work of fiction which purported to be a manuscript found in a cavern, which had been written by one of a party of Europeans who reached North America in ancient times and, after exciting adventures, became involved in wars between nations of partly civilized natives, they naturally suspected that Smith had somehow acquired and published Spaulding's work, perhaps with some slight revision to convert fiction into revelation. The suspicion was a natural one; you or I might have entertained it in those circumstances.

A kind and generous reader has sent me photocopies of the pertinent pages in two obscure books, a History of Washington

2. The theory originated in the time of Cromwell, when a Jew claimed he had encountered on the western coast of South America a tribe of Indians who understood and spoke Hebrew. Ironically, corroboration of Smith's story, which the Mormons have long sought in vain, has now become available. According to the Jerusalem Center for Biblical Studies, a professor in the Ohio State University, J. Huston McCullough, discovered that a short inscription in Tennessee is Hebrew and says that a burial ground is "Only for Jews." He also traces some of the religion of the American Indians to Jewish origins. That proves that the Western Hemisphere was discovered by Yahweh's Yids, who were fleeing oppression by the Romans, doubtless in the first century B.C. Had Professor McCullough been alert, he could have supported his trouvaille by citing the small terracotta figurine that American archaeologists privately call "the Sheeny." It shows a black-bearded and obviously Semitic face, which has been compared to that of a brutal Phoenician or Canaanite god, like Yahweh, and if it does not represent that deity, could represent a Jew of predominantly Semitic ancestry. For a good picture of the little head, see Constance Irwin, Fair Gods and Stone Faces (New York, St. Martin's, 1963), p. 176. The figurine, reportedly found by a peon on land in a remote and little inhabited part of Mexico, may well be a forgery, perhaps a jeu d'esprit by the man who brought it to a somewhat credulous American curator, but it would have served as a springboard to the well-known accumulation of evidence that suggests that the civilization of the Incas and Mayas had a transatlantic origin, which a zealous professor could have exploited to the glory of God's People.

County, Pennsylvania, by Alfred Creigh, published in 1871, and a History of Washington County by Earle R. Forrest, published in Chicago in 1926. Creigh is concerned to win for the village of Amity in that county the distinction of being the "Mecca of Mormonism," and is certain that Spaulding was the author of Smith's book; he quotes, probably in good faith, a forged letter that proves his contention—a letter rashly forged in the name of Spaulding's widow, who was still alive at the time and denounced the imposture. Earle R. Forrest, I am glad to say, was a careful and judicious historian, who made his own investigation and objectively reported the results on pages 636-644 of his long book, of which that chapter is only a very minor and incidental part, with a subject on which most writers would have been unwilling to exert themselves and treat it with his exemplary diligence.

Forrest's chapter makes it easy to see how honest witnesses, recalling incidents of earlier years, confused the romance, which they had never read and about which they had heard at the time only some description of its subject, with the new Bible, which they had heard expounded by Mormon zealots, and of which they had perhaps read some parts.[3]

The claim that Spaulding was the author was advanced as an historical certainty by E. D. Howe, a printer and proprietor of a local newspaper in Ohio, who, in a polemic book, Mormonism Unveiled (1834), published under his own name material he bought from a Dr. Hurlburt and for which he reportedly paid five hundred dollars, and which he then shamelessly distorted and revised, believing he could do so with impunity, since he was sure that Spaulding's manuscript would never be found. And so long as the text of Spaulding's "Manuscript Story" remained lost, no one could conclusively refute Howe's dishonest work, which presented as fact a theory that Spaulding's manuscript had been stolen by a printer named Lambdin, who thought of using it for a profitable hoax and gave it to a Sidney Rigdon to be tarted up as a religious document; Rigdon in turn selected Smith as the crook to take public responsibility for the lucrative fraud.

I know nothing of the character of E. D. Howe, the editor and proprietor of the Telegraph, a newspaper in the small town of Plainsville, Ohio. He may have been only a journalist who saw an opportunity to make money by writing and publishing on his own press a sensational book about a topic that was currently exciting a large part of the American populace. But we may conjecture that he may not have been a cynically dishonest man, and explain his conduct by a factor that is allzu menschlich.

It will not matter whether Howe was a Christian or an atheist. If a Christian of the established denominations, he thought the "Mormon conspiracy" a diabolic device for snaring souls. If an atheist, he saw in the Mormon cult just another damned superstition that befogged men's minds, and one that was becoming dangerously popular. In either case, he saw Joseph Smith's revelation was an impudent hoax, and he may well have told himself that there was nothing wrong with twisting evidence and suppressing inconvenient facts to ensure the failure and hasten the disappearance of a fraud. It is not wrong to thwart dishonesty dishonestly!

That brings me, by the bye, to one reason why I am devoting space to this article. The state of mind that I have conjecturally attributed to Howe is by no means unknown among our allies in our struggle to preserve our race.

The late A. K. Chesterton, a great Englishmen in an age of pigmies and wimps, once told me that he had been almost taken in by a quotation confidently cited by an American writer from a book of which no trace could be found in England, where it had purportedly been published. When he confronted the American with that fact, the man admitted that he had invented the spurious quotation and the book from which he pretended to quote it, justifying himself on the grounds that any club is good enough to beat Jews. He evidently could not understand that a club that breaks in one's hands is worse than useless. It is like a shotgun with a clogged barrel: it can harm only the man who uses it. His hoax was doubtless repeated in good faith by persons who had confidence in him and were, sooner or later, acutely embarrassed when they had to admit they had relied on him—some of whom, if they did not give up in disgust, may even have irately thought of requiting his dishonesty dishonestly!

THE SECOND GENERATION

Howe's book was, of course, manna to holy men who were trying to destroy their new and too successful competitor in the salvation-business, but Mormon defenders were able to impugn his veracity by adducing conflicting evidence. Howe's Mormonism Unveiled was soon in need of some corroboration to prop it up, and, naturally, that corroboration was forthcoming, and in a form that convinced even Mormon apologists, who faced the difficult task of explaining it away.

One of Joseph Smith's cronies was Oliver Cowdery, who perjured himself by swearing that he had not only seen and handled the fabulous golden plates, but had also seen and heard the angel who had acted as God the Father's messenger boy. After a while, Smith and Cowdery quarreled—probably over money or women (each accused the other of adultery),— so Cowdery recanted, was excommunicated from the band of Latter Day Saints, and galloped to a Methodist church to honey up to Jesus. And after another while, when he became discontented with his new holiness, he galloped back to his old pals, made confession and atonement, and became a Saint again. Whether he turned another spiritual somersault before ascending to Heaven, is disputed.[4]

There was put into circulation a pamphlet purportedly written by Oliver Cowdery and printed in 1839, entitled Defence in a Rehearsal of My Grounds for Separating Myself from the Latter Day Saints. It was precisely the kind of thing that Cowdery could have written during the period in which he was a Methodist, and it was entirely in character that he, who had seen and heard the angelic messenger boy, should subsequently have been approached by "the Redeemer Himself," who, out of concern for the soul of the great Cowdery, rushed down from Heaven to denounce all the Mormons "for their corruption and blindness in permitting...Joseph Smith...to lead them forth into errors," and to give the pure-souled and innocent Cowdery the command, "withdraw thyself from them." Cowdery moreover gave a nice hint when he said Smith had baptized him in the presence and at the direction of an Angel of God, "whose voice...did most mysteriously resemble the voice of Elder Sidney Rigdon."

Mormon apologists did not doubt the authenticity of that pamphlet, and had to explain it away in terms of the undeniable instability of Cowdery, claiming that he must have repented of his vile pamphlet when he was refurbished as a Saint in 1848.

4. One of Cowdery's fellow perjurers, a man named Harris, who also swore he had handled the hieroglyphic plates and beheld the angelic delivery boy, may hold a record in spiritual acrobatics. He was converted to, and unconverted from, a total of thirteen religious sects. He and Cowdery are examples of the kind of neurotic, unstable, and unreliable accomplices whom poor Smith had to enlist to launch his ambitious fraud.

Their claim was rebutted by a manuscript purporting to be the Confession of a certain Oliver Overstreet, executed in 1857 in the presence of three subscribing witnesses, who further went before the Judge of the Probate Court, E. S. Smith, and swore to the authenticity of the document, as the judge attested by affixing his own official signature.

Overstreet confessed that Mormons had hired him for $500 to impersonate Cowdery and give a speech before a Mormon assembly to the effect that he, Cowdery, repented of his sins and reaffirmed his faith in Smith's divine revelation. The newly found confession seemed valid, because, although no trace could be found of the histrionic Overstreet, the witnesses were substantial citizens, living in 1857; Elias Smith had indeed been Judge of the Probate Court in that year; and the signatures seemed to be genuine. The Mormons, at bay, could only argue plausibly that a scoundrel who would perpetrate a fraud by impersonating another man for $500 could also have been hired to claim that he had done so.

These proofs of the rascality of Joseph Smith obviously strengthened the claim that he had appropriated Spaulding's manuscript to produce a book he could not have composed himself.

The balloon went up in 1884, when Spaulding's manuscript was found in Hawaii (of all places!) and eventually placed in the library of Oberlin College. The text of his "Manuscript Story" was printed by a Mormon publishing house in 1885 and by another in 1910, in an edition which is photographically reproduced in Mr. and Mrs. Tanner's Did Spalding [sic] Write the Book of Mormon (Salt Lake City, Modern Microfilms, 1977).[5]

The manuscript found in Hawaii is obviously Spaulding's original. He made many orthographic and syntactical errors in the heat of composition. He left short lacunae, to be filled in when he thought of the right word or suitable detail, and he canceled and replaced many passages, of which some of the longer show that he was inventing his plot as he wrote, and although the narrative is complete, so far as it goes, it ends with preparations for a battle that would doubtless have been the subject of a following chapter, which remained unwritten, probably because Spaulding lost interest in his novel.

5. Still in print, $4.00 + postage. Modern Microfilms has become the Utah Lighthouse Ministry (P.O. Box 1884, Salt Lake City), thus securing tax-exemption.

In his introduction, Spaulding claims that he will translate from the Latin of a parchment manuscript that he found in an underground vault beneath some ancient ruins on the west bank of the Conneaut River, which flows into Lake Erie near the border between Ohio and Pennsylvania.

The author of the parchment manuscript and narrator of the story is a Roman, Fabius, who claims descent from the great Cunctator. He paid court to the Emperor Constantine when the latter visited Rome, and was charged with a mission to officials in Britain and asked to escort several Roman women to their future homes on that island. On the Atlantic, his ship was driven by a great storm to the shore of North America, where he and his companions had perforce to become a small colony of Whites among the Indians.

Fabius eventually traveled westward into the interior of the continent and reached the Ohians, a nation of civilized people, obviously of partly European origin at some remote time and familiar with some of the techniques of Roman agriculture and manufactures. He returned to his companions in exile, having been given domesticated mammoths with their mahouts to bring the luggage from their old colony, and all the Romans were welcomed into the stable and well-governed society of the Ohian subjects of the Emperor of Sciota.

The narrative then deals principally with the reign of Rambock, Emperor of Sciota, whose eldest daughter, "the fair Lamessa," is wooed by "the valiant Elseon," son of Hamboon, Emperor of Kentuck, the other great power on the continent. Both emperors have subordinate monarchs, such as Ulipoon, King of Michegan, and Numapon, King of Colorangus.

A war between the great powers provides occasion for doughty deeds, chivalrous exploits, and gallantry toward fair women.

The first part of the tale, which leaves the Romans stranded in North America, is a fairly vivid adventure; the description of the customs and beliefs of the Ohians resembles the didactic essays, thinly disguised as travels to new-found lands, that were so common in the Eighteenth Century; but when we reach the star-crossed amours of the great Hamboon's son and the beauteous Lamessa, the author begins gently to parody Victorian romances, and it is obvious that he is greatly enjoying himself as he writes.

If Spaulding had completed his story[6] and published it, he would probably be remembered today in the larger histories of English literature in the United States. His work clearly bears no similarity to Smith's Book of Mormon, except that both purport to be translations of long-buried manuscripts dealing with the ancient history of the Western Hemisphere. Christianity and Jews have no part in Spaulding's whimsical tale, written in a style far removed from Smith's Biblical pastiche.

When Howe published his Mormonism Unveiled, he was uneasily aware that there was then living at least one man, Dr. Hurlburt, who had recently read Spaulding's manuscript, might have made extensive notes, and could, if so inclined, expose Howe's chicanery. Howe accordingly provided himself with an escape hatch, suggesting that Spaulding might have written two stories.

When the Mormons' enemies were confounded by the discovery and publication of "The Manuscript Story," they promptly claimed that Spaulding had rewritten his story to make Jews the discoverers and colonizers of the Western Hemisphere and had written in a Biblical style the narrative that was the substance of the Book of Mormon. They even produced witnesses to prove that there was such a second version, distinctively entitled "The Manuscript Found."

That claim is a patent absurdity. Spaulding was an intelligent man, educated at Dartmouth College, then a respected academic institution, and not the rats' nest it has now become; he was evidently ordained, as the college's graduates commonly were at that time, and entitled to call himself 'Reverend.'

Fortunately, Spaulding's manuscript, when found in Hawaii, was accompanied by a page from a holographic letter in which Spaulding outlined his attitude toward religion. He naturally saw the absurdity of the Christian myths, perceived that numerous passages in the holy book flatly contradict others, and was disgusted that "a barbarous and cruel tyrant" was worshiped as the "Supreme Being." He frankly wrote, "I disavow any belief in the divinity of the Bible & consider it a mere human production

6. He would have had either to end his tale tragically, describing the catastrophic collapse of the Ohian civilization, or to leave his narrator in circumstances, perhaps personally happy, but forboding what the future will bring to a corrupted culture, and therefore resolving to write his historical record for the instruction of the next band of Europeans to reach North America.

designed to enrich and aggrandize its authors & to enable them to manage the multitude." He thought, however, that despite its falsity, Christianity promulgated ethics that were beneficial to the ignorant masses, and therefore he would "make no exertions to dissipate their happy delusions."

Obviously, Spaulding would never have written anything that even remotely resembled Smith's fiction or presented favorably the race that had created a "barbarous and cruel tyrant" in its own image.

This makes it likely that the two documents that supported Howe's thesis, the first by providing confirmation that Smith and Rigdon had conspired to put over a religious hoax, and the second by establishing the authenticity of the first, were forgeries, but probability is not proof.

It may seem at first sight a total waste of time to consider the origins of two utterly worthless documents. If Cowdery's statement is not a forgery, it was the work of a man who claimed he had had an interview with "the Redeemer himself, clothed in glory," who had flown down from the clouds out of a peculiar love for the aforesaid Cowdery, whose statement thus proves that he was either an egregiously audacious liar or subject to fits of insanity. That, however, is no news, for we know that Joseph Smith was a scoundrel, whence it follows that, despite the squawking of "Liberal intellectuals" about "guilt by association," it is only a reasonable and almost necessary inference that Smith's collaborators were also scoundrels. And that is interesting to us only because of the seeming paradox that by his rascality Smith established the most solidly based and wholesomely American church in this country.

On second thoughts, however, we see that the testimonies attributed to Cowdery and Overstreet are small but typical specimens of religious documents, just as Smith's career is an object lesson that shows what talents and procedures are necessary to establish an evangelical religion at any time in the world's history.

THE PROOF

The document bearing Cowdery's name was accepted as genuine by even the staunchest Mormon apologists, and was therefore accepted by Jerald and Sandra Tanner, who seem to have dedicated themselves to destruction of the church from which they are apostates. They soon had misgivings, however, for they have a keen critical intelligence.[7] The results of their investigation are set forth in the October issue of their monthly publication, the Salt Lake City Messenger.

They found that Cowdery's Defence had been totally unknown before it was published in 1906 in Grayson, Kentucky, by the Reverend R. B. Neal, who claimed to be reprinting a pamphlet originally published by Cowdery himself in a booklet of which no one has ever seen a copy and which, Neal said, had been printed in 1839 by a firm of printers in Norton, Ohio—printers of whom no trace could be found in the records of that town. Neal was a holy man with a printing press, an instrument as indispensable to holiness-hucksters at that time as is television today. He had published a stream of booklets attacking the Mormons, in some of which he anticipated arguments that appear in the statement he attributed to Cowdery.

The Tanners' systematic consultation of all the publications and other records of the almost innumerable opponents of the Mormon Church showed that no one of them had even heard of Cowdery's Defence before 1906, and that, given Cowdery's publicity-seeking activities, was simply inconceivable. Among those who knew nothing of such a pamphlet was a man named David Whitmer, who had been Cowdery's friend and close associate in and out of the Mormon Church, and who published in 1887 a vehement attack on it, in which he would certainly have appealed to Cowdery's authority and precedent, had Cowdery published the pamphlet in 1839. On the contrary, some of Whitmer's statements were paraphrased or imitated in the text attributed to Cowdery that Neal published in 1906. That publication, furthermore, almost ostentatiously used phrases that had appeared in genuine letters and other writings of Cowdery that had been published before 1906, but echoed nothing from letters that had remained unpublished. It also incorporated material from various sources that had become available after 1839 and before 1906.

7. It is true that in their writings, especially since they became a Ministry, they express agreement with the current propaganda of the major Protestant denominations, but their assiduous research and their publication of scores of books and booklets at prices that can scarcely cover the cost of printing must require ample and continuous financial support. The late George Lincoln Rockwell, founder of the National Socialist movement in the United States, was wont to say that the first duty of a military commander is to ensure the supply of ammunition to his men, and the first duty of a social reformer is to obtain money to finance the cause to which he has dedicated himself and his followers. If the commander can obtain the needed ammunition only by professing to believe in goblins and pixies, it is clearly his duty to do so. (Since I have mentioned Rockwell, I should perhaps add that if he tried to apply his maxim, he lacked the art of dissimulation, for his reform movement was always penurious. His friends told me that he even let his teeth decay so that he would not give to a dentist money he could devote to the ideals he expounded in This Time, the World, often with indiscreet candor.)

These data enforce the incontrovertible conclusion that the Defence attributed to Cowdery and first published by Neal in 1906 is a forgery. The Tanners consider it possible that Neal was deceived by a clever and elaborate hoax, but that is most improbable, and Occam's razor as well as what we know about the habits of holy men make it certain, for all practical purposes, that Neal was a shameless liar and either forged the document himself or knowingly endorsed and published another's forgery. He was probably also the author of a supplemental deception that made the librarian of Yale University believe that he was being given a copy of the "original printing" of 1839.

To be sure, Neal may have told himself that his impudent dishonesty was godly work, since it served to discredit a competitor in the salvation-business, and it is conceivable that he actually believed that his fraud on the public would save some ghosts from perpetual torment in the eternal holocaust that his god's rival operated somewhere under the earth.

The Confession of the fictitious Oliver Overstreet is a manuscript, and since it is in the handwriting of an unidentified scrivener, it is not precisely datable and could have been written on the date it bears, 7 April 1857. Internal evidence, in the form of reliance on or echoes of published works, indicates only that it must have been concocted after 1873, and probably after 1883. It seems not to have been known to anyone before the end of the century.

The Tanners' research, however, discovered the very document that the forger used as a model and from which he derived the names of the witnesses whose signatures he forged. It is a deed of personal property actually executed on 2 April 1857, duly witnessed, and with the grantor's signature verified under oath by the Judge of the Probate Court, E. Smith, whose attestation the forger copied with only such modifications as were necessary to fit his forgery.

When the Tanners tried to identify the forger, suspicion necessarily fell upon the Reverend Professor William H. Whitsitt (1841-1911), who had been Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, became President of that institution, and after he was forced to resign in 1899, became Professor of Philosophy [!] in Richmond College in Virginia.

That Man of God was a polemic propugnator of the notion that Spaulding was the author of Smith's book, and he even claimed to know what parts of Spaulding's story Sidney Rigdon had rewritten or supplemented. He richly elaborated Howe's theory of a conspiracy between Smith and Rigdon, with the latter providing most of the intelligence and skill. In articles and booklets published before 1873, he anticipated much that was going to be included in the forged Confession, and also, incidentally, some items in the forgery that was going to be attributed to Cowdery. The curious anticipation of forgeries not yet perpetrated is even more marked in a book, Sidney Rigdon, the Real Founder of Mormonism, which he cited as complete in 1871, but for which he was unable to find a publisher, probably because the row in the Theological Seminary that eventually forced his resignation had compromised his prestige in the Jesus-business. His manuscript of 1,306 pages is now in the Congressional Library; the Tanners had access to photocopies of five hundred of those pages, sufficient for their purpose, although study of the complete manuscript might have made their research even more conclusive.

In his unpublished book, the Reverend Professor, being a man of some education, admits that early Christianity "abounds with instances of pious fraud," scrupulously rejects a letter clumsily forged in the name of Spaulding's widow, which she herself had denounced, and even provides an apology for the villain of his narrative, Rigdon, who, he suggests, may have been "an honest [sic!] fanatic." Whitsitt elaborates as virtually certain a theory that the witnesses to the Book of Mormon and other important acolytes of Joseph Smith were deceived by a series of impersonations of angels et al. carried out by Rigdon, and by plates manufactured to resemble gold in a dim light. He thus exonerates Cowdery, Harris, and the other witnesses from the natural inference that they were simply liars.

It is certain, however, that Whitsitt was somehow involved in the forgeries, and since the two are interdependent and draw upon a common store of supposed facts, the Tanners believe both to have been forged by one man, either Neal or Whitsitt or an improbably hypothetical third party who deceived the two holy men.

In my opinion, their conclusion that there was only one forger is unnecessary. As everyone knows (or should know), thirteen of the letters attributed to Paul in the Christians' story-book were forged by at least four different persons (as shown by stylistic tests)[8] who were in general agreement about the line to be taken in such letters. (No doubt, the letters attributed to Paul in the gospels of other Christian sects, notably the Marcionists, were also forgeries, but with a different purpose, just as the fourteenth letter (ad Hebraeos) in the "New Testament" was concocted by a scribbler who had his own doctrinal axe to grind. The authors of the thirteen letters are sometimes called a committee because they were in almost complete agreement about what it was expedient to tell the customers, but they need not have conspired together or even have known each other. Each could have exercised his cleverness in making his own contribution to the doctrine he thought it best to promulgate, and it is quite likely that other pious individuals forged comparable letters that the Fathers of the Church, confronted by an embarras de richesse, did not include in their holy anthology when they put it together.

It therefore appears to me possible and even likely that the forgeries in the name of the deceased Cowdery and the fictitious Overstreet, although clearly interrelated and coming from the same doctrinal mill, were the pious work of two men, probably Neal and Whitsitt, who may never have met in person, each independently wishing to make his own fraudulent (and clever) contribution to the common cause.

PRECEDENTS

Christianity is a vast accumulation of forgeries and hoaxes, and everyone interested in the genesis of religions should read the admirable study by Jospeh Wheless, Forgery in Christianity (New York, Knopf, 1930), which some society of crusading atheists should by all means reprint and circulate. It is excellently written and highly entertaining as well as cogent.

It is obvious, of course, that the Tanners' neat demonstration that the two anti-Mormon documents are forgeries, and their identification of the circumstances in which the forgeries were perpetrated and of the probable forgers, was made possible by the vast mass of governmental records, archives, privately preserved letters, and libraries of preserved pamphlets, newspapers, periodicals, and books, that has been accumulating in the United States since the Eighteenth Century. For the centuries of early Christianity, such resources, needless to say, are not available because they have not survived to our time.

8. See the Encyclopaedia Biblica, American reprint, New York, Macmillan, 1914 (= London, Black, 1899), Vol. III, pp. 3625 f. The encyclopaedia tries to save face for its Christian fellows by asserting that the letters, although forged, are chock full of holiness.

Thus, although forgeries, frauds, and hoaxes are readily identifiable as such by internal and external evidence, it is seldom possible to identify the perpetrators.

In the strict legal sense of the word, a forgery must be a document falsely attributed by its author to a specific and identifiable individual. In this limited sense of the word, the letters that purport to have been written by Paul are forgeries, while the four "synoptic" gospels are not.

This is true, although the identity of Paul is uncertain, because the letters purport to have been written by the Jew, whoever he was, who seems to have been the first to perceive what profit to himself and benefit to his race could accrue from peddling to the goyim a diluted version of Jewish Christianity, particularly exempting male converts from undergoing a barbaric sexual mutilation that even the most ignorant proletarian, if a man, would indignantly reject.

The identity of that Jew is uncertain. He is called Paul in the "New Testament," which also gives his native Jewish name, Saul, which is supposed to mean "requested" (i.e., the son whom his father asked Yahweh to provide), and has no relation to Paul, except the suspicious one of rhyme. Many acute scholars believe that this Paul was the same person as Simon[9] Magus, who appears in some tales told by the early Fathers of the

9. The name Simon in the "New Testament" is properly a Greek epithet and nickname that means "snub-nosed," "monkey-face," and hence, on occasion, "nigger," but it is assumed to stand for the Semitic name Shimeon, which seems originally to have meant "little hyena," but, with a little tampering with vowels, was cleaned up to mean "hearkening" (i.e., obedient). The correspondence of the two names is quite likely, because, as I have often remarked, the Greek alphabet early lost the letter that could have approximated the sound of Semitic Š, which thus had to be represented by sigma, as in the Greek (and hence Latin and English) spelling of the name of Jesus.

Church,[10] but is best known from the references to him in the Clementine Recognitiones, the Clementine Homiliae, and early Christians' books of Acta, which the one included in the "New Testament" was probably designed to refute. The early Christians naturally hated their fellow Jew, who was peddling to goyim the cult of their defunct Jesus, who was a christ and was going soon to return with angelic reinforcements to slaughter the hated Greeks and Romans. As holy men naturally do, they probably invented the defamatory stories about his spectacular prowess in magic and eventual defeat at the word of Jewish True Believers. This identification is quite plausible and even probable, but obviously cannot be proved.[11]

The name of the Jew to whom the famous letters were attributed raises problems. His Jewish name is given as Saul, but without the customary patronymic that the Jews used to distinguish homonymous individuals, e.g., Jesus ben Sirach, Jesus ben Ananias, etc.[12] In the "New Testament" he is given the Roman name Paulus, but if he was a Roman citizen, it is odd that his legal name is never stated,[13] and one naturally suspects some sort of evasion or deceit.

10. One of these tales is told by Justin Martyr, whom we catch in the act of falsifying a Roman inscription so that he could use a dedication to Semo Sancus as proof that Simon Magus had come to Rome and converted lots of Romans to his damnable religion by performing spectacular miracles.

11. Christian holy men have, of course, labored mightily to refute the embarrassing identification. It would take you six months to read all the tripe that has been written on that one marginal subject.

12. As is well known, the Jews had no gentile names until the cruel Europeans persecuted them and forced them to form families, so that there would be some tag to identify the slippery eels in official records.

13. The possibilities are:
(1) If he obtained Roman citizenship by emancipation, his name would be his former master's praenomen and nomen, plus the name by which he had been known in the household while he was a slave; e.g., M. Aurelius M.l. Eros or possibly M. Aurelius M.l. Paulus.
(2) If he was given citizenship as a reward for meritorious service by a Roman commander holding the proconsular imperium, his name would be that commander's plus a Latin translation of his native name, e.g., Cn. Pompeius Optatus (= Saul).
(3) If he was the son of a man who had obtained citizenship in either way, 'Paulus' could be a cognomen, e.g., M. Aurelius M.f. Paulus.

But despite these uncertainties, the letters 'of Paul' are forgeries because they are attributed to a specific individual, whatever his correct name may have been.

The "synoptic gospels," on the other hand, do not meet the strict criterion for forgery. The writers are anonymous. Each gospel is stated in its title to be a pleasing message (ευαγγελιον) κατα ("according to," "as told by") Matthew etc. The assumption that the man who wrote up the story is the man whom he named as authority for the tale is gratuitous. It is much more likely that the anonymous author of the Greek text of each gospel edited and revised an earlier version, perhaps translating from Jewish Aramaic or some other Jewish dialect, if that had not already been done, and identified his text as one that went back to the tale as told by the person whose name is the object of κατα, although he may have conflated it with choice bits from other accounts. The anonymous author's text was, of course, further edited before the oldest text that has come down to us was copied, and, as we know, further editing and revision went before the gospel was included in the "New Testament" anthology and even later. (See the critical apparatus of any respectable edition of the Greek text.)

Furthermore, the four persons who are named as having told the tales are virtually anonymous. Two bear Jewish names without patronymics; one is given a Roman praenomen but his full name is not stated; and one is designated only by a geographical term. If you publish four documents and attribute them respectively to Hymie, Bob, a Texan, and Izzy, without further identification, they will not be forgeries in the legal sense of that word, because the tales are not attributed to specific individuals. 'Bob' may be anyone of the hundreds of thousands of men who were given some form of that name; the Texan may be any resident or former resident of that populous state; and the United States has been invaded and occupied by millions of Yahweh's predatory pets.

Forgery, moreover, must be carefully distinguished from falsity. A document may be a forgery because it is attributed to a man who did not write it, but be absolutely veracious in what it says. If someone knows the facts about the assassination of Jackanapes Kennedy and choses to publish them under the name of Earl Warren, his work will be a forgery, but also an accurate report of what happened. If the famous Protocols are a forgery in the sense that the Elders of Zion did not write them, they are nevertheless a perfectly accurate statement of Jewish methods and intentions, verified, as Henry Ford observed, by everything the Sheenies have done and are doing to us and the whole world.

(4) Given the form that appears in the "New Testament," it is a little more likely that 'Paulus' ("Shorty") was a sobriquet given him by his acquaintance, which would be ignored in official records but would probably be indicated on an epitaph, e.g., M. Aurelius Eros qui et ("also known as") Paulus.

On the other hand, a genuine document, written by the man who signs it, may be only a tissue of preposterous lies, such as are commonly told by "survivors" of the fictitious "Holocaust."

The four gospels may accurately report folk-tales embroidered by imagination, and the real cause for wonder is not their problematical and unidentifiable authors or purported authors, but the amazing fact that such inherently absurd tales could ever have imposed on persons who had even a modicum of common sense.

Joseph Smith's hoax, inherently implausible and even absurd, launched by a poor and ignorant man under adverse circumstances, was so successful because he appealed to minds that had already been made weak and childish by unthinking faith and emotional belief in equally implausible and preposterous tales.

One of the many unmistakable proofs that the gospels were, at best, based on folk-tales told by simple-minded peasants is the petty and utterly mesquine nature of the miracles supposedly performed by their protagonist—childishly little miracles performed almost furtively in remote places and witnessed by no reponsible and intelligent men, but only by his uneducated and illiterate followers and, perhaps, a few proletarians no better than they.

He is said to have walked on water—in the middle of an inland sea, on a dark night, and in the company of a few ignorant and illiterate fishermen, witnesses who could not have been found when the tale was told. He walked on water presumably to show off his divine power and thus persuade his contemporaries to save their souls by believing what he told them. Only the veriest dullard will not have reflected that if Jesus had that hydrobatic power and such was his purpose, he should have taken a stroll over the water of the harbor of a populous maritime city in broad daylight and preferably on a day of festival when the city would be crowded with persons at leisure to observe him. He could even have sauntered out on the Mediterranean for a mile or two, just to show off some more after he had attracted attention by walking out to ships. Had he done that, he would have saved so many souls that a whole regiment of baptizers would have had to work day and night to process the throngs of True Believers.

Petty, furtive, and almost secret miracles are obviously false because they obviously do not serve the purpose for which they are said to have been performed. Even the Fathers of the Church saw that, so a few hundred years later, when they could be sure no one would remember what hadn't happened, they embellished the tales with conspicuous miracles, such as resurrection of the dead from opened graves, which would have excited the whole world and changed its cultural history, had thousands of corpses actually cavorted around a town.

To denounce patent forgeries and to note the falsity of patently preposterous tales is a waste of time, but what must concern all of us is a problem we must anxiously try to solve: what psychological defect enables not only ignorant masses, but some otherwise intelligent men, to say credo quia absurdum, and be actuated by a fanatical belief in what is demonstrably spurious—physically impossible or wildly improbable?

Make no mistake: such irrationality is being systematically excited and fostered by our enemies, who are waging a psychological war to the death against us. How can we defend ourselves against befuddled and maddened masses of our own people? That is a crucial question today. And it is why I have devoted these pages of Liberty Bell to a few possibly significant or suggestive examples of forgery and faith. □

AN ACCOUNT OF CHRISTIAN AND BIBLICAL ORIGINS.

Nicholas Carter feels that it is time for us to sit down and do what many Christians rarely do: Study the Holy Bible. In doing so, we may discover whether or not the Bible is indeed "Holy" and the "Word of God." In strict biblical order, the author methodically, and scathingly, examines the various claims made in the "Holy Book" and shows how many of them bear no relationship to reality whatsoever. THE LIBERTY BELL AS A REVISIONIST PERIODICAL

By
Charles E. Weber

When we survey the publications throughout the world which are devoted in whole or in part to the revision of history to bring it into line with what actually happened during the Second World War, we find that some of the most significant of them are published outside of Europe. Germany, which is a victim of a continuing flood of hostile propaganda, would have the most to gain from an objective, revised history of the Second World War freed from the persistent legacy of wartime propaganda. In Germany itself, however, we have the anomalous situation in which governments supposedly representing Germans are the most vigorous suppressors of efforts to arrive at a balanced history of the war, especially with regard to the Jewish populations under German control ("Holocaust Revisionism"). The reasons for this anomaly are complex. We discussed them in connection with the Philipp Jenninger speech of November 1988 in Bulletin 33. Prof. Walter Bodenstein also discussed them in his essay in Bulletin 41. Nevertheless there are some notable periodicals appearing in the German-speaking countries that are largely devoted to revisionist historiography, such Recht und Wahrheit (Postfach 1310, D-8730 Bad Kissingen, West Germany) and Sieg (Postfach 5, A-6911 Lochau, Austria). Historische Tatsachen appears on a sporadic basis and now includes 36 issues (Hochstrasse 6, D-4973 Vlotho/Weser, West Germany).

In the United States The Journal of Historical Review appears on a quarterly basis. We reviewed the first seven years (1980-1987) of its contents in Bulletin 17. Of the monthly periodicals appearing in the United States, the most notable one in regard to its content of revisionist history is the Liberty Bell, published by George Dietz (P.O. Box 21, Reedy WV 25270).

THE ANTI-HUMANS

by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb. $7.00 + $1.50 for postage & handling) describes what was done to the young men whom Corneliu Z. Codreanu, the founder of the Legionary Movement in Romania, inspired, when seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented Pavlovian experiment on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. Reading it will be an emotional experience you will not forget. "A sequel to Orwell's 1984" —R.S.H. "A searing exposé of Red bestiality!" —Dr. A.J. App). Order #01013. Apocalypse Soon

by
Nicholas Carter

Imagine spending $100 million dollars for a football team (the Dallas Cowboys)! Imagine tens of millions of Americans spending billions of dollars per year on college and professional sports that have been corrupted by greed, sky-high salaries and falsified academic records...on the uncivilized garbage known as Rock/Pop music...and on movies produced by a small group of elitists in Hollywood, who despise America in general, and white Gentile Americans in particular (in just 122 days, the flic about the comic book freak, "Batman," collected nearly one-quarter of a billion dollars in domestic box-office earnings)!

Imagine Tokyo money manipulators trading American currency at a rate of $200 billion a day! Imagine a national debt tripling from $645 billion late in the Carter years to nearly $1.75 trillion in 1985...$25 billion per year in federal spending going to giant farming corporations known as agribusinesses that do not really need it...and billions of hard-earned taxpayers money in foreign aid going to the Mideast, South America, Black Africa, Israel, and elsewhere, where much of it is used to maintain totalitarian systems, with the rest of it winding up in the pockets of local politicians!

Imagine spending $300 billion a year to provide a nuclear umbrella for Japan, nearly $800 billion a year to defend all of Western Europe, and countless billions more to support troops and military bases in dozens of additional countries around the world, while spending virtually nothing to defend the borders of the United States!

I could go on; but these examples, indicating as they do, individual and governmental irresponsibility on an obscenely humongous scale, should suffice to make the point that America's days of wine and roses may very well be numbered because of our "live for the moment" excesses.

The degree to which a democratic system is viable is directly proportional to the number of people within that system who are dedicated to living responsible lives—not only with regard to educational, occupational and general living habits, but to the extent of exercising accountability across the board to even the smallest area of liability such as closing water taps and avoiding littering. Liberals and professional Jews love to proclaim that American democracy—a constitutionally limited republic, actually—works but they don't know why. To admit that they know why democracy works would mean having to admit that the concept has never worked for any sustained period of time in any society on earth except those belonging to the Western world—nations, in other words, which have been, or are, mostly White or White controlled. The American politico-economic system has survived for 200 years precisely because the "civilizing process"—the increase of individual responsibility—has developed to the greatest degree in Western societies. Most White Americans have dedicated their lives to living responsibly—studying, learning, working hard, building homes, raising families, creating, inventing, paying taxes—and achieving what came to be known as the "American Dream" because of their very material and moral accomplishments.

Since World War II, however, individual and governmental irresponsibility has increased in direct proportion to the darkening of the nation due the high birthrate on the part of Black Americans and the influx of millions of non-White aliens and refugees into the country, and an ever-increasing political and economic involvement on an international scale.

What is happening to the American Dream? Is it becoming more and more nightmarish and less and less visionary? Not according to some contemporary "futurists" who tell us that we're heading for a rosy 21st century. We will be living better in almost every way by 2000, they assure us. The United States will be wealthier and more tranquil as a nation, more peaceful and less contentious largely because technology will have made it a more affluent and egalitarian society, a happier place because it will finally have adopted national solutions to such problems as drug abuse and failing educational standards by the turn of the century. (Say what!?!)

These are remarkably confident predictions considering the fact that the future is difficult to predict. It isn't easy to separate what may be relatively true from what may be palpably false when all one has to work with are lies, damn lies and statistics. Even "social scientists," armed with their probability theories, statistical analyses, and meta-theoretic strategies for decision under uncertainty, invariably receive more "F's" that "A's" when it comes to prophetology. Human ingenuity is so remarkable, innovative, and randomly deterministic, it's virtually impossible to know whether the ridiculous or the sublime will prevail to one degree or another at any given time. Or so it seems.

On the other hand, consider the down-to-earth parlance of a street philosopher: "It ain't no big deal. You gots to know where you comin' from to know where you at; and you gots to know where you at to know where you goin'." (Works for me!)

First, education. It appears that by 2010 there won't be many jobs left that don't require skill in using powerful computers and telecommunications systems. The class of 2000 will be exposed to more information in one year than their grandparents encountered in their entire lives. By the time today's kindergarteners will graduate from high school, the amount of knowledge in the world will have doubled four times. That's how fast the world is moving—much faster than most American students seem to be capable of moving.

Conservatively, it is estimated that one million high-school students now drop out each year—about 30 percent of the total, on average, throughout the United States. In some school districts, the dropout rate, mostly non-Whites, exceeds 50 percent. By the time the class of 2000 graduates from high-school, minorities will dominate the school population in 53 major American cities. Minority groups, we are frequently reminded, traditionally require more individual attention from teachers if they are to succeed in school. Ergo, many more teachers will be needed in the near future; but where are they going to come from? Only eight percent of college freshmen now say they are interested in joining the ill-paid, low-prestige field of teaching. Much more money will be needed if an enormous and capable teaching staff is ever to be recruited; but where will the money come from? And what can be done about the non-White dropout rate that will proportionally increase as the non-White student population increases?

In the face of this unflattering portrait of modern education, we are expected to believe that in just one decade there will be a lower dropout rate, an abundance of wise, new teachers, lower rates of violence and drug use, and fewer disruptive rampages in the classrooms. What we really face in the future because of our increasingly minorityized school system is chronic unemployment on a scale unthought of in this country, and a much lower standard of living across the board.

As a monied class, America has grown—statistically speaking, that is. Since 1979, average household income ($34,017 in 1988) has risen about ten percent after adjusting for inflation. The gain since 1967 is roughly one-third.. (Yawnnn...) Are all the boats being lifted by this rising tide of prosperity? Not exactly. As usual, the gap between the well-off (mostly white Gentiles and Jews) and the non-well-off (mostly non-Whites) continues to grow. The proportion of households headed by a woman, usually with children, has grown; the influx of illegals and other immigrants continues to permanently enlarge the poverty pool; and the earnings of high-school graduates, reflecting perhaps a demand for higher skills, are dropping compared to college graduates of the same age.

Meanwhile, the homeless have increased in America—some say by the millions. Because of poverty and unemployment? Not according to some statisticians, who tell us that poverty and unemployment are declining. One social scientist claims that big city rent control is the culprit. Rent control makes it unprofitable for private developers to build new apartments for the poor and the middle class, and for building owners to maintain existing ones. Regardless of the cause(s), we can probably look forward to one hell of a lot more homeless people in the future.

What will the official spending patterns be by 2025? Forecasts tell us that one-third of the budget will go to people over the age of 65, with one-fifth going to defense. These figures point directly to the phenomenon known as the graying of America: The numbers of the elderly from age 65 and up are rapidly increasing. As surprising as it may seem, the 70-and-over age group is among the fastest growing segment of the U.S. population. We are living longer. By 2000 there will be more than 100,000 Americans over the age of 100. (Irreverent question: How many of them will be smokers, drinkers and drug users?)

Since Caucasians are still by far the largest racial group in the country, what the rapidly increasing graying of America means, horror of horrors, is that more and more non-White workers will be laboring to support more and more elderly White people well into the future. Already, the liberal-minority coalition is whining about the "unfairness" of today's retired people (mostly White) receiving Social Security benefits that are two to five times what they and their employers contributed in payroll taxes, plus interest earned.

Not factored into this equation is the additional value of citizens who have distinguished their long lives by living responsibly. Does the fact that they avoided crime, ignorance, unfairness, indecency and laziness while they supported the country with their labors and taxes lose all value to the State when they can no longer work and pay taxes? The answer, it seems, is YES—when the equation involves Caucasians vs. non-Whites. (A word of warning to the liberal-minority coalition: Elderly Jews will not sit still for an assault of this nature.)

On the Social Security field of battle, it's impossible to know what to believe because of the conflicting views held by optimists on the one hand who tell us that the fund will be solvent well into the next century, and by pessimists on the other who declare that by 2005 the fund will be running a deficit of $440 billion. Of one thing we can be sure: A war between racial generations—the White elderly vs. the non-White work force—is in our future.

Are we going to win the drug war? Not freaking likely, considering the fact that drugs like "crack" and "speed" (methamphetamines), which can be easily synthesized from readily available chemicals, are gaining popularity. The highly pure crystal methamphetamine known as "ice"—a potent, smokable form of the drug—is now the "high" of choice in East Asia. Known also as "meth," the drug has been widely used in America in its powdered form, usually taken by injection, snorted or ingested. But now a pure grade of crystal meth is being cooked in laboratories in South Korea and other parts of Asia and smuggled into Hawaii where it's rapidly spreading and to the U.S. mainland where it's also catching on.

The appeal of ice is insidious. It provides smokers with a more intense and longer period of euphoria—from 4 to 12 hours compared to about 20 minutes for crack. Little wonder that it's becoming popular. As if ice isn't bad enough in its pure crystal form, a smokable mixture of speed and crack called "croak" has been spreading and could rival cocaine as the most widely used illegal drug in the future. (Interesting name, "croak"—a crude euphemism for death. "Poor Ed. He croaked.")

Unfortunately—and typically—so many notions for solving the drug problem have been run up the flagpole, nobody knows whether to salute or go blind. A thousand years from now, we'll still be arguing about this dilemma—if there's anybody left. Indeed, there's so much anti-drug confusion, it's not surprising that objective studies of the problem are a low priority in Washington. The political mind can take only so much confusion before it self-destructs, I suppose.

The United States now has more diagnosed cases of AIDS than any other nation in the world. Perhaps the disease will be under control by the turn of the century. But the need to care for millions of AIDS patients by that time will cost each taxpayer hundreds of dollars. Before the disease is controlled, though, it's estimated that the deadly love-virus will kill at least 25 times as many Americans as died in the Viet Nam war.

Because the AIDS virus is one of many that mutate rapidly, it theoretically could exchange genes with other mutable viruses. Should this unique condition occur within the tissues of an AIDS patient who contracts the flu, for example, the jostling of the AIDS and flu viruses together would result in the passage of a few critical genes or gene sequences from one pathogen to the other. The resulting Frankenstein would be an AIDS virus that could move, flu-like, from one victim to the next—in a sneeze. (Thanks a lot, Mother Nature!)

On a lighter note, ponder the fact that we are drowning in our own garbage—with only a small percentage of it, as compared with Western European and Japanese trash, being recycled. Think of it: 16 billion disposable diapers, 2 billion razors and razor blades, 220 million tires, more glass and aluminum than existed in the entire world prior to World War II, in tandem with millions of tons of hospital waste generated throughout the country—all in one year—as we Americans continue to create twice as much garbage per person as any other industrialized nation, with the total expected to continue growing. It's estimated that by 1993, two thousand more landfills will have been shut down; and by the year 2000 nearly three-fourths of America's cities will have nowhere to dump their trash. I won't bore you with additional tales about toxic waste, and the nearly 50,000 tons of dangerously radioactive nuclear waste known as "radwaste" that will be in storage by the turn of the century.

And what are we going to do when we run out of water? The Great Plains states of Nebraska, Kansas, parts of Colorado, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Texas draw most of their water from the vast reservoir known as the Ogallala Aquifer. The Dust Bowl of the 1930s was turned into a farming center that grows much of the nation's corn, wheat, sorghum and cotton, by that water. Due to an enormous drain on the water year after year, however, the aquifer is rapidly drying up. By 2000 many Great Plains farmers will be faced with dry-land farming only; and a couple of decades later, the six states that depend on the Ogallala will have lost millions of acres of irrigated farmland. Out California way, just one lengthy drought coupled with the destruction of the aqueduct bringing water from the north by an earthquake could turn overcrowded and alien overrun Los Angeles county into a Death Valleyish nightmare.

Regarding the alien infestation of America, the experts tell us that by the turn of the century, there will be 30 million Hispanics in the country. Because statistics of this sort are always conservative, the figure will undoubtedly be much closer to 50 million. When we add to that number the many Asians and Middle Easterners who will have poured into the country by that time, it's possible to see that the ripple effect of this incredible invasion may be far worse in the long run. By now, tens of thousands of new non-White citizens—infants, born to illegal aliens and refugees—have been added to the population; and their numbers will continue to increase into the foreseeable future. Each of them will have many relations from the closest to the remotest in Third World countries who will demand to come to America to join their relatives. Ergo, the future may hold an even greater invasion of non-Whites than the one we are now experiencing.

Incidentally, the first word from the latest INS Commissioner, Gene

McNary, who was confirmed by the Senate on October 24th, is that he opposes digging a 4.5-mile ditch along the Southern border to discourage illegal crossings from Mexico. "Let's secure the border in a more humane way," he suggests, "such as repairing fences." (Right on! And let's put bandaids on the San Andreas fault.)

And the latest word from the no-mans-land along the Southern border reveals that the number of U.S. Border Patrol agents on duty in the San Diego area has plummeted to a four-year low. Not that Border Patrol staffing nationwide hasn't risen in recent years; but the San Diego sector has declined consistently since 1985. Intriguing, isn't it, considering the fact that it's estimated that almost half of the illegal entries are made along that ten-mile section of the border. Makes it easier, though, for human mules carrying 50 to 80 pounds apiece to smuggle cocaine into Southern California. It's a safe bet that much of the 22 tons of the drug seized recently in Sylmar, a suburb of Los Angeles, was carted into the country on the backs of mules. And a basically unprotected border makes it easier for criminals of every stripe and hue to enter the country, not to mention terrorists from Nicaragua, Columbia, and other points North, East, South and West.

Speaking of terrorism—as frightening as it may sound, we must face the fact that the engineers of subversive violence now have a whole new range of weapons to use against their targets: small, light and powerful "Stinger" handheld rockets; computer viruses; electromagnetic pulse generators that can wipe out the data in a computer's memory; the human bomb which was used so successfully in Beirut; chemical and biological weapons that can be concocted from cheap and readily available materials like pesticide and fertilizer components; and, because at least 100 pounds of plutonium are missing from various supposedly heavily guarded sites and shipments around the world, nuclear weapons, which seem to be horrifyingly easy to produce these days.

For a couple of prime and lightly guarded targets, consider these: Fewer than ten regional switching stations control virtually all telephone communications in all the large cities in the U.S.; they are all vulnerable. And two bridges, one over the Ohio River near Cincinnati, the other over the Potomac near Washington, handle all the north-south rail traffic in the Eastern U.S. It would appear that America is the least guarded supermarket in the world, for the simple reason that we Americans (specifically the liberal-minority coalition that rules the American Establishment), have no will to defend ourselves. We are undoubtedly going to have to learn the hard way just how vulnerable we are.

On another radically challenging front, scarcely a day goes by that science and technology don't alter the world. The computer revolution, well under way, eliminated half of the manufacturing jobs that existed in this country in the late 1970s. In the near future, half of the remaining manufacturing positions will vanish under the influence of computers, along with the positions of an increasing number of executives like the three million or so who found themselves jobless in the 1980s. How many workers in all categories will follow them into the unemployment lines over the next 50 years? And what of the millions of Black and Hispanic high-school dropouts who will never find legitimate work? Will there be enough employment within the drug, prostitution, pimp, crime, and revolution industries for all of them?

A great deal of God-posturing on the part of the doctors will prevail within the medical profession forevermore—or for just as long as we continue to live longer and longer, and technology continues to produce more and more miraculous life-saving equipment and drugs. As of now, the remarkable technologies that save, or prolong, thousands of lives are causing a plethora of ethical problems due to the decisions that must be made regarding the saving of the few among the many. Equally worrisome are the rapidly increasing medical costs of these modern innovations. Premature infants who 20 years ago would have died are now saved at a cost of $2 billion per year. Dialysis treatments for about 60,000 patients costs another $2 billion. And roughly one-third of Medicare funds—$150,000 per patient—go to support people in the last six months of their lives, many of whom have little or no chance of recovery. Needless to say, none of these high-tech wonders are available for impoverished Americans who have no health insurance.

By 2000, hopefully, the terminally ill throughout the nation will have the right to refuse medical treatment that might prolong their lives temporarily. A final note from our medical horoscope: More and more aborted fetuses will wind up in hospital trash.

For the next 50 years, the United States may remain the most powerful country in the world. But, as our society rapidly darkens, we will inevitably become a nation on a war footing, in every sense, with increasing crime, drug abuse, unemployment, welfarism, open warfare along the border with Mexico, and racial warfare in our largest cities between Blacks and those ethnic minorities who are crowding Black Americans out of the system by taking jobs, homes and entire neighborhoods away from them.

What are the chances of America being blessed in the future with far more skillful politicians than those who have given us four wars in one lifetime, an illegal alien invasion that far surpasses the greatest military invasion in history—D-Day, and the "Caesarism" of internationalism that involves the positioning of troops and military bases in over 60 countries around the world? (Will pigs be wearing mink in January?)

At best, American leadership is an unstable condition burdened by an inability to identify causes or foresee consequences over any period of time longer than it takes to reach the next election. The principle of causality is the process of choosing a goal and taking the actions necessary to achieve it. Because the concept of compromise—the necessity to perform certain actions because of minority opinion, world opinion, powerful lobbies, organized constituents, wealthy contributors, etc.—has all but obliterated the principle of causality in the minds of our politicians, they frequently consider, evaluate and choose their actions while ignoring the context of the knowledge available to them.

By way of example, consider U.S. cowardice vs. Israeli arrogance. In the face of American economic sanctions initiated against South Africa—definitely not in our national interest—Israel has continued to trade heavily with that nation, in conjunction with helping them build nuclear-capable ballistic missiles and a long-range missile that could be used to launch reconnaissance satellites. Washington has been aware of this situation from the beginning. Nonetheless, the government said and did nothing. Recently, NBC News broke the story; and immediately the Bush Administration began to play a familiar game. First came the claim that the government was disturbed by the news—then an announcement to the effect that a hold was being placed on the delivery of certain high-tech goodies already in the pipeline for Israel. Rest assured that as soon as the story fades out of the minds of the fickle public, it will be business as usual with Israel.

The hypocritical reactions of our politicians during this fiasco have been doubly odious. The anti-apartheid commitment on the part of the government was motivated by fear of the Black lobby. The support given to Israel for doing what we won't do, was motivated by fear of the Jewish lobby. Ergo, the context was swept under the rug of compromise, and the resultant decisions were weak, cowardly and detrimental to our national interests.

If American politicians were ideologically goal-directed in their efforts to attain an objective awareness of reality, the government might be properly "focused"—committed, that is, to giving logical continuity, coherence and meaning to governmental action. But "ideology" is a dirty word in the liberal-democratic world. And thus it is that we Americans have a patently unfocused government incapable of defending either our racial or our national sovereignty.

This portrait of America isn't very pretty, I know. I have caveated our future-intensive game-plan with depositivization—as that master of bureaucratic double-speak, Alexander Haig, might put. I wish I could like the looks of the future; but I don't. The present state of the nation indicates to me that we have wandered too far into the jungles of irresponsibility to be saved from a Dark Age of our own making. □

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the rôles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The books goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. For your copy of Which Way Western Man? send $14.50 (which includes $2.50 for postage and handling for the softback edition (Order No. 22003).

DOES THE WEST HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980—except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. Some Revisionist Viewpoints on World War II

Ben Kriegh

The Colorado Daily has asked me to write an article on some of the unpublicized findings of certain writers in regard to World War Two. I agreed to do so in the interest of examining all aspects of an issue, no matter how controversial it may be. If we have hope of improving our future, we must seek to understand the failures and errors of the past.

Many who are familiar with our debacle in Viet Nam and its attendant propaganda seem to think this experience was unique in history. However, according to unpublicized findings of numerous qualified writers and historians, Viet Nam was merely another example of a long series of episodes in which the American majority has been propagandized, misled and even betrayed by its leadership.

According to these writers, it is only when we begin to peek beneath the propaganda curtain which still veils World War Two that the enormity of the deception can be seen.

An illustration of the power of propaganda provided by Carroll Quigley, Professor of History at Georgetown University, is the widely held misconception that National Socialist Germany was a totalitarian state. In Tragedy and Hope[1] he writes, "...unlike Italy or Soviet Russia, the economic system was not ruled by the state but was subject to 'self rule' (free enterprise)....Newspapermen and journalistic writers applied the term 'totalitarian' to the Nazi system, and the name has stuck without any real analysis of the facts as they existed. In fact, the Nazi system was not totalitarian either in theory or in practice."

Dal Hitchcock, in The German Financial Revolution, described German financial and fiscal policy as "revolutionary" and "successful," and noted that National Socialism involved no nationalization of factories or industry, and that all business organizations were privately owned. In Particular, control of the issuance of money was taken from the hands of international financiers' and put into the hands of the government. This move helped Germany to recover from the Depression while other industrialized nations of the world still wallowed in it. It also made Hitler a target of the monopoly capitalists, which includes the Socialists and Communists.

(Abraham Lincoln had a similar confrontation with the international banking interests when he issued interest free U.S. Notes to help finance the Civil War. The Bank of England in its famous "Hazard Circular" stated, "...capital shall control labor by controlling wages. This can be done by controlling money. The great debt...made out of the war must be used as a means to control money....Bonds must be used as a banking basis....It will not do to allow the greenback...to circulate as money...as we cannot control that." Today, our money is interest bearing Federal Reserve Notes backed by bonds. The last U.S. Note in circulation was the old $2 bill. Some time ago it was replaced by a new $2 bill–a Federal Reserve Note.)

So dramatic was Germany's economic recovery that Churchill stated to General R. E. Wood in November 1936, "Germany is getting too strong and we must smash her." In 1938 Bernard Baruch, advisor to President Roosevelt, remarked to General George C. Marshall, "We are going to lick that fellow Hitler. He isn't going to get away with it."

These remarks suggest that leaders in Britain and the United States were contemplating war. Accordingly, a propaganda barrage was launched against Germany–she was building a war machine to conquer the world.

But, according to several writers, this charge was phony. Quigley in Tragedy and Hope: "From 1936 to the outbreak of war in 1939, German aircraft production was not raised...its tank production was low, and even in 1939 was less than Britain's....Britain produced about 8000 (military planes) in 1939 compared to 4733 (produced in Germany) In 1939...From these facts it's quite clear that Britain did not yield to superior force..."

In The World Crisis in America's Foreign Policy 1937-1941, W. L. Langer and S. E. Gleason show that Germany was unprepared for a major European war in 1939, having not planned for such a dire eventuality. In The Myth of the New History, Dr. David Hoggan writes, "The Churchill myth of Germany armed to the teeth in 1940 (flies) in the face of all the statistical evidence which has been offered by...Asher Lee" (in The German Air Force).

In The Origins of the Second World War, A.J.P. Taylor, a leading British historian, shows that "Hitler did not wish a war, either local, European, or world..... His only fundamental aim in foreign policy was to revise the unjust and unfair Treaty of Versailles, and to do this by peaceful means." (Quotation from a review by Harry Elmer Barnes.)

H. E. Barnes, who was one of America's leading revisionist historians, stated in Blasting the Historical Blackout, "It is well established that no responsible leader in Germany, France, or Italy wanted war in 1939. President Roosevelt apparently desired to have the European war break out as soon as possible, pressed Chamberlain to go ahead, and encouraged Polish...stubbornness..."

One of the most comprehensive studies on the origins of the war was made by David Hoggan in his doctoral thesis at Harvard in 1948 which he expanded into a 900-page book over a 15-year period, to be published in English under the title When Peaceful Revision Failed. In a reference to this book in The Myth of the New History, Dr. Hoggan states, "...As demonstrated in my book...Germany, whatever her faults in her own domestic system and foreign policy, was the victim of an English Tory conspiracy in September 1939...(Lord) Halifax conducted a single-minded campaign to plunge Germany into war and in such a way as to make Germany appear to be the guilty party....Poland was the pawn in the game.... The documentary record has long since revealed that in 1939 it was Hitler's utmost desire to enjoy peaceful and friendly relations, and if possible alliances, with both Great Britain and Poland."

Supporting Hoggan's view, H. E. Barnes states, "...The public announcement of the final shift of British policy to hostility to Germany...rested on a twofold fraud, (1) the charge that Germany was preparing for widespread military aggression, and (2) a hoax concocted through Virgil Tilea, the Rumanian minister to London." (Tilea was induced by the British Foreign Office to draw up a false statement charging Germany with seeking to seize the Rumanian economy.)

So blatant was the deceit that, according to Barnes, "Both Chamberlain and Halifax falsified their reports of Hitler's favorable reaction to a proposed international conference on September 2 (1939) which still might have...stopped the German-Polish war and prevented the European war."

Deceit was not peculiar to the British leadership. The rôle of the United States in promoting war against Germany is considered by C. C. Tansill in The Back Door to War. He shows that FDR was interested in creating a breach between Germany and England. His findings were based on unpublished state department documents which revealed that FDR encouraged the British to go to war in 1939 and then considered the best means of obtaining the intervention of the United States.

In The Final Secret of Pearl Harbor, Admiral Theobald shows that FDR alone was responsible for the disaster at Pearl Harbor. He demonstrates beyond question, by means of documents, that FDR had ample warning of the impending attack which he failed to pass on to Admiral Kimmel. He writes, "Our main deduction is that President Roosevelt forced Japan to war by unrelenting diplomatic-economic pressure and enticed that country to initiate hostilities with a surprise attack by holding the Pacific fleet in Hawaiian waters as an invitation to that attack."

General Wedemeyer, in the Wedemeyer Reports, writes, "The fact that Japan's attack had been deliberately provoked was obscured by the disaster at Pearl Harbor." Thus, the U.S. was brought into the war by the deliberate sacrifice of over 3300 of our young men. Watergate pales to insignificance by comparison.

The brief insights into unpublicized aspects of World War Two may shed some light on our present demoralized state. During the 1930s Communism was said to be the antithesis of our way of life. Why, then, were we so anxious to destroy Germany whose primary goal was to contain Communism? Why have we been fraudulently led to sacrifice so many of our best young men in foreign wars? What has been our gain?

Although the fact remains that the foreign interventionist policies of our leadership have consistently aided the Communist cause, the greatest threat to our future is not Communism per se. Rather, it is the portrait of an unreal world being painted for us by the propaganda media, the abandonment of intellectual leadership by the academic world, and a lack of moral and spiritual courage. There can be no doubt that the best interests of the American majority have not been served by our leadership. Nor can we expect any remedies in the near future. The liberal establishment has been exposed as phony, subservient to alien interests. It can offer only bankrupt ideas and licentiousness. Traditional conservatism offers only stagnation. The majority political parties are enslaved to monied interests with Socialism as their ultimate goal, for Socialism-Communism is the ultimate of monopoly capitalism.

Only a new political movement in a new direction can offer any hope for a rewarding future. And it is only the young, who still have the time and the inclination to understand the failures of the leadership of the past, who can generate a successful remedy. □

A Very Important Fraction

by

Allan Callahan

We have all heard the term "racial equality" till it is running out of our ears. Advocate say there are no differences between Whites and Blacks except color; although, when pressed, some will admit a few other physical differences, but say they are not important. Nor do they want to admit any mental differences. Especially they do not want to admit these. And even if you could get them to admit them, they would again say the differences are small and thus unimportant. They are wrong; dead wrong. Completely, absolutely, wholly, massively, entirely and utterly wrong. The differences may be small. percentage-wise, but they are certainly not unimportant.

For proof, let us begin with apes. How different are they from humans? Scientists have long known that, bone for bone, organ for organ, and muscle for muscle, they are identical to us. Then, after the discovery of DNA, it was found that the DNA of the two African great apes, chimpanzees and gorillas, differs from ours by only 1%. In other words, the whole genetic makeup of these apes and humans only varies by this small fraction.

Would you say that this 1% is important? Who would deny it? As far as I know, even the most rabid race-mixers don't advocate that we mate with apes, yet they say it is just jim-dandy to do so with negroes. They don't want a bunch of half-apes running around loose, but look with favor upon half-niggers. Whenever they see a black buck squiring his white wife and mulatto children around town, it brings smiles to their faces.

I have nothing against apes, but do not think they should brought into White society and treated as equals. I would have nothing against negroes either, if we weren't biologically threatened by them, but we are. The cause lies in their genes. The more primitive black genes are dominant over white genes (later arrivals in the chain of evolution) by a ratio of 4 to 1. Thus, when we mate with them we only destroy ourselves. Black-white unions produce only coloreds; no whites. Ape genes are even more dominant, but apes are not trying to push themselves into our society, while Blacks are.

If there is only a 1% genetic difference between apes and humans, how much difference is there between negroes and whites? Maybe about 1/2 of 1%. Is this 1/2 of a percentage point important? You bet it is! It is of profound importance. The most crucial difference between Whites and Blacks lies in their brains. Among the various types of negroes there is a noteworthy spread in brain size, with the average being significantly smaller than the white average. But maybe more important than this difference in size is the difference in the makeup in the brains of the two races. The negro brain is more brutal than the white, and thus nearer the ape brain. It has less complex convolutions, and does not come up to the white standard in the prefrontal cortex area either. Here it is inferior in seven out of eight areas (only in the visuosensory area is it equal). The thickness of both infra and supragranular layers is thinner in the brains of blacks, and the thinner the layers, the more it denotes inferior intelligence.

The endocrine glands give out immensely important secretions which affect motivation, drive and ambition, and here too, Whites and Blacks differ.

For decades now there has been a big push to "educate" the negro; to supposedly bring him up to our level. There has been no attempt to do the same with apes. Why not? Is it because apes are boxed in by their genes, but not negroes? Have the egalitarians repealed the laws of heredity in regard to the latter?

Apes are "intelligent," as we generally understand the term, and they can be educated, up to a point. They are surprisingly human-like. It has been proven that an ape can be taught to communicate with humans by using American Sign Language (which is used by the deaf), or by pushing buttons on a special machine which registers his feelings. He can indicate if he is happy or sad, or wants this or that. He can master quite a few basic concepts, and "chat" about them. He is able to make statements and ask questions. He can argue, tease, joke and, yes, even lie.

Chimpanzees are the smartest of all apes (even apes aren't all equal), and are said to have, in some ways, the intelligence of a 5-year-old child. But they never get past this plateau, and everyone (or almost everyone) knows that it is not because of poor diet or the fact that they don't get to go to school with white children. No, chimps are limited by their heredity, as are all other apes, and indeed all living creatures.

Chimps can be taught to do simple human task, but few people would expect them to get much done if they were left by themselves, very long, unsupervised. They may differ from humans only 1% genetically, but this fraction is very important indeed.

The negro is considered human, although some think he should be put into another class or category by himself. At any rate, if 1% can be of profound importance, so can 1/2 of 1%, or even less. Left to themselves, Blacks cannot create or maintain a High Culture. Their so-called "civilizations" in Africa, such as those at Benin, Melle, Ashanti and Songhay, had very little going for them. They had a few very minor achievements in language and government, and exhibited a little ability in handicrafts, but that was about it. They showed no ability in writing, science, architecture, transportation, philosophy, education, economics, literature, communications, music, religion, agriculture, art, the military or mechanical improvements. In this respect you would think they were 99% genetically removed from Whites, instead of 1/2 of 1%. So again, we see how important this small fraction is. Furthermore, their "civilizations" were permeated with senseless and revolting cruelties, and were so primitive that they should be referred to as "civilizations" at all, but only primitive cultures.

Humans and apes are so genetically close that they can mate and produce offspring. An old photo of one, in the possession of the Anthropological Institute of London, shows a creature which looks like a monstrosity, being very much more ape-like than human. Few if any would advocate such cross-breeding, but many promote black-white crossings. However, if race-mixing Whites can ignore the maybe 1/2 of 1% difference between themselves and Blacks, there would not be much logic for them to use the other 1/2 of 1% difference between Blacks and apes as an excuse for not mating with the latter, also.

How does such a thing grab you? Imagine a batch of half-apes sitting on the Supreme Court. Or picture a near-ape as president of the United States. Think what it would be like to have a hairy ape-like creature as a grandchild. Then try to figure out how long our civilization would last if all the "people" in our land resembled apes more than humans. Wouldn't this be a fitting end for an egalitarian society?

Some will argue that while some negroes are mentally superior to some Whites, apes are not superior to either. Not true. There are exceptions. What about mental retardation? There are some pitiful cases, both white and negro (and, incidentally, the latter have a higher rate of retardation than the former) who are so low on the scale of idiocy that they can do nothing but lie all days and croak like grogs. Wouldn't an ape be superior to one of these? Of course.

It will also be argued that we shouldn't mate with apes because they are animals; but so are we. Everything can be broken down into three categories: plant, animal, and mineral. We fall into the animal category, along with apes. Apes are not human, but all we need to do is broaden the "human" category to include them. There's only 1% difference, remember? Ape-race; human-race; does it matter? We are told that "race isn't important," so if this is true, then it shouldn't be important if man mongrelizes himself down into a half-ape. All in the name of "brotherhood," of course.

If the destruction of the races through mongrelization is to be avoided, the only answer is geographical separation. This can't be achieved quickly, but it can be done in time; the only thing lacking is the will.

And really, this should suit Blacks, if we can believe what they say. They are always accusing us of discrimination, of holding them down, of not giving them a fair shake, of exploiting them; the list is long. If these charges actually represent their true feeling, why, then, do they want to integrate with us? You would think they would want to get as far away from white people as possible.

To merge the black genepool in with the white would be a monumental crime against nature, and would wipe out an estimated 200,000 years of evolutionary progress. But many Whites are naive on this point, thinking we can have integration without eventual race destruction. This would be like a parent saying to his child, "You can play with the boy next door all you want to; just don't get friendly with him." □

DOES THE WEST HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 – except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigous academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor/publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavour to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of our Western culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change, or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

A TIME FOR RENEWAL

By Ernst Zündel

206 Carlton St., Toronto ONT M5A 2L1

On the 9th of November 1989, my plane took off from Toronto for Europe. My plan was to rush to the aid of my stricken friend and chief advisor, Dr. Robert Faurisson. For security reasons, no one knew that I was going to Europe. Only one man had been notified "in code". Only I knew my itinerary, and not even those whom I was going to see knew that I was on my way.

Once inside Europe, I turned my car radio on and was greeted by the sound of an excited babble of noises and voices, at once discordant and yet also familiar. As I turned the dial slowly, I made an electronic journey via the ether, through Europe. There was Polish, Czech, Russian, Dutch, French and German on the airwaves. Naturally, the familiar German caught my attention, and I paused a little longer and could not believe what I heard.

I pulled to the side of the road and listened to the excited voices of the male and female announcers who, judging by their voices, were younger than myself, maybe by some twenty years. Overcome by emotion, they were giving a blow by blow description of the "opening of the Wall of Shame." Inadvertently I had landed in Europe and was in Germany at this moving and historic moment. I was overcome by joy, and quietly wiped away my tears as these supposedly brainwashed "New Germans" on the radio reported the falling of the wall, the cutting of the barbed wire, the sound of the pneumatic drills and the scraping of the shovels. Ah, what a joy to have been there that day, at that moment. What a day full of promise and hope for the future!

I shook myself out of my near-enchanted state and brought myself under control. Looking at the map in front of me, I kept track of where the borders between the two Germanies were opening and was overjoyed. For a lifetime I had gone across this mark of shame and stain on Germany's proud honour and traditions. I remembered having crossed at Eisenach in my youth, on my first visit to Germany's Soviet Zone of Occupation in 1953, with my new brother-in-law and my sister, going to Karl Marx Stadt, Leipzig, and Dresden which was still in rubble and ruins from the devastating air raid by the U.S. and British "Air-Gangsters", as the populace referred to them at the time.

I also remembered having been turned back at the same border area by the Communists in the sixties, and having to enter divided Berlin via Helmstedt, close to the "Volkswagen City" of Wolfsburg. This town, the first town in the world based and built on a "Helicopter Survey" using National Socialist Germany's first helicopter for that purpose. All this went through my mind as I made my way across Germany, a Germany rebuilt, vibrant, pulsating with traffic, and virile energy at every moment.

I had not been "at home" for 12 years for various reasons, all having to do, perversely enough, with my defense and struggle for truth about Germany's recent past.

Here I was, surrounded by the latest of shiny cars, trucks, and buses, whizzing purposefully past me at great speed, all of them controlled and orderly, heading for some distant destiny it seemed.

I looked at their faces as they moved past me left and right, and to my surprise, all of them were White! That's the first thing which hit me—they were all White. In my twelve years in the Gulag of Canada, for years unable or forbidden to travel, I had gotten used to the many coloured faces of Pakistanis, Chinese, to Jamaicans, Arabs, Africans. Gone were the turbans of the Seikhs, gone the many different head-shapes and hair-textures. Here, all were Aryans, it seemed.

I kept turning the radio dial as I drove and finally stopped for gas, and there in front of me I saw parked by a gas pump the unmistakable shape of an "East-German" TRABI, a car so small that it looked more like the trunk of my own Chrysler. The heavy-set German who carefully filled his tank, intently gazing at the Deutsch-Mark counter, looked at me with his shiny blue eyes as I made my way towards the "Tankwart", the man who took the money. I told the man that his tank full of gas was a gift from me, we shook hands, exchanged greetings. I asked him how long he had been en route, since I saw the grime and dirt on his car, and he said, four days in a transit camp, some time in Czechoslovakia, and then the trip. The little car could barely travel at 75 kilometers an hour, which is about 50 miles. He had come to see relatives, actually to flee, but now that the border could be crossed legitimately, he said he would have to see, and would await developments.

During my stay, I encountered many more "Trabis", all had the same cautious attitude and very few really wanted to stay in the West; they just wanted to see brothers, sisters, parents or relatives which some of them had not seen since the end of the war, or at least since the wall had gone up.

I visited a lady supporter in the north and stayed with her overnight. At 4:30 in the morning we were awakened by the doorbell—when she opened, her niece and her husband stood there; they had not seen one another since 1961. What a hallo and Wiedersehen this was! What an insight I gained in those few short hours, as the effects of Germany's division were brought home to me one more time in all its tragic consequences. I soon took my leave, after many a moist eye and shed tear, and drove off into the beautiful and clear Saturday morning. The sun was rising over a Germany which was pouring out of its houses and cities towards the border areas. Soon traffic slowed to a crawl. Every time a "Trabi" came into sight, there was honking of horns and joyous waving and flicking on and off of lights by just about everybody. The Germans of the West responded with flowers, and soon brass bands, at the border. Naturally, the visitors were hungry and tired, having often waited in lines up to 15 kilometers deep for twelve hours.

Soon, huge tents sprang up as if by magic. Each visitor from the "East" got 100 Deutsche Marks to start with and the old German penchant for creating order out of chaos took hold. Food, sausages, buns, soft drinks, and beer were made available. Schools opened their gymnasiums, churches opened church halls; by Saturday afternoon, as I made my way across my native land, driving parallel north-south along the "Inter-Zonal Border" region, the German Emergency Service network was unfolding. For a while I had feared that "democracy" might have destroyed this one German characteristic as well—but no—by 3 o'clock that Saturday afternoon, the efficient and cool voices of youngish German border patrol and emergency services personnel could be heard over the shortwave radio that although the city was "schwarz mit Menschen"—a saying meaning the city was "crowded to the gills"—all was running smoothly.

I picked up a call by one border post, to move up the "truckloads of roadmaps" to the "holes in the wall". Soon this was done, and when I got towards Göttingen, Kassel, and Frankfurt, regular convoys of "Trabis," surrounded by their traditional pale blue cloud of smoke, were moving along the Autobahns, accompanied by the usual light-flicking and horn honking.

What then followed on Germany's airwaves and newsstands was nothing short of amazing. The same media which for forty years had coldly forecast an "eternal" or "ewige" German Division was now abuzz with commentaries about the coming "Wiedervereinigung" or German "Reunification".

The vassals installed with their regimes in East and West desperately tried to stem the tide of the "primordial" burst of joy and expectation. It became obvious that the people of Germany once again were ahead of their political masters inflicted upon them by their respective "friends" in East and West.

Without a doubt, the radio broadcasts emanating from East Germany (actually Central Germany, since the Poles, Russians, and Czechs presently occupy vast stretches of German territory) were the most interesting. I was riveted to the radio and listened to speaker after speaker at some East German Communist Party "Revival-style Meeting" in Leipzig, where speaker after speaker, all of them young, eloquent and with a beautiful and carefully chosen phrase or two, took the old "Bolsheviks" to task for their corruption, terror, misrule, and heartless behaviour. All speakers, except one old apparatschik who still insisted on wanting to defend communist morality and ethics and who was promptly booed and hissed into silence, wanted change, freedom, secret ballots, more social justice, more openness in government, and all gave their name, their age, their profession and where they were from.

I was astounded! I had never in my entire political career heard such controlled anger and fury expressed anywhere! That, to me, was a typically "German Revolution". There was no call for manning of the barricades, no storming of the bastilles. Here in this City of Leipzig, Communists— German Communists, were "letting it all hang out".

Then I turned to another station. This time I heard East Germany's new leader, a rather Jewish-looking son of a tailor from Koehlberg, Egon Krenz, speak. He was a good and forceful speaker and gave what I thought under the circumstances a very good account of himself and how he intended to improve things, and explained why the border was finally opened.

One interesting East German broadcast I monitored was an interview with a captain of the "Volkspolizei", or Vopos; he was asked if it was true that the East German "Volksarmee" had been put on alert to quell the demonstrations, numbering by then in the hundreds of thousands, in Leipzig and Dresden and in other cities. He said that certain elements had been trying to arm themselves, and that about 300 weapons had been stolen from the garrison of the "Volksarmee" in Leipzig but that the police, and not the army, had the job of controlling internal unrest, that the Army would be loyal to its oath and function and not fire on the citizens of the "DDR", which is the present name of East Germany. Loud and prolonged applause greeted his remarks!

Then there were news reports of the political party bosses of

Siegfried Steiner, Rosenheim

Halle and Erfurt committing suicide by shooting themselves, which in turn prompted one German newspaper's banner headline, "Bunkerstimmung in der Zone" ("Bunker mood in the (Soviet) Zone"), alluding to the alleged events in Hitler's Bunker in 1945 in Berlin.

The air was charged with a potential for something big to happen: Revolutions have begun against such backgrounds. I instinctively thought back to the Hungarian Revolution in 1956 but realized that this time the Soviet tanks would not roll, because the impulses for this peaceful revolution now taking place had originated with the Russian leader Gorbachev. This time the Communist leaders had only their own apparatus, their own secret police, their own terror system and torture chambers to rely on—and, true to form to all illegitimate, externally imposed systems, it became each man out for his own skin.

Apparently, Honecker, East Germany's long-time leader, had ordered the Army to do what they had done in 1953, to brutally put down the demonstrations in a "Chinese style massacre" but found no one willing to give, much less to execute, the order to shoot thousands. When he failed, he was ousted by yet unclear means, some even say by pressure from Moscow!

Egon Krenz, the long-time favourite of Honecker, took over, now there are investigations afoot against him, it is reported. Some high-ranking political "mummies" have already resigned. East German party officials, apparently armed until now, have been ordered by the new government to turn in their weapons. The dreaded "Staatssicherheitspolizei", in short "Stasi", has allegedly been disbanded; frankly, I think 'renamed' would undoubtedly be a better term.

Negotiations are going on between East and West Germany which could lead to an easing of tensions and further improve things.

All this, however, has a shadow-side to it, "eine Schattenseite", as the Germans would say, and that is that the West German puppet state inherited a totally undeserved image-improving windfall. Furthermore, outright German traitors like Willy Brandt [a former mayor of West Berlin, a former Federal Chancellor, the author of Deutsche und andere Verbrecher (Germans and Other Criminals) after he fled from Germany and sought refuge in Norway, contributor of German-bashing articles to the U.S. media during WW II, and alleged collaborator of the CIA in post-war Germany!], who for years did the bidding of their Allied masters, were given a totally undeserved lease on life. Suddenly, these "political cadavers" who had faded into political insignificance had the cheek to use words like "German nation," "German unity," etc., and then gave speeches to the multitudes. Thank God, at least Helmut Kohl was whistled down in a 25-minute "Pfeifkonzert" (whistle concert) in Berlin!

However, the trend of history is for German unity. These political fossils will just play an interim role!—Upon reflection, I think they might actually be quite useful for the moment, for they can go and calm the likes of Bush, Thatcher, and Mitterand with their beseeching of "Western European Unity," with their talk and reassurances of "Kein Deutscher Alleingang" ("No single German thrust"), etc. I for one am ever hopeful, optimist that I am, that Germany will shake off its shackles. The occupiers—oops, our friends, will see the light and leave, or "be made go." No country with a healthy economy, a sound economic and social infrastructure, rebuilt by the sweat of its own people's labour, speaking one language, being more or less of common bond and blood, can be kept down forever.

As America's and Russia's economic, but more especially racial, problems come to the fore, exacerbated by the AIDS crisis looming on the horizon, Germany, as the heart of Europe, will take its rightful place in history once again. American politicians can now choose between forever hitching their stars and their fortunes to the ghetto-dwellers and occupiers of a hapless Palestine, or to come clean, to do what would be right for America's future, to help undo the effects of Yalta, Teheran and Potsdam. In short, America can now, belatedly, call off its continued war against Germany by stopping its lies in the media and by curtailing the hatred fostered for so long against my own people.

The opportunity is there—I doubt that Bush is free enough to take it! Poor America—so free and yet such a slave!

BERLIN, yesterday, just before 1 p.m. The bells were ringing in the tower of the Kaiser Wilhelm Memorial Church. Suddenly, the pedestrians stopped on the Kurfürstendamm. They folded their hands. Right there in the middle of the street, they began to pray. Citizens of East and West Berlin—many were crying. Some covered their faces with their hands, others were kneeling.

That was perhaps the most moving moment in this city's history. In the history of our nation.

And it was the most peaceful, the most hopeful.

What took place the previous night, all day yesterday, and this past night in the divided city, in divided Germany, was heart-rending. People from East and West took the Wall and the border by storm, fell crying and laughing into each other's arms. It was as though all of Germany were embracing itself. And Eastern and Western police watched, smiling, and traded sandwiches. After GDR-television had announced Thursday evening that citizens were free to travel "as of now," there was no stopping the people in East and West. The Brandenburg Gate, Kurfürstendamm, Alexander Square—it was the day of re-unification, the day of the Germans, the powerful acknowledgement of unity and justice and freedom. In the evening, there was jubilant cheering as Willy Brandt, the former Mayor of Berlin, called out to the thousands before the Schöneberger City Hall: "In the summer I wrote that Berlin will live and the Wall will fall—Berlin lives, the Wall has fallen."

Whatever may happen now—no one can take this day from us. It was a day for Germany.

This was the longest day in German history—it lasted for an entire wonderful weekend. And it was the happiest and most peaceful invasion of all time: the East Germans took West Germany by storm.

They arrived in trains and buses, on foot and per taxi. They came in endless, chugging caravans of Trabis. They flooded Berlin and Bebra, Hamburg and Hof. Everyone recognized them by their jeans, their colorful windbreakers, their running shoes—but most of all by their incredible modesty and politeness. And the West Germans opened their hearts and their arms, invited them to dinner, to tea, put money in their pockets and roses under the Trabis' windshield wipers. "Come back soon," was written on the handbills. Many stores stayed open on Sunday. Gas stations mixed Trabi-cocktails, ADAC [Allgemeiner Deutscher Automobil Club—the German automobile club] kept its monkey-wrenches on the ready, broadcasting stations brought Trabi-news. Innkeepers welcomed the GDR-citizens with champaign.

Germany, this weekend, was one single wonderful, crazy celebration of re-unification. Holes were dug into the Wall, an East-baby was born under a maple tree in West Berlin. Lower Saxony's Prime Minister Albrecht was kissed by GDR-citizens, on GDR-territory. And almost all of those who came, went back home to the GDR. But they promised: We'll come back soon! It was a wonderful weekend. Good morning, Germany!

1641 Immigrants in 24 Hours

Hannover—There is no end to the inflow of emigrating East Germans: According to the national border guard, 1641 newcomers had announced themselves in 24 hours by Wednesday. This has increased the total number of immigrants to West Germany from the GDR in November to more than 100,000. Due to the great accommodation problems in North-Rhine-Westphalia, more than 2,000 immigrants from nations in Eastern Europe are temporarily housed in Schleswig-Holstein's vacation establishments.

Die Welt, by Enno von Löwenstern, November 23, 1989

Shades of Yalta?

The Chancellor has stated in Strassbourg that the Federal Government continues to adhere to "the goal of a free and united Germany in a free and united Europe." That was something that needed to be said in European circles, after the immutability of the "present map" has recently been discussed in Paris—as if the French, of all people, who complain the loudest about Yalta, wanted to advocate a mini-Yalta to the Germans' debit.

Re-unification is coming; it is embarrassing enough that a democrat has to repeatedly explain, among democrats, that it doesn't threaten anyone—how could the dissolution of a criminal dictatorship, the incorporation of what has to date been the realm of aggression into the community of peaceful peoples, be something evil? Let's be frank about it—all this talk is motivated by nothing other than France's pitiful balance of trade and the sad state of the pound. He who strives for grandeur and leadership without having his own books in order may well grow nervous at the prospect of seeing his successful neighbour come into a greater taxation district and even repairing it economically. But continually trying to label one's partner with the overcome tendencies of the past won't improve one's own economy.

Certainly, there are still the Allied occupation powers; some believe they have to be appeased. But the day is coming where the Germans will manage their own destiny to the point of demanding the departure of those troops that they perceive not as protectors, but as oppressors. No one has the "right" to keep a foreign nation occupied against its will for the purpose of playing at being a "superpower" or a "balancing agent" or whatever. If Gorbachev really thought that he could prove bad intentions on the part of NATO, the union of peace-loving constitutional states, he would have put those cards on the table long ago. "German re-unification threatens no one"—that's not a showy phrase, it's a truth that should finally be taken beyond Sunday speeches and introduced into everyday politics.

Die Welt is one of Germany's most prestigious newspapers, something like the New York Times. The above editorial appeared the day I left Europe and was handed to me by the stewardess on the plane, where I wrote this newsletter. Löwenstern sounds Jewish to me, but whoever the writer is, he certainly expresses a widely held German viewpoint.

When I was in Paris I saw, all over the newsstands, newspapers with the banner headline: The end of the Second World War has arrived!

That sums it up!

DOES THE WEST HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 – except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. 19 November 1989

MANFRED ROEDER was not released on November 12 as was expected, having served 9 years and two months, two thirds of his 13 years sentence.

You will know that Kurt Rebman, Federal Prosecutor/Attorney General, who has demonstrated unremitting hostility to Manfred Roeder since the time of his trial in 1982, when he stated at a press conference that he hoped there would be silence on the ideological battle front (i.e., nationalist) by putting Roeder away for many, many long years, and set out his opposition to Roeder's release with the customary one third remission of sentence to the President of the Stuttgart Higher Regional Court. The reasons he put forward were summarized by Manfred Roeder in his Newsletter No. 54.

At the very last minute the Stuttgart Regional Court gave its verdict and ruled in favour of Rebmann's reasons for insisting that Roeder serve the full term of his 13 year prison sentence. These were, that he had continuing sympathy for the representatives of the former National Socialist regime and that it was suspected he would continue with the work that had brought him into prison. All of which is duplicitous humbug.

Manfred Roeder was brought into prison for no other reason than that for which the German "democratic" authorities are attempting to keep him caged for another four years, namely, craven political fear.

That is even more pronounced at this particular point in German history when the German Question has been moved to the front burner, so to speak. The status of both West and East Germany is being brought into question—except by those who enjoy ersatz power in the liberal-democratic and communist orders of the so-called Federal and Democratic Republics, by permission of America, Russia, Britain, and France, those Allies who militarily overcame the Third Reich. They are their master's voice and, like the dog that used to grace HMV record label, they bark at any suggestion of their days being numbered, that Germany should be anything but a loyal NATO ally and member of the European Economic Community on the one hand, and a loyal Warsaw Pact and COMECON ally of the Soviet Union on the other.

The catalyst for change, however, has been the manifestation of 'people-power' in what is, strictly speaking, Central Germany, or the German Democratic Republic. There, the people have taken to the streets in mass protests against the failed and repressive system of Marxism and its ruling communist party masquerading as a Socialist Unity Party, caught out of step with the new thinking in the Kremlin (which has, nonetheless, made quite clear that it will not tolerate any alteration in its puppet state's border).

People's power is the real fear of Western and Communist politicians alike. Here in the West it is kept from emerging by a cunning combination of inducements, soporifics, and laws which play on the almost innate sense of abiding by the laws and a reticence to take overt action. But in West Germany, where successive puppet administrations have succeeded one another under the benign direction of the Western Powers, backed by nearly half a million occupation forces for over 44 years (with not a little helping hand from the Zionist Power voiced by Heinz Galinski), the fear is constant. The ruling upstarts know that the German nation is not really behind them but waiting for a genuine patriotic German government elected by all Germans which is empowered to sign the Peace Treaty which, after all these years, has yet to be concluded.

To return to Manfred Roeder's plight...

While assorted democratic political clowns and media parrots chatter about the German Question, the facts that Manfred Roeder put on record and proclaimed as Speaker of the Liberation Movement of the German Reich on 23 May 1978 remain as true as rocks in eddying currents that are the unfolding events in Germany 1989. There is no Government of the Reich. Interference in German affairs by Allied occupying powers after 8 May 1945 was illegal under international law. There exists only an armistice under the law. A Peace Treaty can only be signed by the former belligerents. The legal successor of the German Reich is neither the administration of the Federal Republic nor the administration of the German Democratic Republic which are nothing but creations of the Allied Powers who reserve the right to forceful and arbitrary interference in German affairs at any time.

In point of fact and of law, since the last Reich President, Karl Doenitz, disclaimed the title, Manfred Roeder proclaimed the Imperial Conservatorship, or Reichsverweser, in the name of the Liberation Movement of the German Reich in May 1978, and so ensured the legal succession of the Reich. Thus, the Freiheitsbewegung Deutsches Reich has assumed provisional representation for a transitional period until the Constitution of a free German Government of all Government is voted upon by all Germans.

Hence, the determination of the Allied-backed democratic politicians and authorities in West Germany to keep Manfred Roeder in gaol while the likes of Horst Mahler, a left-wing, active terrorist and former lawyer, was released after two thirds of his sentence was served.

It would hearten and encourage Manfred to hear from Friends and Members of Teutonic Unity, so please, do drop him a line.

Dear Friends: 20 November 1989

On November 10, the court in Stuttgart, the one that sentenced me to 13 years, denied to release me on parole. It was a real shock because nobody expected that anymore. Everything was at first moving in the right direction. Their opinion is that I have not changed enough, that I am still a "Nazi," glorifying the Führer, and that I am still trying to establish a National Socialist state.

According to our constitution, nobody can be persecuted for his political beliefs. This I was assured again and again in prison. My opinions about Hitler and the Third Reich are in no way relevant to my release. But now the judges ruled otherwise.

Of course, there is the possibility to petition the Supreme Court, which I have already done. But the outcome is more than doubtful. It is obvious that I should be kept under surveillance and out of action as long as possible. I am persecuted only for my political opinions and conviction. It is illegal, but is a fact. I will have to wait three or four months for the final decision. But I will stay at the so-called "Open House" in Kassel; I will continue to go to work in a printing firm every day; I can meet friends any time, but I will not be free. An absurd situation.

The administration of my "House" is quite alright. They do what they do what they can in order to help me. But they have to carry out the order of the court.

Being in the "Open House" means I have to care for myself, do my own cooking, my own laundry, etc.

Whilst the communist part of Germany is opening the gates, millions are set free overnight, a political dissident like me is locked up for an indefinite time in the so-called Free West. It could be that there will be less freedom of opinion in the West than there might be in the East. Dramatic changes are taking place in every Eastern country.

Sometimes I wonder whether only the Communists need to change? Is our system so flawless, are our politicians so above criticism that nobody needs to apologize, nobody needs to be fired? No retirement necessary? Heaven help us if we stay in that attitude.

Free opinion is more and more possible in the East, and more and more suppressed in the West. The court in Stuttgart left no doubt that their only interest is— to shut me up, that I should quit writing. But that I will never do.

Little Known Facts Behind The Wirtschaftswunder

James Gibbs Stuart shows how West Germany started the post-war era as a debt-free country

This is a reprint of Chapter 12 of the book, The Money Bomb, by James Gibb Stuart, available from the BNP Book Service, 154 Upper Wickham Lane, Welling, Kent DA16 3DP, ENGLAND.

One of the remarkable features of the post-war period was the rapid regeneration of the econo-mies of Germany and Japan, the former Axis pow-ers laid low by strategic bombing and military conquest, so that for several years, with their cities reduced to heaps of rubble, and many of their industries blasted out of existence, millions scraped and scratched for a living that would only then be made bearable by international relief based mainly upon American generosity.

Latterly, as the rebuilding progressed, as new cities and industries sprang up on the ruins of the old, and as international investment flooded in to take advantage, the erstwhile victorious allies became grudgingly aware of an economic miracle. Stimulated by the outside investment, and by their own resolve to make it effective, the Germans and Japanese were soon back into competition with the nations who had so recently ground them into the dust, and their momentum was such that they quickly assumed a predominance, outselling their rivals for quality, delivery, and price in a large range of goods, from automobiles to micro-computer technology.

When endeavouring to explain this astonishing revival, socio-economists would point to the natural discipline and industriousness of the German and Japanese peoples, their willingness to accept strong leadership and their almost fanatical determination to wipe out the privations and humiliations of the military surrender. They would also indicate that the almost total destruction of obsolescent plant and factory complexes was a hidden blessing, in that it cleared the way for massive schemes of modernisation which would leave the vanquished with a dramatic technological advantage.

"Makes you wonder who won the war," the British and French would say in their own respective fashion, as German-manufactured products started taking over their most favoured markets, and the Deutschmark became the preferred currency in the most expensive watering places of the Cote d'Azur. Meanwhile, America was rather belatedly waking up to the fact that there was more of the vital semi-conductor output sited upon the islands of Honshu and Hokkaido than upon the entire American continent.

That Hyper-Inflation in the Weimar Republic

So! The Allies had won the war and lost the peace that followed. Were the Germans and the Japanese proving to be superior peoples in the new technological age that had been ushered in by the robot and the computer? Were those sturdy Teutons so much more capable of sustained and productive effort than their fellow Anglo-Saxons across the Channel?

Had Japan's centuries of family tribalism, projected into an industrial dimension, produced a formula for economic predominance which would leave the bemused western peoples further and further behind? And in the United Kingdom context, was it much to do with the backwardness and pigheadedness of British trade unions, which indulged in endless strikes and mindless bickering whilst their markets and their industrial prosperity were being snatched from under their noses?

The author had nothing original to offer upon the resilience and versatility of the Japanese. But the Germans are a part of Europe and its ancient culture, and there are certain aspects of their recent history which have never been accorded their true significance vis-à-vis national effort and productivity.

The British, proud of the longevity and continuity of their institutions, are inclined to look with disdain and self-congratulation upon the cataclysms which from time to time befall their more volatile neighbours. The French and Russians have had their bloody revolutions, their guillotines and their purges. The Germans had their Bismarck, their Kaiser and their Hitler, all of whom led them into disaster [Well, that is one man's, one Englishman's opinion. The facts, however, point to entirely different "statesmen," who not only brought disaster upon Germany but also brought about the Suicide of Europe. —Editor, Liberty Bell] in one way or another. They had also had an extraordinary hyper-inflation in the aftermath of the First World War, during which it needed a shopping bag full of paper currency to buy the weekly groceries, and a waggonload for a modest suburban house.

That was in the days of the Weimar Republic. Many traumatic stories have been told about the uncontrolled inflation which was reckoned to have wiped out the German middle classes and prepared the way for the rise of Hitler. But it also did something else which never invited popular comment. The total destruction of the post-war Mark, with all its debt-bearing loans and liabilities, had also wiped out the Federal Government debt.

An Economy Starting Without Public Debt

So when did the Germans get their Federal Debt back again? Certainly not during the Nazi regime, which began about 1933 and continued until the military collapse in 1945! The methods of Dr. Schacht, Hitler's financial wizard, were strictly unorthodox, and whatever else the Nazis did, to their own people or to the millions that languished under them, they funded their war effort without leaving behind a debt structure which would burden their successors. Post-Hitler Germany, rising like a phoenix from the rubble, did so under the aegis of a brand new banking and financial system which owed nothing to the past. Thanks to the bizarre excesses of the Weimar Republic and the unorthodoxies of Dr. Schacht, those West Germans embarked upon their economic miracle [Wirtschaftswunder] with a negligible degree of national indebtedness, whilst among their former enemies and future trading rivals, the old and settled British were funding a debt of some £25,000, and the Americans, having faithfully and steadfastly borrowed their way through the later stages of the war, right up to and beyond the Allied victory, were annually paying interest charges on a Federal Debt of about $270,000 million.

We can put these different circumstances into perspective if we relate them to the financial stringencies of the nineteen-eighties, and reflect upon the number of desirable projects which we have seen canceled or deferred because money was tight or outrageously expensive. It pinpoints the advantages enjoyed by an economy which did not need to set aside a substantial portion of its annual budget just to service a debt which had been established at the beginning of the eighteenth century.

End of the Miracle

Naturally, the West Germans would not have been accepted into the international community unless they were willing to play the financial game according to the rules [as laid down by the International Jewish Finance Mafia. —Editor, Liberty Bell]. That meant the newly constituted Bundesbank would finance the era of industrial regeneration and expansion by lending money to the Government. Thus by 1950, the Federal Republic's debt had got to 7,000 million Deutschmark, to DM17,000 million by 1955, and DM33,000 million ten years further on. Divide by four to get an approximate figure in Pounds Sterling, and you will see that the Germans' initial advantage was being progressively eroded—though not in relation to their former wartime enemies, who just kept getting deeper and deeper into hock.

None of this should be taken as a comprehensive explanation of the differences in output per man-hour between the old and settled British and their European rivals. Many factors have a bearing upon that comparative degree of productivity, and only one of them is being considered here. But no-one should minimise the restrictions, inhibitions and downright discouragements which fall upon the wealth-producing sectors of an economy which labours under a crushing burden of government-funded debt.

Taxation, as every industrial cost-accountant knows, acts as a direct curb on output. The working man works expressly for himself and his family. He may accept heavy taxes for a specific purpose and for a limited period, but above a certain level further imposts invoke the law of diminishing returns. A man will tend to allocate the working day as between the time he's earning for himself and the time when he's working for the Government—and the Government will invariably get the worst of the bargain.

That is the true and inescapable cost of a debit-financing system which attacks the productive worker at the very source of his earnings. It explains to a large extent why the British and their allies won the war but lost the peace that followed. It also explains much of the sourness, slackness and bloody-minded lack of co-operation which have characterised worker-management relations in the post-war years. A labour force which sees its efforts rewarded by a positive improvement in living standards is usually too busy clocking up output bonuses to tolerate strike, go-slows and the gerrymandering of politically motivated shop stewards.

Such, for a time, was the happy position of the West German factory operative when, with a negligible Federal Debt, and dramatic improvements in the economic life of the nation, he could see only too clearly the benefits of his high productivity. It did not necessarily make him a superman, merely a functionary whose self-interest coincided with the needs of his industry. With the Federal Republic rapidly acquiring its own quota of post-war debt, and taking taxes out of the economy to pay for it, the benefits for the individual were progressively eroded—and the German miracle was over.

European Nemesis

The impending collapse of the Iron Curtain, says John Tyndall, bids to shatter an entire world of falsehoods, myths and illusions.

Much more than Communism stands to suffer liquidation as a result of current events now taking place in the countries of the so-called 'Eastern Bloc'. What is doomed to fall apart is the whole structure of ideas and strategies that have passed for conventional wisdom over most of the present century—a structure dogmatically maintained by the British Establishment and serving to justify every major act of British policy during that time.

William Wallace, writing in the Sunday Times Magazine on the 29th October in an article headed 'The shape of things to come', focused our minds on the issue when he began by saying: "Where shall we be without the cold war?" He continued: "As the cold war melts away, historical memories are beginning to re-emerge as political realities."

One important reality that Mr. Wallace clearly had in mind was the profound alteration in the balance of power in Europe brought about by the looming prospect of German reunification. "The core of Europe," he said, "is Germany...from the unification of Germany in 1871 until its division in 1945, the central geopolitical position of the German state and the dynamism of its economy became the axis around which European politics revolved."

The merging of the two Germanies—until quite recently a seemingly remote contingency—has been turned by recent events within the DDR [=Deutsche Demokratische Republik] into one that we must now view as probable within the coming decade. Said Norman MacRae, writing in the Sunday Times News Focus a week later: "The two big events of the 1990s...will be the reunion of Germany and the break-up of the Soviet Union." He continued: "The Fourth German Reich, some 78 million people rich and strong, will then temporarily replace the Soviet Disunion as our nearest super-power."

Similar terminology was used by John Ellison, writing in the Daily Express on November 6th, when he headed his report from East Berlin 'Freedom march that may create a Fourth Reich'. Mr. Ellison's thesis was that the present massive exodus from East to West Germany was likely before long to bring down the rotting and crumbling DDR regime. Only Soviet tanks could save it," and said the writer, "that is an option most believe Mr. Gorbachev has ruled out." He continued, speaking of West Germany: "Faced with a choice between the Common Market and the rebuilding of the old German Empire, which way would Bonn's rulers move?" Said Ellison: "European leaders such President Mitterand and his colleague Jacques Delors, President of the Brussels Commission, are so alarmed at the outcome should that question be posed that they are demanding the creation of an early European federation to which West Germany's future could be firmly anchored."

As well they might! But their plans would in any event be futile since, whatever formal relationship West Germany may have with the EEC [=European Economic Community], such a relationship would never be allowed by the Germans to stand in the way of the reunification of their country and people. Not the EEC, but only America and Russia, could prevent this happening, and neither, as Mr. Ellison acknowledged, are likely to do so. "Soviet sources," he said, "are hinting that if the collapse of East Germany meant the creation of a neutral zone (Germany) at the centre of Europe and the withdrawal of American forces, then it would be perfectly acceptable to Moscow."

And acceptable to Washington? Probably. Said Ellison: "Mr. Bush has already accepted the concept of a reunified Germany...There is also open debate as to when American troops can be returned home, resulting in huge budget economies."

Back to Square One

While all three of the quoted writers have done us the service of pointing out certain facts of overwhelming importance that are going to face us in the future, none of them, of course, has dared to extract from those facts the deductions that inevitably follow—deductions that make a nonsense of the whole world-picture underlying British Government actions during the 20th century and the dominant consensus of British public opinion during that same period.

What coming developments in Europe are going to do, in effect, is reverse the verdict of both the First and Second World War, and thereby invalidate the entire strategic criteria on which rested the British foreign policy leading to those wars.

According to the prevailing orthodoxy, the two world wars were fought to prevent German domination of the European Continent. Yet here we are back to square one, facing just that situation—one of the historical memories that, according to Mr. Wallace in the Sunday Times Magazine, "are beginning to re-emerge as political realities." The crucial question is: is not the re-emergence of this political reality something that enlightened statesmanship should have foreseen from the very beginning, when the strategy of keeping Germany down was first decided upon? What has happened is that Europeans have been made to wade through oceans of blood, in two successive holocausts that have witnessed the slaughter of the finest of our race, to prevent happening that which was bound anyway to happen. If German supremacy in the European theatre was a natural and inevitable development—intrinsic, as Mr. Wallace has indicated, "in the central geopolitical position of the German state and the dynamism of its economy," and also, as he did not say but might have said, in the fact that there some 25-30 million more Germans in Europe than there are Britons or French—then by what measure of insanity can the mind-numbing destruction of 1914-1918 and 1939-1945 by justified? In effect, present developments are consigning all 'orthodox' British strategists and policy-makers since the beginning of the century to the corner of the classroom where they should be required to wear the dunce's caps of children who have got their sums horribly wrong.

And the biggest dunce's cap of all should be placed squarely on the head of Winston Churchill, whose life's mission might be summed up in the words he uttered in 1936, before Hitler had marched into Austria, Czechoslovakia or Poland: "Germany is getting too strong. We must destroy her." Were the Establishment's tribal deity to enjoy the gift of resurrection in the Europe of 1989, what, one wonders, would be his thoughts?

A EUROPE OF NATIONS

This, indeed, brings us to the next of the historical memories that are again appearing as political realities: the fact that Europe is not, never has been, and never can be anything other than a collection of nation-states—nation-states which may indeed coalesce into certain combinations at certain times and in order to achieve certain objectives which, just for the moment, they may feel they share in common—but nevertheless nation-states above all, who will never, except in fits of momentary treason to themselves, work for any higher aims than those of their individual and separate national interests.

Were it otherwise, there would not be the slightest reason to view as a momentous event the reunification of the two Germanies and the assumption by a unified Germany of the position of a European super-power—the 'Fourth Reich', in the words of Messrs. MacRae and Ellison. Were the present European community anything more than just a purely ephemeral organisation—were it in fact the embryonic European national state of the future—German unification would be seen as no more significant than the merging of, say, Lancashire and Yorkshire to make what would be by far Britain's largest county and one whose gross product well exceeded all the others. But precisely because Germany—throughout all the years of her internal division and the incorporation of one part within the EEC and the other within the Communist Bloc—has remained a nation, just as Britain, France and the rest have remained nations, committed to the furtherance of national interests, the unification of Germany is to be an event of profound significance to the whole international contest of power which is yet another re-emerging reality of which we must take account.

The same reality is asserting itself in the rapid erosion of the Soviet monolith, the Iron Curtain, and the 'cold war.' Instead of the Eastern European nations being regarded, and regarding themselves, as some kind of homogenised entity called the 'Communist Bloc', the 'Warsaw Pact', or some such grouping, they are again emerging into the daylight as what they always were: Poles, Hungarians, Latvians, Lithuanians, Estonians, and, yes, Germans! They no more represent a common interest than the states of the EEC represent a common interest. If they all share in common the fact that they are 'Europeans', then it is only in the same sense as Americans, Canadians, Australians, New Zealanders and White South Africans are Europeans. An anthropological similarity and cultural affinity do not in themselves eliminate national traditions and loyalties that have taken centuries to form, any more than those national traditions and loyalties can be eliminated by the artificial graftings of political ideology by which the European nations have been herded together into supra-national blocs since 1945.

And it is now the falling apart of that phony and ersatz concept known as the 'cold war' that is sweeping away the last of the remaining excuses for European nations to be grouped together in alliances that have never corresponded in the slightest to real national interests but have only been constructed in defence of political systems now, at least in one case, near expiry.

This 'cold war', as pointed out in numerous articles in this magazine over the years, never was a reality—how could it be when its two principal 'antagonists' had been in constant co-operation throughout the globe for its entire duration? But what it did do was serve as a pretext for the joint occupation of Europe—in particular of Germany—by U.S. and Soviet forces. This much was admitted, at least partially, by Mr. Wallace in his article, when he said:

> The institutional structures of post-war Europe—NATO, the European Community—were erected to hold back a reviving Germany as well as to protect the West from the Soviet threat. On the other side, the Soviet forces in East Germany were stationed there as much to guard against the threat of a reunited Germany as to bring pressure on the West.

And:

> British and French government made ritual commitments to the reunification of Germany as a NATO objective, at West Germany's insistence; but in reality they were happier with a status-quo which kept the Germans politically subordinate. That status-quo is now dissolving as American and Soviet troops get ready to leave...

The only difference between the 'cold war' theory now and in former years is that, whereas in the past its fraudulence was largely concealed, today the theory is lacking credence in the eyes of increasing millions. Russia under Stalin and his successors and imitators could be made to appear as a power that genuinely menaced the West, no matter how empty that menace was in reality; in the case of Russia under Gorbachev, such a pretence can no longer be maintained. Europe thus reverts to what it was in the 1930s and before: not a continent divided into mutually hostile and sparring internationalist blocs but one comprised of many nations, pursuing national interests and for the most part unwilling to be the vassals either of Russia or the United States.

FUTURE OF THE COMMON MARKET

What is the future of the European Common Market in this scenario? With so many powerful forces backing it, it would be premature to say that the Market is due soon to disintegrate. What most certainly is happening, however, is the dismantling of one of its major raisons d'etre. Even to those not persuaded by the economic arguments in support of the EEC, the concept has had an appeal as long as it could be presented as a means of promoting greater solidarity among Western Europeans in the face of an apparent 'threat' from the East. Now that that 'threat' is being exposed as the illusion it always was, such a coalition falls by the wayside. With this, there is bound to come a call for the 'European Community' to extend its embrace to Russia's former satellites and thus for its boundaries to become 'wider still and wider'. Such a development will, of course, be welcomed by doctrinaire internationalists and their backers in the world of cosmopolitan finance. However, the wider the Community embrace the more diverse the national aspirations and interests it will have to accommodate. It has all, of course, been seen before. There was the Roman Empire, followed by the Holy Roman Empire. There was Napoleon's Continental System. There was the Empire of the Habsburgs. Each in its days seemed to contemporaries to point the way to the European future, but each disintegrated as the forces of ethnic nationalism reasserted themselves, as they always do. Now those forces are again rampant, not only within the Soviet Bloc but within the Soviet Union itself. They are also rearing their head again in Yugoslavia and threatening to tear that artificial state apart. If they still lie somewhere beneath the surface in Western Europe, this state of affairs is likely to change dramatically as Germany emerges from occupation and division and redraws the map of the continent along much the old lines.

For all these reasons, we should not regard the EEC as an organisation likely to survive in the longer term—unless it does so simply in the way that the Commonwealth has survived: as something of an old boys' 'club', held together by nothing more than political origins and nominal allegiance to certain paper abstractions, taken seriously by an ever declining minority. Without Germany, the EEC would become a hollow shell; with Germany it would cease to be what it has claimed to be over all these years—an international partnership—and would become merely a euphemism for German hegemony, just as 'Soviet Union' and 'Communist Bloc' have always been euphemisms for the hegemony of Russia.

BRITAIN'S POSITION

We come finally to the question which, to this writer, is by far the most important of all: that of what Britain's position is going to be in the face of these coming developments. First, however, we must get fixed clearly in our minds the areas in which such developments are exploding and demolishing the principal pillars of the established 'orthodoxy' that has ruled British thinking in modern times, namely:

(1) The idea that there is any lasting way of preventing Germany from asserting her position as the dominant power in Europe. History brought up to date has clearly demonstrated that such prevention can only ever be temporary, and would require a major European war two or three times every century for it to be achieved. Is this what we want?

(2) The myth of a 'cold war' dividing Europe by reason of a supposed 'threat' on the part of Russia and her minions to march westwards, and the resulting pretext for the Western European nations, together with others in NATO, to combine in a common defensive front.

(3) The idea that there is an essential common interest uniting the nations of the EEC, together with the idea that, with the coming enlargement of Germany, the EEC can be anything other than an instrument of Germany hegemony.

(4) The idea that, in the circumstances indicated above, Britain can play a central and leading role in the European Community and accommodate its policies to British interests.

With these illusions swept away, we may see that British foreign policy throughout most of the present century has been one long chapter of disaster, since it has been based on a series of suppositions about Europe that events are proving to be utterly groundless. Such a recognition is a necessary prelude to any serious examination of the question of where we go from here. We clearly must not go in the direction we have been going in the past and are still going now.

BASIS OF BRITISH POWER

From the first moment that Anglo-Saxons established substantial communities in near-empty continents thousands of miles overseas the basis of British power has always been oceanic and global, rather than European. Britain-in-Europe possesses about the same size of population and less than half the territory of France, while Germany exceeds us in population by about 50 percent. On the other hand, the people of British stock living beyond Europe are greatly more in number than those of either French or German stock, while the lands they inhabit are many times in excess of the areas and resources of either France of Germany. An estimate of power on the basis of pure statistics is, of course, an unreliable one—other factors have to be taken into account. But assuming some sort of equality in these other factors, statistics do indeed count. Not only is size of population of importance—in the way of manpower for military use when needed and also as a consumer market for industry—but so also is area and living space, inasmuch as these factors regulate what population growth is possible without undue strain on resources of land.

Seen in this light, Britain was extremely well placed to retain her great-power status—for as long as she took care to keep her connections with her overseas kindred close and intact, and exploited every opportunity to make them stronger. As long as British leaders understood and pursued this concept of an oceanic destiny, this country was set on the right course of development. Even Churchill himself showed a glimmering of recognition of this truth when he said that Britain, "when forced to choose between Europe and the open seas, would always choose the open seas." All the more the pity that WC, by the time he died, had done so much to foul up the sea routes in which he professed to believe.

This did not mean that Britain could always afford to isolate herself from European affairs. What happened in Europe was of import to us just for as long as we faced serious European rivals in our overseas spheres of influence. These rivals were, respectively, Spain and France. It therefore became sound policy to oppose Spanish and French power in Europe for as long as that power, if released from European commitments, could be used against us in the New World. By the final quarter of the 19th century, however, Spanish world power had become a thing of the distant past, while that of France could no longer pose any serious threat to us in our two spheres of influence of great importance, namely Canada and Australasia.

NO THREAT

Germany, by contrast, in no case ever represented a rival to us in these vital areas. The time that marked Germany's assumption of European ascendancy was therefore the time that marked the end of any need for Britain herself to embroil herself in European quarrels in pursuit of the 'balance-of-power' strategy (to be exact, the first came a little while after the second). At any rate, from 1871 onwards, Britain's proper policy should have been to detach herself from European politics and economics, while, of course, remaining very much a part of Europe culturally. A whole vast world across the oceans beckoned to us and should have absorbed our entire energies and whatever blood we were prepared to risk spilling on the part of our manhood. We could therefore well have afforded to let natural forces on the Continent take their course, elevating Germany to the position of leading European power, as they were bound to do; so long as we remained consistent in pursuit of our oceanic destiny, such a development could in no way threaten us.

By the time of the outset of World War II, the British Empire and Commonwealth possessed a white population which on its own was nearly the equal of that of Greater Germany in Europe, while the natural resources available to that Empire and Commonwealth were far in excess of anything to which the Germans could hope to aspire. Even in the illogical, and therefore highly improbable, event of Germany coveting some possession within the British sphere of influence in preference to expansion within Europe, the combined resources of the British World as it was at that time should have been more than adequate to deter her from any aggressive design against us.

But Britain could not be two thing at once: she could not be a European power while at the same time trying to hold on to her world power. And while, within Europe, she could not hope to be more than a power of the second rank in relation to Germany, on a global level she could have been a power of at least equal rank to Germany, while seeking her development in spheres that provided the best possible assurance of an avoidance of Anglo-German conflict.

Britain, as we know, did not take the course that all rational assessments of her interest required that she should take. She aligned herself with the anti-German coalition in World War II and made a vast expenditure of blood and treasure—for what? To prevent happening what, half a century later, is now happening: the capturing by Germany of European leadership. The one difference between now and then is that, whereas in 1939 Germany's greater population and resources in the European theatre were counter-balanced by Britain's imperial populations and possessions beyond, today Britain to all intents and purposes cut herself off from those imperial populations and possessions and is stripped down to the role of an under-resourced and overcrowded island, doomed by the decision of her rulers to play the part of a second-fiddle European power instead of a first-class world power. Can history offer any example of greater folly?

Even the lunacy of the anti-German crusade of 1939-1945 could have been limited in its effects had Britain then used the post-war years to extricate herself from Europe and consolidate her position with her dominions overseas. But she did not do this; instead, she declared to the world that she saw her future as lying in Europe, and in the process alienated the vast reservoir of good-will she still possessed across the oceans among people of her own kind. The dominions, snubbed by the mother country, drifted away into the American and Japanese orbits, where they remain today.

WHAT MUST NOW BE DONE

I am one of those who believe that it is not yet too late to remedy this lunacy and set our nation back on an alternative course. But even if I should be proved wrong the effort must still be made—for there is no alternative open to us if we are to have a future worth living for. Anyone who seriously believes that Britain can have a future in a united Europe dominated, as it inevitably will be, by a single German Reich is living in pure cloud-cuckoo-land, and in fact supporting what is bound to become a prescription for yet further Anglo-German enmity—something of which we have had quite enough.

The path towards a renewal of Britain's oceanic ties will be a long and difficult one—contending, as it must, with numerous formidable obstacles that are our legacy of the disastrous policies of the past 30-40 years. What first has to be achieved, above all else, is clear-headedness as to the necessity of the aim, and the silencing of those defeatist voices among us that counsel that it cannot be done. In this respect we might learn something from those Germans who have been the focus of much of this article. To them, at one time the reunification of their divided peoples seemed a distant, perhaps impractical, dream—given the apparent strength of the forces keeping those peoples apart. Today, all has changed, and yesterday's dream looks like becoming tomorrow's reality—one of the political realities that, according to Mr. William Wallace, was not long ago merely an historical memory.

To us British lies the task of making the greatness of our own nation yet another. □

Policy Statement on Germany

by Chancellor Helmut Kohl

In the German Bundestag

November 28, 1989

Since the opening of the intra-German border and sector boundary in Berlin on November 9th, German-German politics has entered into a new phase, which offers new chances and poses new challenges.

We are all overjoyed about the newly-won freedom of movement for those living in divided Germany. We, along with those Germans in the GDR, are glad that the Wall and border blockades could finally, after decades, be overcome peacefully.

We are also proud that Germans in the GDR have, with their powerful and peaceful intercession for freedom, human rights and self-determination, shown an example of their courage and love of freedom for the whole world, an example which is being estimated throughout the world.

We are all deeply impressed by the lively and unbroken desire for freedom, which is moving the people of Leipzig and other cities. They know what they want. They want to determine their own future, in the true sense of the word. We will, of course, respect every decision made by the people of the GDR under conditions of free self-determination.

We, in the free part of Germany, stand in solidarity alongside our fellow countrymen.

At the beginning of last week, Federal Minister Seiters spoke with the Chairman of the State Council, Krenz, and Prime Minister, Modrow about the new East German leaderships position. We wanted to learn how the announced reform program shall be put into effect and in within which time period concrete steps are to be expected.

It has been agreed to continue discussions at the beginning of December. If, as we hope, initial results can be seen in these discussions, I would personally like to meet the responsible parties in the GDR before Christmas.

Federal Minister Seiters also spoke with representatives of the opposition and the Church inn East Berlin. In the last few weeks, I have personally welcomed representatives of the opposition in Bonn. We regard it as advisable to take into account the views, opinions and recommendations of the opposition in the GDR in all the moves and decisions currently being made. We continue to place great value upon these contacts and want to carefully cultivate them in the future.

Chances are arising for us to overcome the division of Europe and that of our fatherland. The Germans, who are reuniting in the spirit of freedom, will never pose a threat but will rather be of benefit to a Europe which is growing together.

The move to change, currently being experienced, is primarily the deserts of the people who are so impressively demonstrating their will for freedom. It is also, however, the result of the many political developments of years gone by. We have also made substantial contributions to these developments with our policy.

- First, it was decisive that we conducted this policy on the solid foundation of our integration in the community of free democracies. The uniformity and steadfastness of the Alliance during the difficult test of 1983 have paid off. We have strengthened the backbone of the reform movement in Central, Eastern and South-Eastern Europe by pursuing our clear course within the Atlantic Alliance and in the European Community.

- We have, with the transition to new stages of economic and political integration within the European Community, successfully further developed the model for the free coalition of European peoples, a coalition which has attractive powers far beyond the Community.

- On the other hand, General Secretary Gorbachev's reform policy within the Soviet Union and the new way of thinking in Soviet foreign policy were a decisive prerequisite. Without their recognition of the rights of peoples and countries to determine their own course, the reform movements in other countries of the Warsaw Pact would not have been successful.

- If Poland and Hungary had not led the way with far-reaching political, economic and social reforms, the dramatic occurrences in the GDR would not have taken place . I welcome the fact that changes are also becoming apparent in Bulgaria, and the CSSR. I am particularly pleased that the winner of this year's German Book Trade Peace Prize, Vaclav Havel, is now finally able to harvest the fruits of his long-standing work and suffering for freedom. His magnificent acceptance speech at the Paulskirche in Frankfurt, which he himself could not deliver, was an impressive final reckoning with the socialist-communist system.

- The CSCE process also played an important role. We, together with our partners, have always pressed for a dismantling of sources of tension, on dialogue and co-operation, and most particularly for the respect of human rights.

- Thanks to the continual summit diplomacy of the major powers and the numerous intensive meetings between Eastern and Western heads of state and government, a new trust was able to develop in East-West relations. The historical breakthrough in disarmament and arms control is a visible expression of this trust.

- The broadly based contractual policy of the Federal Government towards the Soviet Union and all other Warsaw Pact states has made considerable contributions and given important impulses to the development of East-West relations.

- The consistent policy with regard to the coherence of our nation is amongst the causes of the most recent changes. Since 1987, millions of fellow countrymen from the GDR have visited us, amongst them many young people. Our "small step policy" has, in difficult times, kept awake and sharpened the sense of the unity of the nation, and has deepened that of German fellowship.

This is particularly apparent at the present time.

These developments refute all gloomy predictions by those people who have been predicting a "new ice age" in East-West relations since the beginning of my term of office, and who have accused us and myself personally - of being unable to foster peace. Exactly the opposite is the case.

reference to modern high-speed trains.

Third: I have offered to extensively extend our aid and co-operation, should fundamental changes of the political and economic system in the GDR be firmly agreed upon and put irrevocably into effect. By irrevocable, we mean that the East German leadership comes to an understanding with opposition groups concerning constitutional change and a new electoral law.

We support the demands for free, equal and secret elections in the GDR incorporating independent, even non-socialist parties. The power monopoly of the SED must be lifted.

The introduction of the rule of constitutional law means, above all, the abolition of laws concerning political crimes.

Economic aid can only be effective if fundamental reforms within the economic system take place. Previous experience with all COMECON states has shown this. The bureaucratic planned economy must be dismantled.

We do not want to stabilize conditions which have become indefensible. Economic improvement can only occur if the GDR opens its doors to Western investment, if conditions of free enterprise are created and if private enterprise becomes possible. There are already examples of this in Hungary and Poland, which can be used by the GDR for orientation. Under these conditions, joint ventures would soon be possible. Many firms, both at home and abroad, have expressed willingness to undertake such ventures.

These are not preconditions but factual prerequisites needed before our aid can take effect. Additionally, there can be no doubt that the people in the GDR want an economic order which can also provide them with economic freedom and wealth.

Fourth: Prime Minister Modrow spoke in his governmental declaration of a "contractual community." We are prepared to adopt these thoughts. The proximity and the special nature of the relationship between the two German states demand an increasingly close-knit network of agreements in all sectors and at all levels.

This co-operation will also increasingly demand common institutions. Commissions which already exist can be given new tasks and further commissions can be created. Here I am particularly thinking of the economic, transport, environmental, scientific and technical, health and cultural sectors. It goes without saying that Berlin will be fully included in these co-operative efforts.

I call upon all social groups and institutions to actively participate in the development of such an contractual community.

Fifth: We are also prepared to take a further decisive step, namely, to develop confederative structures between the two states in Germany. Here, the goal it to create a federation, a federal state order in Germany. For this, a legitimatized democratic government in the GDR is an indispensable prerequisite.

We can imagine that, soon after free elections take place, the following institutions could be created:

- a common government committee for permanent consultation and political coordination,

- common technical committees,

- a common parliamentary gremium.

Previous policy with reference to the GDR had to essentially limit itself to small steps. These strove to alleviate the condition of national division and keep awake and sharpen the sense of national unity. If in the future, a democratically legitimated, that is, a freely elected government becomes our partner, new perspectives will become available.

posite has occurred. Today, we have a greater sense of understanding and community in Germany and Europe than has ever been felt since the end of World War II.

Today, as everyone can see, we have reached a new epoch in European and German history, an age which points beyond the status quo, and the former political structures in Europe.

The change is primarily the work of people who insist on the concession of freedom, on the respect of their human rights and on their right to determine their own future.

All who carry responsibility in and for Europe have to make allowance for the will of people and nations. We are all called upon to design a new architecture for the house of Europe and for a permanent and just order of peace on our continent - as both General Secretary Gorbachev and I already stressed in our common declaration of June 13th this year.

Hereby the legitimate interests of all parties concerned must be guaranteed. This, of course, is also true of German interests.

We are therefore approaching the goal already set by the Atlantic Alliance in December 1967 - I quote: "A final and stable settlement in Europe is ... not possible without a solution to the German question, which forms the nucleus of the current tensions in Europe. Any settlement of that kind must remove the unnatural barriers between Eastern and Western Europe, which are manifested in the clearest and most atrocious fashion in the division of Germany."

We cannot plan the way to unity from our "armchairs" or with our appointment calendars. Abstract models will help us no further. Today, however, we are in a position to prepare in advance those stages which lead to this goal. I would like to elucidate these with a Ten-Point-Program:

First: Immediate measures need to be taken. These result from the events of the past few weeks, particularly the movement of refugees and the new dimensions of intra-German traffic.

The Federal Government is prepared to provide immediate concrete aid where it is needed. We will assist in the humanitarian sector and provide medical assistance as far as is required.

We are also aware that the "welcome money," which is given once a year to every visitor from the GDR, is not a long-term solution for the financing of travel. The GDR must equip its nationals with the necessary currency. We are, however, prepared to contribute to a currency fund for a limited period of time. This is conditional upon the abolishment of the currency exchange requirement for persons entering the GDR and also requires that entry into the GDR be made easier. Also, the GDR must be willing to make a considerable contribution to this fund.

Our aim is to establish the most unhindered form of tourist travel possible in both directions.

Second: The Federal Government will, as before, continue its co-operation with the GDR in all areas where it is of direct benefit to people on both sides. This is particularly true of economic, scientific and technological co-operation and of co-operation in cultural fields. It is of particular importance to intensify co-operation in the field of environmental protection. Here we will be able to shortly take decisions concerning new projects.

Additionally, we also want to help to ensure that the telephone network in the GDR is expanded as quickly as possible.

We are continuing negotiations pertaining to the expansion of the railway network Hanover-Berlin. In addition, we need to discuss fundamental questions concerning rail traffic within a Europe with open borders the linking of the GDR network, with particular Gradually, new forms of institutional co-operation can be created and further developed. A coalescence of this kind is inherent in the continuity of German history. State organizations within Germany have always been confederations or federations. We can once again make use of this historical heritage.

Nobody knows how a reunified Germany will look. I am sure, however, that unity will come, if it is wanted by the German nation.

Sixth: The development of inner-German relations remains embedded in the overall European process and in East-West relations. The future structure of Germany must fit into the future architecture of Europe as a whole. The West has to provide pace-making aid here with its concept for a permanent and just European peace order.

In our common declaration of June this year, the Soviet leader Gorbachev and I spoke of the building elements of a "common European house." I can name, for example:

- Unlimited respect for the integrity and security of each state. Each state has the right to choose its own political and social system.

- Unconditional respect for the principles and standards of international law, particularly respect for the peoples' right of self-determination.

- The realization of human rights.

- Respect for, and upholding of the historically-based cultures of the people of Europe.

With all of these points, as Mr. Gorbachev and I set down, we want to link onto the historically-based European traditions and help to overcome the divisions in Europe.

Seventh: The power of attraction and the aura of the European Community are and remain a constant feature in European development. We want to strengthen this further.

The European Community is now required to approach the reform-oriented states in Central, Eastern, and Southern Europe with openness and flexibility. This was determined unanimously by the Heads of State and Government of the EEC member states during their recent meeting in Paris.

This of course includes the GdR.

- The Federal government therefore supports the quick conclusion of a trade and co-operation agreement with the GDR. This would expand and secure the GDR's entry into the Common Market, including the perspectives of 1992.

- For the future, we can envision specific forms of association which would lead the economies of the reform-oriented countries of Central and South-Eastern Europe to the EC, and thereby dismantle the economic and social differences on our continent.

We understand the process leading to the recovery of German unity to be a European concern. It must, therefore, be considered together with European integration. In keeping with this, the European Community must remain open to a democratic GDR and to other democratic countries from Central and South-Eastern Europe. The EC must not end on the Elbe, but must remain open to the East.

Only in this way is it possible that the foundation of the EC truly include a comprehensive European unity. Only in this way can it maintain, assert and develop the identity characteristic of all European nations. This identity is not only based on the cultural diversity of Europe, but also, and especially, on the fundamental values of freedom, democracy, human rights and self-determination.

If the countries of Central and South-Eastern Europe fulfil the necessary prerequisites, we would also welcome their entrance into the European Council, especially into the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

Eight: The CSCE process is and remains a centerpiece of the total European architecture and must be vigorously advanced. In order to do this, the following CSCE forums must be taken advantage of:

- The Human Rights Conferences in Copenhagen, in 1990, and in Moscow, in 1991.
- The Conference on Economic Cooperation in Bonn, in 1990.
- The Cultural Inheritance Symposium in Cracow, in 1991 and
- last but not least, the next CSCE meeting in Helsinki.

There we should think about new institutional forms for European cooperation. We envision a common institution for the coordination of East-West economical cooperation, as well as the creation of a European Environmental Council.

Ninth: The surmounting of the separation of Europe and the division of Germany demands far-reaching and speedy steps pertaining to disarmament and arms control. Disarmament and arms control must keep step with political developments and therefore, might have to be accelerated.

This is particularly true of the negotiations in Vienna for the dismantling of conventional armed forces in Europe and for the agreement upon measures to establish trust, such as the worldwide ban of chemical weapons. This also demands that the nuclear potential of superpowers be reduced to a strategic minimum. The pending meeting between President Bush and General Secretary Gorbachev offers a good opportunity to add new impetus to current negotiations.

We are trying - even in bilateral discussions with the countries of the Warsaw Pact, including the GDR - to support this process.

Tenth: With this sweeping policy, we are working towards the attainment of freedom within Europe, whereby the nouncement made at the NATO Summit in Brussels, in May of this year.

We are conscious of the fact that particularly difficult problems will arise on the road to German unity - problems to which we cannot yet provide a final answer to today. Above all, this includes questions pertaining to overlapping security structures within Europe.

The linking of the German question to European developments and East-West relations, as I have explained in the previous ten points, enables an organic development which takes into consideration the interests of all concerned and guarantees a peaceful co-existence in Europe.

Only together and in an atmosphere of mutual trust will we be able to peacefully overcome the division of Europe and Germany together and in an atmosphere of mutual trust. We need prudence, understanding and sound judgement on all sides so that the current developments may continue steadily and peacefully.

This process cannot hampered by reforms, but rather by the non-acceptance thereof. Freedom does not cause instability, but rather the oppression thereof. Every successful reform step means more stability and increased freedom and security for all of Europe.

A Day to Remember: 9 November 1989

by Hans Schmidt

Dear Friends:

I'll bet many of you thought I went to Berlin immediately upon hearing of the breach of the Iron Curtain on November 9, 1989. (That date will probably become a German holiday sometime in the future. Ironically, it was a major N.S. holiday during the Third Reich: Der Tag der Bewegung, the day of the National Socialist Movement.) I wish I could have gone but I felt that at that very time my place was here in the United States, and the large ad reproduced in this issue proves this point. You know the saying about the best-laid plans of mice and men. Well, I am happy to tell you that all my plans for a "quiet" November and December went out the window the moment "East" German leader Krenz was forced to "let his people go", (to borrow an often used phrase from our "dearest" political adversaries), and to open that most horrible edifice of this century, namely, the Berlin Wall.

A few hours after the first pictures of the incredible scenes near the Brandenburg Gate were shown on American television, calls from GANPAC members and supporters started coming into my office, with "everybody" obviously being tremendously elated about this earth-shaking occurrence but also inquisitive as to my assessment of the situation. Now, two weeks later, the calls are still coming in, and it is imperative that I write a special issue of the BRIEF. By now sufficient information is available to analyze the situation, and devise a possible scenario for the future. Interestingly, I heard first of the opening of the wall from an AP reporter who called me even before the news had been broadcast to the American people. I gave him a twenty-minute interview of which (not surprisingly) subsequently nothing appeared in the press. Perhaps I was a little too "Germanic-proud" in my answers.

Here we go again:

Retired general E. C. Meyer, former Army chief of staff:
If you believe the Soviet has decreased in its international threat, then the two biggest threats are reunification of Germany, and what that really might mean, and what happens in Japan if they get involved in weapons production and others like this over time...

You may recall that in these BRIEFS, for years I have been calling for the destruction of the "Status Quo of 1945", that unholy "Alliance By Tacit Agreement" of the WW2 victor nations, (particularly the United States and the Soviet Union) that was directed against Germany. The breach and negation of the Berlin Wall by the Germans themselves effectively ended the status quo, and as of November 9, 1989, a new era of world history has begun. Judging by the reactions of our enemies, I wonder whether they feel that "Das Deutsche Jahrhundert", the "German Century", has begun?

In the last GANPAC-BRIEF I wrote that the incredible welcome (like a welcome extended to long-gone family members) that the tens of thousands of mostly young "East" Germans who had fled via Hungary in September received in Bavaria had a tremendous psychological effect on all Germans everywhere, and with this single event the German "Volksgemeinschaft", namely, the feeling of belonging together as one people, one nation, was reborn. In addition we now had the mass coupling (I can't find a better word!) of Germans from East and West along the openings of the "Wall of Shame", the German word for the Berlin Wall. The latter had an even greater psychological impact, and meant at least a spiritual reunification of Germany, with the economic, political and administrative union sure to follow "soon". The dour reaction of some (politely unnamed) world leaders and of most of the Jews following the opening of the Wall definitely sprang from the realization that forty-four years of brainwashing of the German people had been for naught.

The events surrounding the breach of the Berlin Wall showed American television at its best. For days, the major networks (ABC, CBS, CNN and NBC) proved what they can do when not hindered by restrictive orders from 'the rulers'. Most of the reporters were, without question, deeply affected by the "enthusiasm for freedom" that could be seen on the faces of the German masses. The reason for this unusual behavior by the U.S. correspondents is (likely) this: the Jewish and some of the always anti-German non-Jewish bosses of the networks were as surprised by this turn of events as we were, and they simply didn't have any contingency plans for it. And, without instructions from above, the reporters spoke with their hearts, which translated into sincere sympathies for the Germans who had been held in bondage for such a long time. The only jarring notes were the ubiquitous interviews inside the United States with numerous Jewish spokesmen such as

Rabbi Hier (Simon Wiesenthal Center) whose hate against the Germans could be clearly seen in his face, and whose presence had to be embellished through the associated showing of tired footage of concentration camp scenes. Also out of place was the interview Jane Pauley had in West Berlin with an East Berlin Jewess named Irene Runge who "naturally" was against reunification, and the questioning in front of the Brandenburg Gate of a Dr. Wolfgang Ullmann, also an East Berlin Jew, by Peter Jennings. This latter interview was such an obvious attempt by the Jews in power to negatively influence the growing American sympathies for the Germans that it was sickening. The questions Peter Jennings asked Dr. Ullmann had obviously been written by somebody else (I give you ten guesses of which 'ethnic background' this somebody was). But, thankfully, Jennings "forgot" to ask what the "nice, friendly, albeit politically active, elderly Jewish gentleman" thought of the prospect of German reunification. (By the way, Dr. Ullmann had left Germany some time after Hitler's ascension to power, and spent the war years in the United States. He returned to Berlin after the German defeat, when it became apparent that Jews would have a privileged position in the new communist order. For instance, like getting—to this day!—double pensions, free apartments and free public transportation.)

"East" Germany has a population of nearly 17 million people. According to the Washington Post, only 500 of them are Jews. (USA Today writes of 5,000!) Isn't it a bit odd that 2 out of the 500 should be interviewed by major American TV networks? To me, this again proves the Jewish power and influence over the world's news media of which Cardinal Glemp spoke, a power which Jewish activists allege they do not have (but do they themselves believe what they pretend?). Coincidentally, it must be mentioned that several "Germans" in leading positions with "East" German reform movements seem to have typically Jewish visages and names. It may be part of a Jewish/Zionist attempt to play a "Solidarity"-like role in "East" Germany also. Will "they" succeed in this? I doubt it. (I have my good reasons for having these doubts.)

We can be sure that few Americans were emotionally untouched by the events in Berlin. Many, many of them told me that they were moved to tears when the "East" Germans began to cross the Wall in ever larger numbers, and had their first taste of what was usually described as freedom. This normal reaction by the American people will translate into a tremendous amount of goodwill for our cause if we act wisely and prudently. Hundreds of millions of people all over the world saw on TV a (so far) bloodless revolution occurring right before their eyes. And this was accomplished by the "warlike", "aggressive", "troublesome" Germans! Incidentally, the people in the "DDR" [=Deutsche Demokratische Republik; GDR=German Democratic Republic] themselves are proud of their "nette Revolution" (nice revolution), and their name for the great change is "die Wende" (the turn-about). One reporter mentioned that with hundreds of thousands of people who had been deprived of so many things for most of their lives coming to West Berlin (and seeing, suddenly, material abundance about them), only one mugging and one car theft had been reported. Even if these figures were in reality somewhat higher (what I suspect), there is no question that in that fateful week the Germans (both "East" and West) were at their best, and we, outside of Germany, have reason to be very proud of our heritage.

I wonder how many Americans can really imagine what it means to live almost ones' entire life in circumstances that can only be described with the previously used word "bondage". Just envision never being able to shop in a store with a complete selection of whatever you want to buy, never to eat in a decent restaurant where they have everything that is on the menu, never being able to realize your very own "personal potential" (like making a million through an invention). You may recall that I visited the "DDR" in 1985, and later told of my experiences in the Nov. 85 issue of the BRIEF. While at that time I did not embellish anything, it is also true that I did not dwell on certain negative aspects of the life over there for the simple reason that I had no intention of insulting my hosts, most of whom had been caught against their will in a system that had been imposed upon them by Moscow. The fact is that there were many facets of life in "East" Germany which I found appalling, and they had less to do with the absence of so-called democratic freedoms than with the absence of what I consider "normalcy". In this respect I have to take issue with many American pundits and politicians who regard these new developments as a victory for "American ideals and democracy". Nonsense! A free market system and beautiful shops with an abundance of wares in brightly-lit business districts existed in Berlin, Budapest, Prague and Warsaw long before the American military ever set foot on European soil in 1917. Furthermore, the United States (the American political system) cannot abdicate its co-responsibility for the great crime of keeping hundreds of millions of "Eastern" Europeans in such dire circumstances ever since the end of WW2. Lawrence Eagleburger, now again a high member of the U.S. Administration, and a former (?) collaborator of Henry Kissinger, pointed with nostalgia to the "stability" and the "peace" that had been assured through the silent acquiescence of the two superpowers. My question is this, was not the practical enslavement of hundreds of millions of people for decades under such soul-destroying conditions far worse than an occasional, short-lived European war (like the war between Prussia and Austria of 1866)? Those who now point to the two world wars "that emanated from German soil" forget that World War I was much more likely concocted in London than in Berlin, and certainly, the 1939 German invasion of Poland was far more justified than any U.S. interference in Central America, and it did not have to lead to a world conflagration.

It was the entry of the United States in two essentially European wars that caused the greatest destruction, and, ultimately, the rise of that inhuman system, communism. And while I am at it: In Hitler's Third Reich private enterprise flourished, and the brightly-lit shopping streets went dark only when the war broke out. Reading many American articles on the motives that caused tens of thousands of mostly young "DDR"-Germans to leave their homes, their jobs, and their extended families for an uncertain future in the West, the word "freedom" is used much too often and much too loosely. Is West Germany really free? Is the United States really free? Try to question the untenable "Holocaust" claims in West Germany, and you will soon discover how free the allegedly "freest state that ever existed on German soil" really is. Or, try to defend the white race publicly in the "free" United States, and see how much protection you still have under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. There are obviously other examples I could mention. What most of these people wanted was a decent life where one can look with optimism into the future, and a chance for "Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten" (an opportunity for the development of the creative and human potential of the individual). Don't you love those long German words?

Some American correspondents expressed their surprise that most of the "East" Germans returned to their homes in the GDR after their first look at the West. I was not surprised. Most Germans know by now, as well as I do, that circumstances will now change very fast, and the "DDR" leadership will have to abide by the people's desire for normalcy if they want to stay in power. (As I am writing this, it is doubtful that the Communists will be able to retain power there.) As a result, I foresee a very quick opening of the GDR to West German businesses and investments. Suppose you had a successful store in Hamburg, wouldn't you right now contemplate another one in "East" Germany, especially if the investments there were guaranteed by the West German Government (something that will likely occur)? A couple of years from now the currently dismal downtown areas of Leipzig, Dresden, East Berlin, and elsewhere will look very different. In order to accomplish this, the GDR leaders will have to revamp their currency and abolish many of their "socialist" subsidies. What does it help to have beautiful new shops if nobody has the money to buy anything? In other words, after the spiritual reunification of the Germans in the days following the opening of the Wall, we will now see (first) the unavoidable economic "equalization" which will eventually lead to economic reunification. The people over there have taken all that communistic crap for so long, and are so fed up with unnecessary deprivations that they will insist in gaining all the material advantages of their West German brothers SOON. I have a hunch that it will be the women who will be the driving force behind this change. And most of the West Germans are ready and willing to help bring about this change.

Someone close to me believes that West Germany will be impoverished by the tremendous task of rebuilding and modernizing the "East" German industry, and assuring the 17 million Germans there a decent life. I totally disagree with this assumption [—and so do I! After the end of World War II, prostrate, having their faces rubbed in the dirt, their industry dismantled and carted off, their legal Government officials kicked out and (most of them) hung in a Jewish-Ritual-Murder-like frenzy by the "Allies", the Germans faced, and mastered, a much more ominous task in rebuilding their country, their industry, and their economy—they just got their "act together" and went to work. I am sure, they will do it again on this memorable, historic occasion. —Editor, Liberty Bell]. There are about 10 million wage earners in the GDR, most of them well-trained professionals with a (hitherto) exemplary work record. Imagine what a fantastic credit risk they represent (using American nomenclature), and how much real capital can be created on the strength of this human talent pool alone. Do not be fooled by the latest negative reporting by the American media which tells of discontent at this turn of events in West Germany, and of the desire by many "East" Germans to remain separate and communist. Now that the Jewish overlords of the U.S. media have caught themselves, we can expect much more of that nonsense. It is nothing but a desperate effort to return to the 'status ante', when it was so easy to malign the Germans with "Holocaust" propaganda. According to the latest GERMAN opinion polls, approximately three quarters of all Germans on both sides of the "Wall" want reunification. This in spite of decades-old incessant anti-unification propaganda by Bonn and East Berlin rulers.

What about political reunification?

It will come, but not yet. I assume that due to pressure from abroad (West Germany and the U.S.), the "East" Germans will have to call "free" elections (for a multi-party system) in the relatively near future. Especially West Germany will insist on this since the Bonn leadership definitely does not want a resurrection of the Reich (something attainable only through an ALL German plebiscite). Allegedly free "democratic" elections, whereby the German people as a whole is never asked about true reunification, will (in the opinion of Bonn) legitimize the split of the Reich in two (or, counting Austria, three) separate states. It is the same trick one uses to claim legitimacy for the Bonn Republic, a trick they have learned from the United States where the American people is never allowed to express its will directly on important issues such as the death penalty, immigration, integration [school busing], abortion, or war. Plebiscites on such issues might go against the wishes of the great manipulators. (And someday, when they have a revolution on their hands in the United States, "they" will be surprised at the viciousness of it.) Personally, I am unequivocally for the reunification of Germany [—and so am I! —Ed.] However, I do not want an "Anschluss" of just the "DDR" with West Germany, since this would destroy very quickly that old, true Germany that, ironically, can still be found in the middle of the Fatherland but rarely in its Western part. Therefore, I am for what I call the "third solution," namely a return to the (1871) laws and the constitution of the old Reich, but, obviously, without a King or Kaiser, or a hereditary aristocracy.

The Soviet Union has approximately 380,000, and the United States 340,000 occupation troops in Germany. They are all armed to the teeth, with at least 50,000 tanks, nearly 100,000 artillery pieces and over 10,000 combat aircraft (from all nations) being stationed on German soil. For the continuing occupation of Berlin (not counting additional costs for West German territory proper) the West German taxpayers have to shell out 1,500,000,000.00 DM every year. When will the occupiers, no matter under what designation, leave? I wouldn't press the issue; in other words, I wouldn't worry much about it, knowing that both the U.S.

Germany's past

Editor: I have been having a lot of fun watching and reading the news accounts of recent events in the German Democratic Republic (known erroneously to most as East Germany, when it fact it is actually Central Germany) and the emigration from the GDR to the Federal Republic. A few historical facts bear recitation.

What is now the GDR was created through the clumsy political agreements between Franklin Roosevelt and Josef Stalin at both Teheran and Yalta Conferences. Left to the Soviet sphere, the GDR was never to receive one cent of Marshall Plan aid. Her factories (the ones that were left from the firestorm bombing of such places as Dresden and Berlin) were stripped and sent off to Moscow, Leningrad and Volgagrad as "reparations," and she was left with untold numbers of refugees, no natural resources and only the grit and determination of her 14 million people to arise from the ruins.

No objective observer can fail to see just how far those wrongly denigrated characteristics of hard work, orderliness and perseverance have paid off. Today, what was a prostrate society 40 years ago, is among the top dozen national societies in the world. Indeed, if the economies of the two artificially created German states were one, she would be the third largest economic power in the world, surpassing Japan, France, Great Britain and giving the faltering Soviet economy a run for its money, social and health schemes too.

All right-thinking people know that a reunited Germany would be the heart of a steadily uniting Europe, and that is something all should commend and strive to achieve. Such will bring an era of peace and prosperity almost unimaginable half a century ago.

Is the GDR a "perfect society?" No, it has people in it. But that goes for Leipzig as well as London or Los Angeles or Lahore. Instead of allowing this superficial social adjustment (and remember, thousands go the other way, too) to cloud our vision and the long-range goal, we should instead learn from what has been done by the German people with almost nothing in the GDR these past 40 years.

We should ask ourselves what we could do with the same orderliness, perseverance and concern for someone and something beyond our own greedy selves and then apply those qualities to our own world. Then we could take a real step toward dealing with the homeless, the millions denied any medical care, the growing "under-class" and the problem of drugs which seems to be this year's cause celebre'.

With our bounty of natural and technical resources, the sky would literally be the limit.

and the USSR have impoverished themselves while trying to keep their revenge-based policies of 1945 in place. Now, neither can afford to keep that many troops abroad, and an ever accelerating withdrawal can be expected. In this context I must mention, however, that "somebody" (again, guess who?) in the U.S. Government proposed that both the United States and the Soviet Union together(!) store all sorts of war materiel on Polish soil, a move that would obviously be directed only against a resurgent Germany. To the best of my knowledge, this proposal has now been laid to rest.

Everybody agrees that the current developments in Germany are of world-shaking importance. The power brokers in Moscow and Washington were obviously surprised by this turn of events. I have no doubt that they all (i.e., the anti-Germans here and there still in charge of things) had believed that four decades of reeducation, of one-sided propaganda, of the criminal division of one of the world's major culture nations, would have split the German people psychologically in two. Now it is obvious to everyone that they have been wrong. There is only one German Volk, one German nation. The re-fusion taking place right now, right before our eyes, will unleash spiritual, economic, political, and cultural energies that can only be guessed at for the moment. It will be like a successful "cold fusion" in a metaphysical sense (cold, because it occurred without war). I, personally, believe that we will now also see an upturn in the German birthrate. In other words, the danger of death-by-attrition (genocide caused through psychological means) of the German people has now also passed. IF THE ANTI-GERMANS DO NOT UNLEASH ANOTHER WORLD WAR IN ORDER TO STOP THE GERMANS FROM TAKING THEIR RIGHTFUL PLACE WITHIN THE FRAMEWORK OF EUROPE (THE RIGHTFUL PLACE BEING THE ONE TO BE ACCORDED TO THE LARGEST, MOST ENERGETIC AND MOST CREATIVE PEOPLE), THEN GERMANY WILL BECOME THE NATURAL CENTER TO WHICH EVERYTHING IS DRAWN, AND BERLIN WILL, THROUGH THE NATURAL ORDER OF THINGS, BECOME THE DE FACTO CAPITAL OF EUROPE. "May the best man win..."

In the last few weeks, there has been much talk about the security needs of all of Germany's neighbors, and of both the Soviet Union and the United States. Never once did I hear anything of concern about the security needs of Germany. It is as if the Germans had sent massive fleets and millions of troops across the world in order to impose their system of government on others. In this context, the "20 million" of alleged Soviet war dead was mentioned again, a figure that is as phony as is the famous "6 million." Another subject matter of newsmen and government ministers was how to prevent the establishment of a German hegemony over Europe. At this precise moment in history, when the former allied victors have to abandon their hegemony over Europe, a hegemony that brought untold suffering and enslavement to hundreds of millions of innocent people for decades, they worry about the Germans who, in my opinion, are the superior state-builders! I think they all should go home (wherever they came from) and hang their heads in shame for having failed so dismally.

Many Americans seem to like the unfortunate saying, "the law is the law," meaning, of course, that even the most asinine law (like the one that led to prohibition, for instance) has to be followed to the letter. And it is clear that the American ruling circles ALWAYS hide behind the law when discussing rules and regulations such as the so-called "Holtzman Amendment" that brought us the OSI, and has little to do with justice and common sense. Now that the reunification of Germany is really inevitable, we shall see how seriously the U.S. elite is in regards to both the professed ideals of this nation ("self-determination" and "democracy"), and of international law. The Washington Times ad in this BRIEF, for instance, calls for "REUNIFICATION", "SELF-DETERMINATION" and a "PEACE TREATY" for Germany. To most of you this will sound reasonable, especially in the light of the recent happenings. But for the U.S. (and other) ruling establishments these three points are everything but reasonable (even though we did not specify that we demand all this at once). I'll explain:

- 1. By reunification do we mean merely the union of West- and "East" Germany within their present borders? Or do we stick to the letter of international law, according to which, in the absence of a peace treaty, the German Reich still exists?
- 2. "Everybody" is for self-determination. The U.S. system seems to fight for the right to self-determination of even the most remote tribe in Black Africa. But German self-determination is something else, THAT is dangerous. Using democratic principles, both (allied instituted) "German" governments ought to resign right now, and let the German people decide, in an internationally supervised PLEBISCITE, what they want.
- 3. The matter of the peace treaty is really the dynamite in the situation. For rather nefarious reasons (they loved to play the overlords!), the allies never allowed negotiations to begin that would really have ended World War II. As it is, all we have had up to now is an armistice signed by German general officers who were subsequently hanged. Now that the world situation has drastically changed, and Germany (as a whole) is much stronger than it ever was since 1945, negotiations concerning a peace treaty would obviously be much more difficult than with a country that lies prostrate. Furthermore, in the absence of a peace treaty, people like myself can insist that all "German" treaties signed since 1945 are null and void (and have to be renegotiated), because they had been concluded with interim or illegal German governments. That is why the Poles, for instance, are so jittery about their border with Germany. They also know international law.

Reading the above, it becomes apparent why so many of the WW II victor nations fear a reunified Germany. Laughably they seem to believe that by not dealing with the problem it will go away. But the fact is that, unless they manage to unleash another world war, Germany will become stronger still, and become a more difficult partner in future negotiations. As to the matter of the German borders, I have a simple question: what would people like Jim Baker or George Bush do if they were (now) in the position of the Germans? I guess we know the answer!

As this goes to press, President Bush and Mikhail Gorbachev are about to meet aboard warships in the Mediterranean. The fate of Germany has been propelled atop the agenda. Thankfully, both superpowers are now in no position to dictate another "Yalta" to the Europeans.

Once more the best wishes for a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Sincerely,
Hans Schmidt, Natl. Chairman GANPAC

THE LATE GREAT BOOK:
THE BIBLE

AN ACCOUNT OF
CHRISTIAN AND BIBLICAL ORIGINS.

Nicholas Carter feels that it is time for us to sit down and do what many Christians rarely do: Study the Holy Bible. In doing so, we may discover whether or not the Bible is indeed "Holy" and the "Word of God." In strict biblical order, the author methodically, and scathingly, examines the various claims made in the "Holy Book" and shows how many of them bear no relationship to reality whatsoever. LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Mr. Dietz,

May I suggest to Mr. David McCalden and Mr. Ed Toner to purchase Teutonic Unity by Earnest Sevier Cox. Gentlemen, please read this book and perhaps you will understand why the Aryan race is in such a state of decline in 1989.

There have been so many wars of Aryan fighting Aryan, brother fighting brother, that we no longer dominate the planet earth. The bloodshed in Northern Ireland is a disgrace to our race. Both the IRA and the Loyalists kill White people, which does not help our cause in any way, shape, or form. We have to stop fighting each other and start fighting the non-White world.

Heil Hitler!

Dear Landsmann:

...Here in New York things are going like usual. The Jew mayor is apparently too rotted with AIDS to go another 4 years so the Yids are installing a black-face mulatto named Dinkins (he has blue eyes!) as mayor. Despite being a mulatto he is called "black." 96% of the Niggers voted on a racial basis and it would probably have been more had some not been too stupid to pull the right lever. Some 65% of Spic-Mestizoes voted for Dinkins and 26% of Jews. The real disgrace is that some 33% of Whites seem to have voted for him. Of course, this was a Democratic party primary and the choice was between a Jew and a Nigger, so the election was a sick joke. But still, it is gross to see how people betray their race.

The Republican candidate is a White Italian named Guilliani. He is a Liberal and, in some ways, even worse than Dinkins as he is a traitor as well as a black racist. The only issue in the election is race since the politics of the two Liberals are identical. Dinkins is to open the way for the blacks to loot what is left of the taxpayers' money after the Jews cart off the lions share. In the face of this, there would be a chance for the Republicans to win if they campaigned on the racial issue. All the Whites, most Jews and anyone else who works for a living and pays taxes would probably vote against Dinkins out of sheer self-preservation if the choice was put to them the right way. This is what Cuomo, the governor (who is probably a secret Jew), was referring to when he declared that he "wouldn't stand for any Willie Horton nonsense in this campaign." Guilliani is following this dictate to the letter. The only issue in the race is that Dinkins and his followers are black racists who will openly favor their parasitic race when in office. G. has apparently made some sort of deal to throw the election to Dinkins by rigidly not mentioning the issue of race. That leaves him as a weak "me too" candidate doomed to inevitable defeat as Democratic registration outnumbers the Republican by 5:1.

Dinkins will finish the job of destroying New York that Lindsey and Koch began. In 4 years NYC will look like Detroit. In 8 or 12 like E. St. Louis. But this is poetic justice. Remember when New Yorkers were all for inflicting nigger rule on South Africa and the U.S. South? Well, now they will get it here. Just what they deserve! They should pass a law forbidding Whites to move out of NYC so they can get and enjoy the full benefit of black rule. It is the Whites' ignorance of blacks that allows "racial equality" foolishness to flourish. Nothing makes for White solidarity then being forced to live with blacks.

Over in the Mideast the U.S. is to "preposition" $100,000,000 worth of equipment (tanks, trucks, artillery, etc.) in Israel. Far from being another giveaway to Israel, this is open preparation for the Mideast war Israel is pushing for. Khomenei managed to avert the war for Now by making peace with Iraq in the aftermath of the Vincennes provocation, but the Jews have not given up on the war. They must have American aid in the next major war. The Arabs are becoming too powerful for Israel to handle anymore. They must be destroyed and soon before they can match and exceed Israeli power. Direct intervention by the U.S. is the only way this can be done.

Information I receive from various publications indicated the deflationary collapse of the U.S. economy began the week of September 15 with the Junk Bond panic. From now on the deflationary spiral will gather momentum.

Sincerely,

R.S., New York State

Dear George:

I enclose the money to renew my subscription together with a small contribution.

Keep up the good work, it is so hard to find today a publication like yours which spreads the truth and is like a beacon of light in the darkness. All the best for you.

Dear Mr. Dietz:

Thank you for mailing me the ... info. I think Dr. Oliver said it best,

"Regrettable." Unfortunately, very regrettable. I really feel for Dr. Oliver, he busts his butt working for us and then have some Jr.-level prima donna call him "pro-Zionist"!!??

I do recall I sent a rather "mean-spirited" letter to you after reading Covington's letter to the editor, so this time I thought I'd cool off a little first before I write.

Let me put it this way: I think Covington was right in The March Up Country. [available from Liberty BellPublications, $6. + $1.50 postage] "Small groups with no identifiable leader or hierarchy that pop up here and there with no grand Poo-baa to get his face on TV and cause damage and give the Yids a target" (I'm paraphrasing). I think people should get their facts straight via Liberty Bell, Truth Missions, the I.H.R., etc., etc. and do their own thing, in their own area, where they know the situation. No Grand Confederacy, no Pontifex Maximus and established chain of command, no camouflage and "war" manoeuvres. All of these things have failed miserably and rather recently, it seems. What really mystifies me, George, is why Covington would then go starting the CNC. Where all us other Whites are "less" White 'cause we ain't Southerners, snort. Originally I thought it was a good idea (for Southerners), then, the more I thought about it I came up with the letter I sent you last spring where you wrote back with your views on the CNC, "Fat Chance." I imagine Harold and you go back quite a ways and you might have been a little teed off at the time you wrote, but it still seem to me "Fat Chance" describes the CNC's chances at going anywhere.

As far as money goes, I try to send $20 a month if at all possible. I was really hoping for better but my health cropped out a year ago and only now is getting better. If you were to compare notes with Harold, I think you'd find I gave him once what I try to send L.B. every month. I don't expect a pat on the back when I send money; it is my fight also. However, Harold really jumped on the wrong guy, I don't read anything in my August letter to the editor where I thought enough of the CNC to send it more money. As far as L.B. goes, I suppose I send More than some and less than others, added to the same (roughly) for Zündel, and that's all I can afford. I think Harold has ruined his chances for more money from me not by his letter but by the CNC. Likewise, Klassen by his dipshit ideas: (1) toss out Christianity and starts his own religion(?) (2) great big hierarchy Pontifex Maximus, down to the littlest supporter, Jeeeees! (3) sends my address out to people (I hate that!) so they can contact me!? If I want somebody I'll find them.

I don't know, maybe its my "time of the month" or something, but (1) Klassen vs Covington, the (2) Irish vs the Scots, have lately really added up. Plus this Jim Taylor deal, Klassen's latest mailing to me; Hell, I'm not even sending money and they are asking for money to keep their tax-exempt status down there. Plus they list their whole organizational plan, I really don't know. The guy I really feel for is you, George; you break your back, exclude yourself from getting a "real" job by your political and racial views and the people who contribute articles bicker, as do the subscribers, and you scratch for an existence. I guess it doesn't seem fair.

I in no way intend for this to turn into another Hand vs Klassen or the Irish vs the Scots in the letters to the editor. I thought you might be interested in how one of your subscribers feels. I did forward the ... Info on to my cousin in Germany [in the U.S. Army]. I think you can tell by his letters in the Letters to the Editor section that his head is in the right place, and if there is the slightest doubt on your part, let me assure you there shouldn't be.

I hope you continue to keep L.B. in print; I feel it is the best publication on "our side" and if in fact sometime in the future you need to take an extended vacation to "get away from it all" or drop out completely and go back to selling real estate, I would still sign my letters with the sincerest,

Respectfully,
V.G., Michigan

Dear George:

I hope this letter finds you in good health and spirits, though I am sure your superhuman efforts tax both.

I must register my disagreement with several recent letters glorifying the Irish Republican Army, apparently prompted by equally ignorant letters criticizing the national character of the Irish or German peoples, or both.

I have no admiration for the government of once-Great Britain, but I am more bothered by the cowardly murderers who claim to represent Ireland.

The sub-men, who creep in shadows and murder men, women, and children they catch unaware and unarmed, are not helping our race. The killing of genetically sound members of our race is not a good thing. The death of a traitorous politician or other racial enemy is not a cause for mourning. But the murder of healthy Aryans is. The majority of British soldiers are of valuable Aryan stock. Their deaths can not benefit our race, as these men are only pawns of our real enemy-the Yid. If we killed all ignorant pawns, there won't be many Aryans left.

The other issue that concerns me is the equally ignorant letters which criticize the national character of the Irish people. Every nation has a collective nature, which may not please members of other groups, or even members of the group in question. The contributions of the Irish to our race are many and need no justification by myself or anyone else.

As a threatened minority, Aryans must put aside trivial differences and face their real enemy united. Yids surely enjoy watching inter-Aryan hostility develop.

I continue to support your wise policy of encouraging free discussion of matters pertinent to our race, but remain disturbed about the threats to Aryan unity seemingly expressed by these several recent letters...

I am sure you will find a good use for my small contribution, which I enclose.

Yours for the Revolution,
F.E., US Army, Europe

Dear Mr. Dietz:

...I happened to catch David Duke on ABC's Nightline last night and thought I'd send a note while it was still fresh in my memory.

I've seen Mr. Duke on TV three times now, once each on Jerry King Live, CNN's Crossfire and now ABC's Nightline. Each time Duke has managed to achieve at least a stalemate or better in the face of hostile interviewers and/or co-guests. Duke has the ability to side-step a loaded question that would surely result in the interview collapsing into the same old "well, so you're aunty-Semitic, why don't you explain that one? heh, heh, heh," while the audience is led to think, "oh horrors, another evil Nazi who doesn't believe!" Last night, after being confronted with a book he sold questioning the "Holyhoax", Duke just stated "well, I've sold a lot of books and, like every other bookstore owner in America, I don't necessarily agree with the content of every book I've sold." There, a nice tactful way of playing the vicious game the media prostitute play.

Myself, I happen to agree with Dr. Oliver and others, that (1) you should call "a spade a spade," and (2) most likely, this country cannot be retaken by taking back the government with which we are presently afflicted (see "Before Midnight" in the September issue of Liberty Bell.) However, it is extremely refreshing to see someone get on TV and make the Yids howl and whine. Never mind that by Duke's cool, calculating approach he is getting many free minutes of national exposure simply because the media is trying its best (worst) to discredit him.

I couldn't begin to guess if Duke has "sold out" as I have read in places; he certainly is going to a lot of extra trouble if he has. Personally, I don't take exception to Duke's saying "no, I don't hate Yids and Jigs" and similar comments. Were he to make such statements as "I hate Yids and Jigs", any shabbaz goy interviewer would tear at that one issue relentlessly until Duke gave up in disgust, thereby ending any kind of constructive debate.

It's very unfortunate that one cannot say exactly what one means while on TV or radio, but that is the reality with today's press, and Mr. Duke seems extremely capable of playing the obnoxious game played by the media nit-wits and using it against them.

I noticed that Duke may consider running for the U.S. Senate in Louisiana; while he may not be perfect, he's certainly 99% better than any of the sell-outs presently in the Senate or House of Representatives.

Respectfully,
G.V., Michigan

Dear Mr. Dietz:

For all it is worth, Merry Christmas, and let's hope 1990 will reap us a better harvest. I have enclosed another meager donation to further the cause. Thank you for all your efforts; you most certainly serve as an inspiration to us all. Needless to say, it is not necessary to waste a stamp on an acknowledgement of contributions. Use it where it is needed.

All the best to you and your "bride".

Sincerely and with all due respect,

Dear Sir,

I wish to thank you for the complimentary set of Liberty Bells recently sent to the Center for Nationalist Studies [Box 621, Sarasota FL 34278]. The brilliance of the Honorable Revilo P. Oliver and the Honorable Nicholas Carter was just incredible. I could not have been more impressed. I am injured worker awaiting a Workman's Compensation settlement, so I cannot subscribe at present but will do soon. Thank you for the beacon of light—Liberty Bell.

Happy Holidays,

Gentlemen:

In February I requested a list of publications from Liberty Bell. From this list I selected several books which I thought would help me in my personal research efforts to understand the problems which I face as a developing human being. My research efforts were motivated by a profound "confusion" concerning the private and public conflicts in which I continually found myself engaged. In effect, I am very conditioned to "failure and ignorance" concerning the decisions which affect my left. No matter how outstanding my efforts or my talents, my end result has been a repeated failure to understand and comprehend the existing Establishment.

It is with this "developmental process" in mind that I am writing this letter. Over the past twenty years, I have had major difficulty functioning in this "democratic" society wherein economics and politics seem so akin to "racketeering." For all the effort and intelligence that appeared to be going into our social and business programs as education, social and government instability seems to be a given constant within our society. In effect, the system is designed "failure." In my post-college years, I have found from experience that the operating systems of business and government were not concerned with quality or competence. I could never know enough to function effectively within the system, and when I did know what was going on in the hierarchy, I found myself quickly sitting on the outside looking in. It was always a conflict of interest about " the right way ass the honest way" of doing things.

Originally, I thought I did not have the necessary "business acumen" to understand what was going on in finances and general economic thought. But when I read the economic books by Coogan (*Money Creators and *Lawful Money Explained), and the masterpiece of social and economic commentary by Yockey (*Imperium), I sensed for the first time a realization of my own living experiences. I do have the capacity to understand comprehend the system for what it is, for my life experiences are a direct reflection of the principles as laid down by Coogan, Yockey, and Ford (The International Jew: The World's Foremost Problem, 4 Vols.*). What I have been living has been a negation of my abilities...a denial of myself on behalf of false information and indoctrination wherein "equality" is the "containment" word of our "modern" and "enlightened" times.

These books have led me to: Which Way, Western Man, The Camp of the Saints and Partners in Blunder. What a waste of money and youthful energy my high school and college education was in terms of historical and social "knowledge" and in the "worry and aggravation" that this "testing process" produced as indoctrination and elimination. At this time, I am beginning to exercise a better "discrimination" about the affairs which are constituting the world in which I live as I learn to educate myself. These books have helped me understand what is going on in this world and to recognize fabricated propaganda for what it is in character and content.

Dear George:

I hope you and Betty are fine...

I will be talking to a class at a Portland college on the 14th of November. Hopefully, professors in other classes and schools will want somebody to talk to their classes. I don't see many Movement people talking to classes these days. There will be plenty of Movement news in the local media, so any speaking engagements I get will be timely and will be covered in the NSV Report [P.O. Box 328, The Dallas OR 97058].

Anti-White attorney Morris Dees of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which publishes Klanwatch, has filed a civil rights suit in the U.S. District Court in Portland on 20 October 1989 against two Skinheads who pleaded guilty in a plea bargain regarding the death of an Ethiopian last November 13th. The State of Oregon offered the plea bargain deal to the two Skins because it did not want a trial our of fear of the publicity which would put the Skins in a more positive light and put the Blacks, the Portland police, politicians and bureaucrats in a negative light. This is not all. Names also in this suit are Tom and John Metzger [P.O. Box 65, Fallbrook CA 92028] who are being charged with instigating the Skins into acts of violence against non-Whites. This entire thing will backfire on the enemy—just wait and see!

I recently saw a home video movie titled "Skinheads: The Second Coming of Hate" with Chuck Connors and which is in video stores now. After Greg Withrow, founder and former leader of the White Student Union, turned traitor, he had dinner with Hollywood actor Sean Penn regarding a future movie about Skinheads. The only indication that this movie may have been based on any of Greg Withrow's experiences is the part where some Skins nailed another Skin to a wooden house beam and left him there to die. Eventually, a bear finished him off. The movie is hate-filled, anti-Skin propaganda. There will be more on this later.

Hail Victory,
R.C., Oregon

Dear Mr. Dietz:

Well, you missed it with Noel Hunt's "White Africans..."[See Liberty Bell for August 1989: "Liberalism: Destroyer of White Man; 'White Africans': A Biological Failure."] Evolution had nothing to do with their failure.

Their mistake was that they copied the American stale food diet. And now they are paying the penalties of STALE food.

It takes about 20 years for the effects of stale food to show up in a population. And the change-over from FRESH food is slow. So, it all goes unnoticed.

Stale food affects the personality and the operation of the brain. The mind is dulled, the person loses the facility of foresight, his thinking is subtly warped, he "takes a part for the whole," and other problems. The Gita gives a good description of the LIBERAL mind.

I send a quote from the Bible. Ole Leviticus' observation of natural phenomena is not to be disregarded. Well, you can forget this part of the Bible, BUT do not discount the findings of modern Biochemists.

Our big shift to stale food started after WW II. We are not the people our grandparents were. We eat differently.

I have not told you much. Few Americans know the meaning of the words FRESH or STALE. So they have no idea of what I am talking about.

Good luck.

H.S.,(Biochemist), Illinois

Dear Friends: 7 November 1989

The Southern Poverty Law Center says that we can't do it!

Emergency funds for white supremacists do not draw the kind of support necessary to mount a formidable defense, and sustaining a full-time operation is likely to be even more difficult...

The sad truth of the matter is that they're right. Just as opposition to tyranny is obedience to god, so is filing lawsuits to protect your rights and liberties expensive. Most do not realize the time, expense, energy, and sheer will-power required to see a civil rights lawsuit or malicious criminal prosecution through to the bitter end.

If you believe in protecting you rights and those of your neighbors against the inroads made by unconstitutional laws and regulations, then help me push the foundation [Patriot's Defense Foundation, 2323 McCue Road, Suite No. 2, Houston TX 77056 — Phone 71-439-0328] over the top: Let's prove the ADL and Morris Dees wrong!

Soon, the Foundation will be incorporated and an application filed with the IRS for tax-exempt status. Until then,. please continue to send your contributions to me personally. When I receive enough funds to establish a bank account and pay for the incorporation and exempt-status application (the IRS charges $300 for the application), then your contribution can be sent to the Foundation.

Please note that until I file the application and receive our Federal Employer Identification Number, your contribution will NOT be tax-deductible.

Since my last letter, I have been engaged in the following projects:

- Completed the research in establishing the Foundation
- Provided legal assistance to Skinheads indicted on civil rights charges in Dallas, Texas.
- Monitored civil rights violations of Aryan Nations marchers in Pulaski, Tennessee.
- Conducted a fact-finding and evidence-gathering trip to Arkansas, inquiring into the deaths of Gordon Kahl and Sheriff Matthews, where we hope to soon present evidence to a grand jury.
- As always, assisting prisoners in Marion with their water poisoning case and defending them against that ridiculous escape conspiracy charge.

An assistant, Randy, has been hired to help me withe the administration of the Foundation. If you require any information on the Foundation or any case, please feel free to contact either of us at the above number.

The establishment of this foundation is a great and long-overdue enterprise. It will require more capital than has ever been raised by the Patriot's movement before if we are to stand united and defeat the common enemy on his own ground and in his own territory.

Let us not succumb to the propaganda of our opponents in suggesting that this is a "get-rich-quick" scheme for me. Every cent of your contributions goes to the organization of the foundation and to support the cause it serves. This work requires my full and undivided attention, therefore, some of the funds are used to support myself and my assistant. When the foundation is formed, I will be a salaried employee of the organization.

Again, I take this opportunity to thank you for your generous contribution and urge you to continue supporting me and the Foundation in this great endeavor. The best way for evil to succeed is for good men to do nothing. Join us in our crusade to preserve the liberties and freedoms given to us by the founding fathers and preserved by the blood of our patriots and martyrs.

Sincerely,

Kirk David Lyons, Attorney at Law

The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood... who knows the great enthusiasms, the great devotions; who spends himself at a great cause; who best knows in the end the triumph of high achievement, and... if he fails, at least fails daring greatly so that his place shall never be with those cold, timid souls who know neither victory nor defeat.

The following is a submission to the FORUM (News Tribune, Woodbridge NJ) by

Ed Toner
52 Newbury Rd.
Howell NJ 07731

6 July 1989

Dear Editor,

The FORUM item by Mr. Kornitzer (5 July) entitled "A lie told more often does not become the truth" and since it was prompted by my letter of 12 May, I feel obligated, and qualified, to reply.

How often do we see, hear, and, in general, suffer a literal bombardment of the "6 million" Jews who supposedly perished in WW II in gas chambers? Let me count the ways: Shoa, Winds of War in its many parts, War and Remembrance, mini-series upon min-series, ad nauseam, until WW II has been made to look like a Jewish soap opera. The bigger the lie, the more often it must be repeated. The Zionists have learned this lesson well! What they have failed to realize, however, is that by this constant bombardment they no longer show the banality of evil, but rather the evil of banality.

My letter, which contradicted the 6 million figure, was not a product of information from the prestigious Institute of Historical Review, as Mr. Kornitzer suggests. It was a bit of independent research on my part, using official West German government figures which list the number of surviving Jews who made monetary claims for restitution against the government. The other document I used was the B'nai B'rith anthology entitled "The Holocaust and Genocide," a textbook used in New Jersey Public High Schools to brainwash the minds of our susceptible youth. Using the figures presented therein for survivors in the Eastern Bloc nations, plus the survivors who made claims against West Germany, subtracted from B'nai B'rith's own figures of the number of European Jews prior to what they call "the final solution" (q.v.), or 2,515,000 + 4,393,385 = 6,908,385 survivors, of the original 8,861, 800, for an absolute maximum number of casualties of 1,953,415. Keep in mind, the latter figure assumes no deaths of any cause of any of the survivors over 39 years (1935-1984, when the restitution laws ended), and ignores the fact that a single surviving head of a household could make one claim for all surviving members of his family.

What we have here is the exposure of a monstrous lie, a slander of the German people, and a deliberate attempt to lay a "guilt trip" on the Christians of this country in order to curry sympathy for Zionist, Fascist Israel.

Other distinguished historians have seen through this smoke screen. Two recently on the scene are the British giant, David Irving, author of Hitler's War and other monumental works, who now acknowledges there were no extermination gas chambers, and Arno Mayer, a Jewish historian who holds an endowed chair in history, and author of Why Did the Heavens Not Darken?, which points out, as the International Red Cross did, that typhus, caused by lice infestation, was the real killer in the concentration camps.

Similarly, the scholars of the University of Chicago, Oxford, Cambridge and London Universities, using their vast facilities, have combined to produce the standard reference of the English speaking people, the Encyclopaedia Britannica. In my volumes, printed in 1960, I find no mention of a holocaust of Jews in any number, or extermination gas chambers, or any of the twaddle that passes for truth that passes on our boob tubes, concerning these events of WW II.

Contrast the above with the wild statements by those historians who of the "exterminationist" leanings, such as the English-Jewish biographer of Churchill, Martin Gilbert. In Gilbert's book, Auschwitz and the Allies, 1981, pg. 26, he plainly states, "in the Spring and Summer of 1942, hundreds of thousands of Jews were being gassed every day." Let's examine this, now. Using 200,000 as the minimum figure to represent "hundreds of thousands," and assuming Spring starts on 20 March, and Summer ends on 22 September, we have 186 days in which a minimum of 200,000 Jews were gassed. Lessee here, 186 x 200,000 = 37,200,000 Jews were gassed. Anybody out there believe that? Don't look at me, I'm only quoting Gilbert, a highly respected "historian."

To err is human, so let's say he MEANT "Spring and early Summer," or let's say, 17 weeks. Well, that still comes out to 23,800,000 Jews gassed, out of a total of 23 million Jews in the whole world, in 1942. That leaves a vacuum of 800,000 Jews.

All that is left of the myth, then, are "eyewitness" accounts. Let us examine one. In Canada, where writing on this subject is against the law, Ernst Zündel has been fighting a conviction in court for teaching the revisionist point of view. The prosecution brought in an eyewitness, Arnold Friedman, a certified survivor like Mr. Kornitzer. Friedman testified under oath that while in Auschwitz he could tell who was being burned in the ovens by the color of the flames that shot out of the crematoria chimneys. He told the court that if blue flames shot out of the chimney, it meant a Hungarian Jew was being burned. If the flames were green, it meant a Polish Jew. Zündel's council, Doug Christie, confronted Friedman with the patent for the Auschwitz crematoria, which, like all crematorium facilities, was incapable of giving off smoke, flames, or odors. Faced with this, Friedman recanted his testimony.

Finally, Mr. Kornitzer's sly reference to a "judicial decision" in California in which a holocaust survivor won a judgement against the IHR, proving that Jews were gassed at Auschwitz. The case was Mermelstein vs. IHR, and no judicial decision of any kind was rendered. The matter was settled out of court, as a matter of necessity by the IHR, which did not have the unlimited funds that were at Mermelstein's disposal.

Very Respectfully,
Ed Toner

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigous academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor/publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavour to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of our Western culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change, or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

PRACTICAL POLITICS

1. A POLITICAL PUZZLE

Lyndon LaRouche, who was several times sponsored as a candidate for the Presidency by his own volatile political organizations, is now serving a sentence of fifteen years in a Federal prison, and some of his subordinates are now being prosecuted in various states. That fact is significant, but difficult to interpret.

Needless to say, it is impossible to tell whether or not LaRouche was guilty of the offenses of which he was convicted. Our masters in Washington have so large a staff of highly trained agents provocateurs, forgers, and perjurers that they could convict anyone of any crime.

If LaRouche was innocent, why was it deemed expedient or requisite to use the ponderous Federal machine to suppress him? If he was guilty, why was he given so severe a penalty for what the pets of the occupation government, guilty of graver and far more lucrative crimes, are amerced, if tried and convicted by some mischance, by only a few months in a prison that resembles a fairly good hotel?

That is a political puzzle which any man who contemplates some kind of political activity had better try to solve.

I first took cognizance of Lyndon LaRouche in 1976 when I was sent a copy of his "U.S. Labor Party's" Carter and the Party of International Terrorism. I noted that while the booklet contained such wild assertions as that Adolf Hitler was an agent of the Rockefellers, it did contain a very large amount of detailed and apparently accurate information about the many individuals and organizations mentioned in it—information that could have been drawn from the files of the F.B.I., the C.I.A., or Mossad, but which a man who did not have access to those files could amass only by hiring a team of investigators to do research in large libraries and archives.

I further noticed that Mordecai, alias Karl Marx, was described as a "scientific genius," whose "scientific world view" the "Fascists" (i.e., Rockefeller & Co.) were desperately trying to destroy by "per-verting it" to Fabian Socialism, and that other "Fascists" included, imprimis, the Chinese Communists of Mao Tse-Tung. I also noted that while the Rockefellers were doubtless participants in a conspiracy against civilization and our race, the thesis that they were the source of all evil had been adapted and elaborated from the writing of the late Dr. Emanuel Josephson and his associate, who in the 1950s published for years a sheet called Capsule News; and furthermore, the doctrine that the Rockefellers were practically distinguishable from Satan only by lacking a cloven hoof or tail, was a dangerously misleading simplification, which served only to mask and conceal our other and more potent enemies.

I further noted that LaRouche's financial support, so far as was known, came from certain corporations that oddly resembled the dummy corporations by which the C.I.A. commonly disguises its own illegal operations in this country. This, although far from proof, suggested interesting hypotheses about LaRouche and his activities.

I was sufficiently interested to continue observation of LaRouche, depending almost entirely on four books that he published. By far the best of these is The New Dark Ages Conspiracy by Mr./Mrs./Miss Carol White (New York, New Ben Franklin House, 1980). The sex of the author is uncertain, so I shall gallantly assume hereafter that he belongs to the less amiable half of our species.

Carol's research was diligent and adroit, concentrated on the purpose assigned to him when LaRouche commissioned the book, which is succinctly stated by the subtitle, "Britain's Plot to Destroy Civilization." The book is adorned with multitudinous footnotes that refer to an impressive bibliography. The specific quotations that I have checked are accurate, and have been cleverly distorted and misinterpreted to lead a credulous reader to the conclusion that the British are, indeed, the root and source of all evil. The corollary, of course, is that God's worshipful Race are holy beings, wholly innocent of all wrongdoing.

White, whoever he is, had a real genius for the kind of dirty work for which he was hired, and we must accord him the commendation that we do not withhold from technicians who are expert in their métier.

He is more adroit and better educated than most journalists, and his technique is instructive, almost a model for such writers. He has mastered the art of bamboozling unwary readers by introduing names of persons and events of which they have only a hazy recollection and then making statements, seemingly documented, with such authoritative confidence that they never think of trying to clarify their own recollections or consulting a reference work. His book will come into the hands of some persons who happen to have in mind adequate information on some of his points, but he can rely on them to toss his book contemptuously into the waste-basket after reading a few pages, unless they have some strong motive for taking notice of it.

If you are interested in this technique of deluding unsuspicious readers, the following paragraphs, set off by a distinctively different type, will give you a specimen, as concise as I can make it. If you are not interested, skip this typographically distinct section and go on to page 9, where the article resumes after the digression.

To give you a small specimen of White's technique, I open the book at random and find before me page 115. I shall quote the first two and one-half paragraphs on that page, inserting within brackets numbered references to my comments on obvious points and verifying dates from standard reference works, but I shall not waste time by looking up data on points about which I am uninformed.

Spawned in Vienna from the circles associated with the father of Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, the Thule Society[1] was the German branch of the Theosophy Movement[2], itself a British[3] product of the late 1880s. The Society's spiritual father was Edward Bulwer-Lytton[4], British colonial secretary during the British Opium Wars against China[5] and later High Commissioner in India. Bulwer-Lytton was an outspoken promoter of the Isis cult[6], the pagan ritualistic cult that formed the basis[7] of Theosophy and all other British cults to the present day[8].

Bulwer-Lytton's protégé, satanist Aleister Crowley[9], who in turn trained Aldous Huxley[10], helped found the British equivalent of the Thule Society, the Isis-Urania Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.[11] The ghost writer of Mein Kampf,[12] Major-General Karl Haushofer,[13] was initiated as a controller of the Order of the Golden Dawn.[14]

Bulwer-Lytton's spiritual ties with Nazism[15] go deeper. His first novel, Rienzi,[16] became the story for Richard Wagner's first opera.[17] Wagner set British cult life[18] to music.

Now all this flows as smoothly as treacle pouring from a can, doesn't it? And it all sounds so impressive and learned! Carol dishes it out with a practiced hand, but here are the facts:

1. The Thule Society was founded in Germany in 1918 (thirty-eight years after the 1880s) as the secret society of an élite working for the preservation of authentically German culture and aware of the systematic defilement of the nation by the Jews and of the Jewish engineering of the defeat of Germany in that year. Taking their name from the ultima Thule of ancient geographers (perhaps Iceland, possibly Norway, certainly a northern and hence presumably Nordic country), they studied Norse-Germanic mythology and also the mystical religion of Aryan India, for which some of them expressed a sympathy that could be taken for belief. The interest in occultism may have been no more than a cover for serious and rational political purposes. Many of the members were naturally attracted by Hitler; others were not, believing that what should be an intellectual and cultural reformation by an élite was betrayed and vulgarized by enlistment of the masses in a political organization.

2. Theosophy was founded in the United States in 1875 by Mme. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, a Russian adventuress, after several earlier efforts to combine spiritual values with swindling had failed. It had little success until her two volumes of pretentious mishmash of religions, Isis Unveiled, was published in New York in 1877. There is no basis for comparison of Theosophy, hokum for persons who were too well educated and reasonable to believe the Christian myths, but had a religiosity that thirsted for spiritual verbiage and comforting assurances of immortality and importance in the universe, with the Thule Society which, whatever the value of some of its members' interest in mysticism, was devoted to a practical and rationally patriotic purpose. It was Nordic, whereas Mme. Blavatsky's hoax was to be a "universal brotherhood," with the usual mindless gabble about "all mankind."

3. The Theosophical Society was founded in 1875 in the United States, from which Mme. Blavatsky migrated to India, where deft Hindu conjurers helped her demonstrate spiritual values to the credulous wives of British officials and to some of the weaker-minded males. She went to England in 1884. It is true that her other major work, The Secret Doctrine, was published in England in 1888, subsidized by two English gentlemen, who edited it and reduced

Mme. Blavatsky's often incoherent nonsense to a more or less systematic treatise. (Cf. Liberty Bell, August 1984, pp.4-10).

4. Edward Bulwer, Lord Lytton, did enter politics, a gentlemanly thing for a man in his position to do, and as a Whig he was elected to parliament several times, and, as a loyal party man, he was rewarded with administrative positions, for which he seems to have had a real talent. There is no reason to believe that he ever seriously influenced the policies of the Whig party, let alone those of the Empire. He always regarded his political activities as secondary to his literary career. In British politics he is chiefly remembered as the candidate for parliament who, when he went around the hustings to give speeches to prospective voters, was followed a day or two later by his wife, who gave orations about why such a scoundrel was unworthy of a single vote. (He doubtless regretted that he had married a pretty but almost dowerless girl, disregarding the prudent advice of his widowed mother, who thereupon disinherited him.)

5. The two "Opium Wars" took place in 1839-1842 and 1856-1858. When Bulwer-Lytton became Colonial Secretary in 1858, the second war was practically over. There was a brief renewal of hostilities in 1859. He was never High Commissioner for India. (His son became Governor General of India in 1875, two years after the father's death.)

6. Talk about an "Isis cult" was suggested by the title of Mme. Blavatsky's first work, but Isis Unveiled is not the expression of a religion but only a literary allusion to the ancient religion which was exported from Egypt to the Roman world. The "veil of Isis," given iconographic expression by statues that showed the goddess as wearing a veil, was the symbol of the hidden forces in the universe, beyond the ken of mortals. The veiled Isis was supposed to have decreed, "he who lifts my veil must die." That was probably a promise that the secrets of the universe would be revealed only to the souls of the dead in an afterlife. Isis is, of course, mentioned, more or less prominently, in virtually every occult theocrasy. The Christians converted her into the Virgin Mary when they needed a female element in their originally misogynist cult. — Mme. Blavatsky compounded her spiritual pot pourri principally from the Hindu Vedanta spiced with second-hand Jewish Kabbalism, but she threw in a dash of all the religions of which she had heard, for she professed to expound a "universal religion" which was the real basis of all others. So, of course, she mentions the cult of Isis in antiquity, but the title of her book enables Carol to invent an "Isis cult" and to call it "pagan," using the term the Christian propagandists invented to depreciate the less fanatical and more salubrious religions of Graeco-Roman antiquity. Needless to say, Bulwer-Lytton did not promote a cult that Mme. Blavatsky invented four years after his death. He wasn't the "spiritual father" of any cult, although he, like many Victorian gentlemen, was swindled by even second-rate spiritualist mediums and other fakirs, and he was fascinated by occult hocus-pocus. His Rosicrucian novel, Zanoni (1842), has a subject he selected for its novelty and dramatic possibilities, but, given his credulity, he may have wondered whether there was some real basis for his fiction.

7. Theosophy was merely one of the innumerable esoteric cults that were spawned by the Rosicrucian hoax, on which see the admirable study by the late Frances Yates, The Rosicrucian Enlightenment (London, Routledge, 1972). The hoax, which was doubtless suggested by the Kikes' Kabbalah and partly modelled on it, was launched in 1614-1615 with a fiction about a secret society of great sages, their brains stuffed with arcane wisdom, who had been laboring in secret for centuries to save the world (but had oddly failed to use the vast powers over the physical world bestowed by their secret mastery of cosmic forces). Gullible persons naturally sought initiation into the magical secrets, and through the centuries since 1615 clever promoters have invented scores, perhaps hundreds, of secret societies with bizarre rigmaroles that are the Rosicrucian drivel spiced for contemporary tastes. Boys delight in secret societies with grotesque initiations and horrendous rituals, but boys know they are playing games; that persons who are physically adult should be less mature mentally is a phenomenon that must arouse wonder and despair.

8. For a list of many varieties of occult hokum peddled by secret societies to British and American suckers who are too well educated to accept the Christian superstition, but are deficient in critical intelligence and have minds so weak they cannot master their craving for mystic swill, see the two works by Miss Stoddard cited infra and Lady Queensborough's Occult Theocrasy (London, 1933; available from Liberty Bell Publications, $18.00 + postage. Please note that the word in the title is theocrasy, which is one scheme for imposing a theocracy.) All of these diddles are imitations of the Rosicrucian hoax, sometimes diluted with Satanism, a cognate species of mummery. On the authors of the three books I have cited, see Liberty Bell, August 1984, pp. 14, 47.

9. Bulwar-Lytton died in January 1873, two years and ten months before his supposed "protégé," Aleister Crowley, was born in October 1875. White, of course, guessed that many of his readers would not know when the novelist died or might confuse him with his son, and would remember Crowley only as a celebrated practitioner of "sexual magic" and for his presumptuous boast that he was "the wickedest man alive," with only a vague notion of the time at which he flourished. I dare say that many readers did not question White's confident assertion. It is a good example of the art of a really talented and expert purveyor of sucker-bait.

10. Aldous Huxley (1894-1963) could have met Crowley or, at least, passed him on the street in London or Italy, but not after Huxley moved to California. If, in addition to Brave New World, you have read any of Huxley's sardonically brilliant descriptions of the decay of society after the First World War, you will ask yourself how in Hell White could have imagined that Huxley had been "trained" in anything by the self-styled Great Beast. The answer is that White calculated that most of his readers wouldn't know what he was talking about, but would assume that he did.

11. The Order of the Golden Dawn was founded in 1888 by MacGregor Mathers (who claimed to be Baron MacGregor of Glenstrae), doubtless with the help of the Jewess whom he had married while he was studying the Kabbalah; his purpose, unless he was insane, was to vend to educated and prosperous suckers occult gibberish modeled on the Rosicrucian Hoax. Aleister Crowley had nothing to do with the foundation, but appears to have joined the Order around 1900 and, naturally, in the jargon of modern politics, he proceeded to "destabilize" it. With a confederate, he did found an almost identical system of hocus-pocus called Stella Matutina in 1903 (or, according to some, 1905).

12. Although Adolf Hitler undoubtedly considered the many and various suggestions made to him by informed and patriotic Germans, and probably adopted some of them, there can be no doubt but that Mein Kampf is primarily his work, expressing clearly the principles on which he founded National Socialism in Germany. Of the associates who helped him, the greatest contribution was almost certainly made by Dietrich Eckart (whose cogent little booklet, Bolschevism from Moses to Lenin, is available from Liberty Bell Publications, $2.50 + postage). Hostile writers who try to trace the origins of Hitler's political system, such as A. James Gregor (The Ideology of Fascism) and George L. Mosse (The Crisis of German Ideology), do not even mention Haushofer, who was, at best, a late and marginal adherent. To call him the "ghost writer" of Mein Kampf is audacious mendacity.

13. Professor Karl Haushofer, a distinguished geographer, was a learned and highly intelligent man. His system of "geopolitics," which was most fully set forth in his Bausteine zur Geopolitik (1928), is now generally accepted without mention of his name. His Weltpolitik von heute (1934), a realistic appraisal of the geopolitical situation at that time, was largely, though not completely, written to support the National Socialist movement.

14. That Haushofer had ever had the slightest connection with the Golden Dawn or its offshoot, Stella Matutina, was unknown to Miss Stoddard, who was for a number of years a Ruling Chief of the Mother Temple of Stella Matutina and must have closely watched the original order. See her Light-bearers of Darkness (1930) and Trail of the Serpent (1936), both of which she published under the pseudonym "Inquire Within." That a German professor ever became an officer in a British clique of occult mummers is in itself preposterous.

15. If Bulwer-Lytton, who died in 1873, had "spiritual ties" with a German patriotic and racial movement that began in 1918-1920, in a world changed beyond the wildest fancies of a Victorian, his ghost must have been more pertinacious than the being he imagined in his best-known short story, "The House and the Brain." What White, whose effrontery knows neither shame nor limits, means here is probably what he says later in his spiel, where he unblushingly claims that Bulwer-Lytton's novel, The Coming Race, "contained nearly everything that...Houston Stewart Chamberlain had to say on racial 'theory.'" The novel is merely a fantasic story of an accidental visit to a realm in the centre of the earth where the members of a technologically more advanced and stridently feminist civilization (having developed vril, the equivalent of controlled nuclear power combined with laser beams) are maturing their plans for emerging to the surface of the planet and replacing mankind. The book may be regarded as one of the earliest specimens of what was later called "science fiction," in which its theme frequently reappears. It has no more relation to anthropology than have the novels that Edgar Rice Burroughs wrote about Pellucidar in imitation of Jules Verne's Voyage au centre du monde.

16. Bulwer-Lytton's first novel, Falkland, was published in 1827; it was followd by other novels at the rate of about one per year.

Rienzi appeared in 1835, the year after he published what is probably his best-known novel today, The Last Days of Pompeii. The subject of Rienzi, as should be obvious from the title, is the career of the famous Cola di Rienzo, who, with solemn anachronism, made himself Tribune of the Roman People in 1347 and sought to restore the glory of Antiquity by rousing the miserable rabble that was almost lost as it wandered among the still surviving and vast monuments of a greatness beyond its comprehension. He may have been inspired by Petrarch, whose sympathy and support he won. His career, with all its vicissitudes of seizure of power, battle, victory and folly, overthrow, exile, imprisonment, deliverance because a pope died at the right time, return to power, and eventual murder in 1354, is highly dramatic in even the most dryly factual history, and naturally attracted a novelist in search of a subject for his own powers of vividly dramatic narration.

17. The career of Cola di Rienzo had for Wagner the same attraction it had had for Bulwer-Lytton, whose dramatic novel enabled the composer to dispense with historical research when he chose the subject of his first real opera (the two earlier compositions do not count, although Die Feen contained at least one fine lyric). The success of Wagner's Rienzi assured his career. It is a brilliant opera, although, overshadowed by his later and greater works, it is now seldom performed.

18. What could be a conceivable connection between romantic renditions of an historical episode and "British cult life"? This, needless to say, is hogwash of the most stinking kind, but note the skill with which White has made it palatable to the thoughtless and ignorant.

A sequel to White's book is Treason in America, by Anton Chaitkin (New York, New Benjamin Franklin House, 1984; 2d edition, 1985). It is a larger book (631 pages) and more pretentious, with an imposing bibliography, and it naturally conforms to LaRouche's policy of blaming all the world's ills on the nasty British and resolutely assuming that Yahweh's Yids can do no wrong. The author's very extensive research provides him with a large amount of little-known data that are easily distorted and misrepresented, but he lacks White's skill and writes with crude Yiddish impudence. I doubt that many have read it without contempt.

Dope, Inc., a collaborative effort by Konstandinos Kalimtgis, David Goldman, and Jeffrey Steinberg, the editors of LaRouche's expensive Executive Intelligence Review, was published by his Franklin House in 1978, and is probably the one of his books that attained the widest distribution, since it was, for a fairly long time, sponsored and sold by Liberty Lobby and its Spotlight in Washington. It alleges that all the trade in narcotic drugs is the evil work of the Satanic British, and argues that with such fantastic pertinacity that if it were issued today, I am sure that it would describe as British agents the seventy colonels, majors, and lieutenants of the Israeli army who are now acting as gunmen and bully boys to protect the cocaine industry in South America.[1] Needless to say, in the opinion of Messrs. Kalimtgis, Goldman, and Steinberg, and of their boss, Lyndon, God's People by definition can do no wrong.

This absurd book takes its departure from the British Opium Wars in China, which are misinterpreted with a perverse anachronism that cannot be mere ignorance. The moralistic falsification of history so neatly illustrates the modus ductandi of LaRouche and his people that I think it merits brief consideration in a typographically distinct section, which you may skip, if you wish.

The attempt to use the "Opium Wars" to excite moral indignation against Great Britain is intellectual dishonesty of the most flagrant and contemptible kind.

We must keep in mind two preliminary points:

(1) In the period 1839-1860, Britain believed in the policy of free trade, and so did other European powers. The demand for tea and other Chinese products made trade with China almost necessary. It was the policy of the Manchus, who had conquered China and ruled it, to exclude the "White devils" from China and, if possible, to prevent all contact with them; this policy doubtless won the approbation of most of their Chinese subjects. The military power of the "White devils" forced China to allow them to reside in a small and strictly circumscribed area adjacent to Canton, and to engage in trade with Chinese there. Whether free trade was, in the circumstances of the Nineteenth Century, a sound economic policy may be debated; the question is morally irrelevant.

1. Die Welt (Bonn), 25 August 1989. Some part of this fact could not be suppressed in the American press, which even reported that an Israeli colonel had affirmed that he had been despatched by his government to Colombia, thus ruining the Jews' pretense that the officers were "former" members of the Army, from which they had resigned to engage in private enterprise, without the consent of the bloody butcher-boys who rule the "Holy Land."

(2) It is quite true that (as LaRouche's scribblers are careful not to mention) God's Pet Predators, the Sassoons and others, who had acquired a virtual monopoly of the opium trade in India, profited enormously from the "Opium Wars," but it must be remembered that since Cromwell and his Puritans adored God's Chosen, whose financial support they needed, and admitted even undisguised members of the tribe to England, the British, befuddled by Christianity, tolerated the invaders and the pollution of their own aristocracy by marriages with handsomely dowered and superficially Christianized Jewesses, eventually even admitted the Chosen to British citizenship, and were cozened into believing that an Anglo-Yiddish alliance was destined (by "Bible prophecy" and economics) to rule the world. This delusion seemed confirmed by the career of Benjamin D'Israeli, who championed a sound imperial policy and became Prime Minister and Earl of Beaconsfield. The folly of the British naturally led to their ruin, but Americans, who ruined their country and gave it away to please the International Predators, have no right to wax censorious.

With so much preliminary proviso, we may come to our real subject.

The basic fact, known to everyone who has even a slight acquaintance with English literature, is that during the period in question opium had approximately the status of aspirin today. Every English family of consequence and most Americans kept opium, usually in the form of its tincture, laudanum, in their homes, for use to relieve insomnia, headaches, and arthritic and other pains. That was simply a matter of course, and no one (except possibly a few professional yappers) thought that use of opium objectionable. It was known, of course, that some persons became addicted to opium in one form or another, just as some became alcoholics, and that addiction was physically deleterious to some of them, but persons who became addicted to any substance so far as to damage their physical or mental health were obviously moral weaklings, and no one was, as yet, so idiotic as to try to protect individuals from themselves and thus aid godly witch-doctors in their schemes to attain total dominion over an enslaved populace.

I used the analogy with aspirin (acetylsalicylic acid) advisedly. It does relieve insomnia, headaches, etc., but whether it is salubrious, even in very small doses, is questioned, and it is known to be injurious in large doses. It is also addictive for some persons. About twenty years ago, as I recall, a wreck on a railroad and several deaths were caused by a locomotive engineer who had become addicted to aspirin and had to have twelve or more tablets every day; the drug so impaired his vision that he mistook a red signal for green. Aspirin is manufactured very profitably by several large drug companies, and, so far as I know, no holy man has as yet thought of agitating to have it prohibited.

The basic principle of free trade is that merchants have a right to offer for sale commodities such as opium and sugar and jewelry; if opium is bought by addicts, or sugar bought by diabetics, or jewelry by women who cannot afford it, that is not the merchant's concern—and, as a matter of practical business, cannot be. Free trade in commodities is something quite different from the sale of weapons to enemy races, which, like the training of aliens in our race's technology, is simply treason and should be punished accordingly.

The difficulty began because the Chinese, evidently through some racial weakness, possibly exacerbated by a feeling of frustration under Manchu rule, became addicted to opium in large numbers. The Manchu government, unable to prevent its subjects from buying, sought to prohibit British and other merchants from selling the desired commodity. The Manchus seem to have been sincere in that purpose, although they also wished to save for their economy the money that was spent on opium, and certainly were glad of a plausible pretext to intensify their harassment of the hated White men.

It is a matter of record, diligently concealed by purveyors of moralistic sucker-bait, that the British were sympathetic to the Chinese and that in 1839 Sir Charles Elliot, who, as a naval commander, had supervisory authority over British traders in China, forced the British merchants to hand over to the Chinese authorities their entire stock of more than twenty thousand chests of opium, worth more than $10,000,000 (in real money) and to pledge themselves that they would bring no more of that commodity to China. The mandarins claimed they destroyed all twenty thousand chests; it was rumored, however, that some of the chests served to make some enterprising Chinese wealthy.

Had the Chinese been content with that settlement, there doubtless would have been nothing more to chronicle, but, as other races invariably do when they confront Aryans, a race incomprehensible to their minds, the Chinese mistook generosity for weakness. They used their "victory" over the cowardly "White devils" to make demands so outrageous that no self-respecting nation could accept them, and they fired on vessels sailing under the British flag. In those days Aryans, although infected with Christianity and plagued with do-gooders, were still men, not the shrinking little twerps they have now become, and Great Britain took appropriate action, which can be rationally deprecated only as being too mild.

It is unnecessary to trace the hostilities, repeatedly terminated by treaties the Chinese did not observe, and renewed several times until the British (with French allies) lost patience and sent an armed force to Peking, where the Chinese government, facing the warlike "White devils" in its own capital, finally yielded. (An apologist for the Manchus can truthfully allege that the inconsistency of policy in Peking may have been partly caused by the T'ai-p'ing revolt of Hung Siu-ts'üan, which enlisted the sympathies of many British and Americans.)

The important point to remember is that opium was not the cause of the "Opium Wars," which began after the English had agreed not to offer that commodity for sale in China, and that, as a matter of fact, throughout those "wars" the British did not demand the right to sell opium in China until they dictated the terms of peace in Peking, where they were determined to end forever a specious pretext for harassment of, and violence against, British merchants.

For all practical purposes, the right to sell opium to the Chinese became largely theoretical. Enterprising Chinese in the western provinces imported the right varieties of poppy from Turkey and went into production, and by 1900 they were supplying the Chinese market with 20,000 tons of opium annually, and exporting large quantities to the countries of southeast Asia. Only a small amount of opium was still imported from British India to China, sold chiefly to persons who believed it superior to the domestic product.

The racial weakness of the Chinese and the efforts of the Manchu government to prohibit domestic production (which, naturally, had chiefly the effect of increasing the price of the drug and the profits of successful vendors) attracted international attention, and soon do-gooders began to wail about the horrid drug.

There was no "drug problem" in the United States, where, in most states, opium and cocaine could be purchased over the counter in any drug store, until the Harrison Act in 1914 sought to restrict distribution of such drugs to physicians, and placed the physicians under supposedly strict regulations. The do-gooders kept at it, of course, until the now demoralized and servile nation reached its present plight. But that is another story.

We now come to the latest of the four books, the autobiography of Lyndon H. LaRouche, Jr., The Power of Reason: 1988 (Washington, D.C., Executive Intelligence Review, 1987). Although no mortal could attain such erudition and wisdom as to deserve the accolades that LaRouche bestows on himself, it is obvious that he has read widely and accumulated a store of miscellaneous learning. It is probable, for example, that few Americans, outside departments of Russian in major universities, know the name of Ivan Goncharov or the title of his now forgotten novel, Oblomov (1858), which LaRouche seems to have read. He has certainly read Nicholas of Cusa's De docta ignorantia (c. 1440), to which he, following some Catholic scholars, attributes an exaggerated value, and even the less known De pace fidei, from which he claims that he and his wife derived their conception of ecumenical Christianity.

The knowledge that LaRouche thus displays makes one wonder whether the fantastic ignorance he also displays is not voluntary. One makes allowance, of course, for his ill-defined mysticism and for his certainty that, e.g., Newton and Darwin, being Englishmen, must have been the agents of an infernal conspiracy to destroy civilization, but how can one account for such blatant absurdity as his description of the Emperor Tiberius as "pacing in his villa, waiting for the messengers from Judaea announcing Christ's death"?[2]

2. Of course, assuming that the famous Jesus really existed and was executed, as stated in the "New Testament," that would have been a trivial incident that Pontius Pilate would not even have mentioned obiter in an official report, and which he would have forgotten in a few years, at most. The incident is put in proper perspective in Anatole France's celebrated short story, "Le procurateur de Judée," of which, by the way, there is an elegant Latin translation by Conrad Mueller, which won the first prize in the Certamen Capitolinum in 1951 and was published by the Institutum Romanis Studiis Provehendis in that year.

LaRouche's pia ignorantia becomes explicable when he informs us, to the amazement of everyone who has even a smattering of historical knowlege, how Octavian achieved his great victory over Anthony and Cleopatra at Actium. You see, the future emperor Augustus met secretly with the priests of Mithra[3] in a grotto on the island of Capri and made a deal with them to obtain the support of "the Syrian military orders," who then won the battle for him. But why should LaRouche invent such asinine twaddle? He knows what he is doing, for it leads to the world-shaking disclosure that his Jesus wasn't crucified by the godly Yids, who can do no wrong; no, indeed! the crucifixion was contrived by those awful priests of Mithra, who had conspired with Augustus to prevent the capital of the empire from being moved from Rome to Alexandria, which was then the equivalent of New York today, the largest Jewish city in the world. There is, you see, method in Lyndon's madness.

3. Although it is possible that in the time of Octavian there were in Italy a few low-grade Orientals (probably not Semites) who worshipped Mithra (Mithras), the Romans knew nothing of them, and it was not until about a hundred and twenty-five years later that the cult became a noteworthy religion in Italy. It spread rapidly throughout Europe thereafter, its votaries being chiefly soldiers and merchants of Oriental ancestry. As is well known, the Christians, when they came along, took many elements of their cult from the Mithraic (Christmas, the eucharist, the notion of salvation through the shed blood of a god, the presence of shepherds and Zoroastrian priests at the birth of Jesus in a cave (later changed to a stable), the title of 'Father' for their holy men, etc.).

The worship of Mithra was a derivative of Zoroastrianism, much as Christianity was a derivative of Judaism: it invented a son for its supreme god, made the son a Saviour who redeemed mankind and served as a mediator between his father and mortals, and thus made the son overshadow and almost replace the unapproachable father. Mithraism was a manly religion, and although it is much to be regretted that it was replaced by Christianity, that was perhaps inevitable. The Mithraic faith was available only to men, who met in small congregations of twenty or less, which were about all their small grottos (which Christian churches imitated on a much larger scale) would hold; wives and mistresses had to go to a temple of the Magna Mater, which was sometimes conveniently located across the street, but their religion therefore differed radically from that of the men.

Needless to say, "the Syrian military orders" were also invented by LaRouche.

The foregoing will suffice to show in what spirit you should read the great man's autobiography. LaRouche's greatness is evident from the ardor with which he waves the incense pots before himself. It is obvious from his foreword that he is the only man in the world who understands the music of Mozart and Beethoven, and the first sentence of his first chapter modestly informs us that he is "the leading economist in the world today." If he were not so modest, he would have admitted he is the only one who is not a fraud and fool. That follows, because he is the only one who understands his epochal discovery, the application of Georg Riemann's non-Euclidean geometry and theory of complex variables (the mathematics of Einstein's Relativity) to economics.[4]

The proprietor of the "LaRouche-Riemann method" claims to have predicted accurately some economic fluctuations in the United States. I have not tried to verify that claim.

The cosmogonic "LaRouche-Riemann method" yields marvels that are not confined to economics. It enables Lyndon to speak with contempt of British conspirators, such as Newton and Darwin and Rutherford, who use the vile empirical method and try to ascertain reality by experiments with material and perceptible things, instead of sitting down with a pencil and pad of paper to manipulate mathematical formulae and thus know what happens in multi-dimensional space-time—which no one has ever seen and which may exist only in a fevered brain. It also, in some obscure way, led LaRouche to his vision of "ecumenical Christianity," on which, he says, Pope John Paul II is in almost complete agreement with him.

LaRouche, moreover, has learned something since 1976. Marx is no longer a "scientific genius" with a wonderful "world view."

4. Riemann's Habilitationsschrift (Inaugural Lecture) in 1854 is said to mark the point at which serious consideration of non-Euclidian geometry began. For help in understanding Riemann's methods, I suggest Fundamentals of Mathematics, translated by S. H. Gould from the Grundzüge der Mathematik (Göttingen, 2d ed., 1967-1971), and published by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1974-1976. For Riemann's non-Euclidian geometry, see Vol. II, pp. 563-566 and 598-604, and specially note (and ponder) the conclusion on p. 563 that the multi-dimensional "Riemannian space" is "locally"—that is, at any given point—the normal three-dimensional space of Euclid. For Riemann's analytic calculus, see Volume III, where the entries are so numerous that you had best find the pages by looking up Riemann's name and the adjective derived from it in the index. Since LaRouche, so far as I know, has never published his own calculations, how Riemann's involute mathematics apply to economics is a profound mystery.

Marx's doctrine has become "a chimera" and a "clever hoax"; it is "irrationalist" and most of it was plagiarized from the wicked writings of many evil people, such as Descartes; it is materialistic and contrary to Christian principles; and—if you have been following Lyndon's mental processes you do not need to be told what comes next—Marx was hired and supervised by British intelligence in its plot to destroy civilization.

Lyndon has learned something more that pains him intensely. He has had a tragic experience. Despite a career devoted to manufacturing smoke screens to hide Jews at work, and although he is "assisted by Israeli intelligence" (i.e., Mossad), he was—oh, horrors!—called "anti-Semitic" by the Defamation League of Jewish cowboys who ride herd on their American cattle. That makes them bad boys, even though they are God's Chosen, and enabled LaRouche to discover that Indira Gandhi, the "wonderful woman" who was the only "head of state...of world-stature," having been wise enough to collaborate with Lyndon, was assassinated by terrorists hired by the A.D.L., the Heritage Foundation, and Senator Jesse Helms.

Lyndon claims that he, applying the invincible LaRouche-Riemann method, invented the plan, sponsored by Ronnie Reagan as a "Strategic Defense Initiative" and derisively called "Star Wars" by the jewspapers, for making the United States invulnerable to atomic and other missiles by shooting them down and destroying them in the upper atmosphere.[5] He is certain that it would be infallible, and when one reads the roster of "concerned scientists" who hysterically protested it couldn't possibly work, from Abbie Abrams to Zollie Zuckermann, one inclines to believe him right about that—but one would feel more confident, if he did

5. I remember having read many years ago a "science fiction" story according to which the United States, after having broken up into a number of independent states, usually at war with each other, and having suffered great loss of life from both war and epidemics, fortunately including all of the pestilential "minorities," thus becoming a White (Aryan) nation again, was protected and completely isolated from the rest of the planet by such an electronic shield, which instantly and automatically destroyed every metallic object in the atmosphere or on the sea. Airplanes were, of course, impossible and the exhaustion of domestic supplies of petroleum made automobiles useless. Electric power from the earth's magnetic field near its subterranean core operated the much improved railways, while farming and local transporation depended on horses, to the great improvement of health, morality, and social stability.

not straightaway propose to establish American colonies on Mars.[6]

We must not take time to enumerate the other marvels to be found in this autobiography,[7] or to inquire who finances the network of intelligence agents who continually report to LaRouche from all parts of the world. We must now consider our only real problem: Why did the slightly disguised tyranny in Washington use ponderous machinery, including hundreds of its lawless bullies, to squash a man who, whether half-mad victim of his own delusions or a cynical merchant of hokum, has given no evidence of an intellectual capacity that would make him a threat to them—or anyone else?

But has he nevertheless offended our masters?

He has called attention to the fact that the United States has destroyed its own economy and virtually liquidated the industrial capacity it once had, but that is simply a fact painfully apparent to anyone who considers our present dependence on imports, even for things still sold under the names of American corporations, from typewriters to bulldozers.

He has vehemently denounced the depredations of "international finance" in this country and throughout the world. That is a grievous offense, especially since the Jews have declared that hostility to the looters of international finance is, ipso facto, "anti-Semitic." But a number of other writers, with more numerous or at least more influential readers, have dared to do as much and do it more lucidly and cogently, for example, Lawrence Patterson in the monthly market-letter that he candidly entitles Lessons in Criminal Politics, and it has not yet been thought necessary to incarcerate them in prisons.

6. While it is probably technically possible to build metal igloos on Mars within which a few human beings could exist in an atmosphere chemically generated and electrically heated, the expense of such an undertaking, even by LaRouche's optimistic calculations, would greatly exceed the combined resources of the United States, Europe, and Japan, but that is not the real point. What sane man would want to live on a Mars?

7. I cannot, however, forbear telling you that the Odyssey, if read by a genius, proves that Ulysses sailed across the Atlantic into the Caribbean, then traveled up the Atlantic coast to New England, crossed the Atlantic to Europe, and thence went home to Ithaca "by land" (whether walking or driving a Mercedes is not stated).

A graver offense, no doubt, is to be found in the chapter of his autobiography entitled "AIDS: the Apocalypse," in which he discusses the nature of the malady and points out the biological impossibility of ever producing a vaccine that would limit the contagion. He affirms that "the policy-making structures of the West's so-called industrial powers" have, in ways he does not explain, "created the AIDS pandemic," and he avers, perhaps with some hyperbole, that his "best computer estimates, using the most conservative estimates based on known statistics, is [sic] that AIDS can make the human species extinct within as soon as thirty-five to forty years from now."

Such a cry of alarm must be vexatious to our rulers, whose principal problem is that of spreading the infection among White men and women before the infatuated boobs perceive that, aside from sexual perverts, the dire epidemic is (as Lyndon would never dream of admitting) chiefly carried by niggers, mestizos, and Kikes, and by White women whose instincts are so etiolated that they copulate with bearers of the lethal disease.

LaRouche's alarming remarks must have been annoying to the Establishment, but other men with better credentials have described how direly infectious is the virus that destroys the immune system and are still unimprisoned, for example, the two physicians named McNamee in their book, AIDS: the Nation's First Politically Protected Disease, on which I hope to comment in a future issue of this periodical. And their book should be reassuring to our rulers. It was published in the hope of influencing the referendum in California, at which a majority of the voters, including, no doubt, an undetermined number of Americans, voted to facilitate spread of the epidemic, doubtless to promote sacrosanct Equality.

Lyndon, furthermore, while crying alarm about the epidemic, has done so in a way the government should approve. He not only says nothing about the racial factors in the epidemic, but he vigorously insists that the deadly Immunity Deficiency is not "sexually transmitted," thus making clear how outrageous would be prejudice against our precious perverts. That should give him a gold star on his record.

Against these offenses we must set off Lyndon's activities that should endear him to our enemies in Washington.

He has imprimis consistently and strenuously labored to conceal all the depredations of Yahweh's Master Race, diverting attention away from them, commissioning and publishing volumes of more or less artfully manufactured sucker-bait, which, although they excite only cynical laughter from educated and critical readers, doubtless do impose on the many Americans who are thoughtlessly ready to believe whatever they see in print, especially if it is decorated with footnotes.

He has found every way to denounce "racists" and wicked individuals who believe in biology instead of the LaRouche-Riemann method, which proves that we should stimulate to the maximum the breeding of anthropoids everywhere on this planet until we reach the paradisial millennium around 2400, when there will be only standing room on the globe and we shall have to learn to sleep standing up. Belief that there are distinct races is the dastardly work of conspiratorial British materialists, who perversely consider visible and tangible realities instead of spending their time with a pencil and pad of paper, jiggling mathematical formulae while meditating on the glories of "ecumenical Christianity."

Those two achievements alone should make Lyndon worthy of a Congressional Medal of Honor, according to the criteria by which that decoration is now awarded.

LaRouche concludes the main part of his autobiography with the candid admission that he "is the only person in sight who possesses the tested abilities for doing what must be done." Consequently, "among all of the power elite, the idea of my being president scares them almost to death."

Now I am willing to wager that neither Ronnie nor Bushy, nor yet any one of their thousands of accomplices, ever lost so much as ten minutes of sleep through worry over Lyndon's chances of becoming president. And that brings us back to our original puzzle: why was it deemed necessary to use all the resources of government to clobber an intellectual nullity?[8]

8. One could imagine, of course, that LaRouche is a man of keen intellect who, like the first Brutus, pretends to be foolish while awaiting the time to strike a decisive blow, but of that there is no evidence whatsoever. One could suggest that he is the victim of in-fighting between the F.B.I. and the C.I.A., or between the C.I.A. and Mossad, since the two agencies, while overlapping, are not identical, but such conjectures are vain so long as the sources of LaRouche's income during the past two decades remain unknown.

2. ROUSING THE POPULACE

As we all know, democracy (in the contemporary sense of that word) depends on keeping the herds grazing contentedly and growing pelts for their annual fleecing, and this involves keeping them amused with games and with "crises" about which they will chatter without ever trying to understand them.

If nothing that LaRouche or his pet scribblers have done seems to merit the drastic chastisement inflicted on him, perhaps the solution to our puzzle is to be found in his followers' anomalous political organization, of which the potentiality has not yet been clearly determined. It appears, however, to be something of a nuisance.

In Liberty Bell, June 1986 and April 1987, I reported on the misbehavior of numerous voters in Illinois. They read the "populist" laws about primary elections, enacted to please bumbling reformers before the First World War, and they took the decorative verbiage seriously, imagining that they actually had a right to decide who would represent them in the government of the state. They thus nominated in the "Democratic Party" two of LaRouche's followers for the offices of Lieutenant Governor (a man whose duties are to twiddle his thumbs until the Governor leaves the state, often dashing to Asia, seeking to import more Chinese and other Orientals to help keep the tax-paying animals in their place) and Secretary of State (whose principal job is to issue licenses for automobiles).

That audacious act precipitated an uproar. Although one of the candidates was a Jewess, the Jews scurried to their Wailing Wall and lamented that unkind remarks about the Federal Reserve and open objection to financial looting was simply "anti-Semitism," and quaking with fear that millions of Sacred Sheenies were about to be stuffed into gas-chambers. That was probably just automatic behavior by a race that never misses an opportunity to wail that it is persecuted by its victims. What was significant was the reaction of the political gang that owns the state.

In their indignation over the ingratitude of the voters, they gave the whole show away. They had generously provided for the tax-payers of Illinois a game they could not only watch every two years, whenever they were tired of watching niggers kick or throw balls, but in which the spectators could themselves participate by squandering their time and money to advance the candidacy of Tweedledum over Tweedledee, or even rush around in a frantic attempt to organize a "Third Party," which would have no chance of appearing on the ballot, given the enormous number of unchallengeable signatures on petitions that protective legislation had made necessary. It was outrageous that presumptuous voters, not content with the recreation kindly provided for them, should make trouble for the managers of the carnival.

The Democratic bosses, beating their breasts in piacular anguish over their negligence in permitting those damned voters to nominate candidates of their own, urged all loyal party members to vote against their party, i.e., that half of the ruling gang, thus forever making ridiculous the pretense that there is real competition between the two teams that are needed to play games for the public. The Democratic candidate for Governor flounced away in lady-like horror at being associated, even on a printed ballot, with such vile wretches and extemporized a sudden political party of his own (he was a privileged character, of course), thus facilitating the reëlection of the generally detested incumbent, as may have been originally planned. And pus spurted from every editorial office in the state.

At nearly the same time, the politicos in Michigan likewise exposed the much-touted "Two Party System" as just a hoax. An earnest and determined man, who openly professed the view that White Americans are entitled to be represented in government, won the Republican nomination for Congressman. There was again turmoil and horrification. The Republican bosses urged Republican voters to vote against their party's candidate, that awful man who was not content with the status of White Americans as tax-paying animals. The slime-machine in Michigan pumped out its best sludge, and, by heroic efforts, the Republican half of the gang was saved from the disgrace of electing a candidate whom those God-damned voters had actually had the gall to choose for themselves. The "Two-Party" hoax was exposed, of course, but the bosses didn't give a damn, relying on their power to keep the dumb brutes in their place thereafter.

What makes these shenanigans so quaint is their futility. Had the American candidate been elected to Congress and refused to sell out, he could have inserted statements in the Congressional Record and said some disobliging things, but, one man amid about five hundred, he actually could have accomplished no more than a sailor who had joined the crew of a pirate ship. The candidates of LaRouche's organization could have done even less in Illinois, given the limitations of the offices for which they were candidates. They could have talked, of course, and would have been entitled to a derisive simulation of impartiality in the poison-pen press, but that is all—and what harm would a little talk have done in a situation in which the two teams of the ruling consortium frequently spend time in trading insults and arguing with each other to give the impression that the legislative enactment, whatever it is, has not been determined long in advance.

If an elected maverick becomes an annoying nuisance, he can always be disposed of easily. Dr. Carlton Myers, a veterinary who was appointed a Federal inspector of meats and naively imagined that his duty was to inspect meats intended for the market, instead of playing pinochle with his buddies and giving the boobs the impression that the meat had actually been inspected, in his unfortunately dull but pathetic book, "I Had to Watch My Country Die" (s.l.; published by the author, 1976), recounts (pp. 195 ff.) the fate of a man named Dean, a member of the Senate of the State of Georgia, who dared to expose publicly a particularly malodorous plundering of the tax-payers by a scheme that would net the promoters a billion dollars (of 1976 vintage) in three years. His speech went unnoticed, but three days later the scallawag press in Atlanta began to scream that Senator Dean had misreported some items on his expense account. The curs in the rest of the state's journalistic kennels began to bark and howl in chorus, and join in demanding investigation of the criminal. He was indicted and tried (but not convicted, untrained persons having been included in the jury); he was censured by the Senate (evidently for not having been convicted); and the flood of publicity ruined him politically. That's what can always be done to public officials who dare to vex their masters, and while it would be a bore to have to make the effort to abate a nuisance elected by voters who become insolent, it can always be done, if the rulers are seriously annoyed.

The political comedy will be played again this year, for LaRouche's followers, undeterred by the capture and isolation of their titular leader, are again trying to get into the show. In Illinois, the two who were defeated in 1986 have filed petitions to enter the Democratic primaries, and they have been joined by three others, one a negress. The engineers of the political machine are already bellowing that they will see to it that insubordinate voters do not have another chance to take the bit between their teeth and run away. It will be remarkable if the bosses have not arranged to have some spurious signatures on the petitions that are needed even to enter primaries, and the question could be tied up in the courts until after the primaries are over. And it is not surprising that two of the candidates have been indicted for robbery, theft, burglary (!), and extorting money from an old woman.

The latter charge seems to be fashionable in politics today, if I am correctly informed that, by a very odd coincidence, in the State of Oregon the two candidates from LaRouche's group have likewise been indicted for extorting money from an old woman. The indictments will probably be all that is needed to restore the status quo in Oregonian politics.

I have not heard what is happening elsewhere. I suppose that in several other states LaRouche's followers have put forward candidates, some or all of whom have been indicted for burglary and extorting money from old women.

Let me note emphatically that I know nothing about the LaRouche organization's candidates, and that I necessarily have reservations about persons who choose to follow the self-ordained and self-admiring genius whose writings I have described above. I am interested in them only for the elucidation of practical politics their efforts occasion.

In a democracy, of course, it is necessary to keep a tight rein on the tax-paying voters as they pull the ever heavier wains to which they are harnessed, but even so, is not the consternation in the ruling gang by nominations in primary elections excessive? Even if the offending candidates are nominated, what harm could they do?

I do not know what those candidates intend to say, if they succeed in obtaining a chance to contest the real election.

They will orate, no doubt, about the destruction of American industry and the looting of the country by the international usurers, but why not let them? The work has been done. The United States is utterly and hopelessly bankrupt, and the den of thieves in Washington is working hard to get as much more loot as possible before the crash comes. The Federal Reserve's trading stamps will inevitably become useful only for recycling paper. The factories that have been destroyed cannot be rebuilt, and debts to the usurers cannot be reduced, but will instead increase geometrically. Nothing can be done about the fait accompli—and if it could, the Aryans have become such pusillanimous little creatures, afraid of their own shadow, that they would never dare to do it. Everyone knows that, so why not let the candidates talk to a helpless populace? They will orate about hygiene and good health to a man on his deathbed.

I can see only one way in which the candidates could create a sufficient stir to embarrass the masters and disturb the smooth performance of the usual electoral vaudeville show.

LaRouche's publication New Solidarity, 31 October 1986—the issue, incidentally, in which was reported the raid on the publication's office by a mob of four hundred (yes, 400!) agents of the Federal Bureau of Intimidation, the opening of the drive to suppress and imprison LaRouche—printed an article by Warren J. Hamerman entitled, "If You Really Want to Know the Truth About AIDS, Ask a Veterinarian." I am told that it has been reprinted recently.

The article points out that the lentivirus of the disease is of the same kind as the several varieties of lentivirus that cause devastating epizoötics among sheep, cattle, and horses, which can be controlled and halted only by slaughter of all infected animals and all animals that have been in contact with them (since they may have been infected and be capable of spreading the contagion without showing detectable symptoms for a fairly long time). It is, of course, obvious to anyone who is willing to think about it that the epidemic of the invariably lethal infection called "AIDS" (a more accurate term is African Plague) can be controlled only by rigorous segregation and quarantine of all persons known to be infected, and strict supervision of all who may have been infected by them.

The writer of a letter printed in Liberty Bell, June 1989, p. 45, reports, on the basis of information given him by a worker in a morgue, that in his county the rate of death from the epidemic is almost ten times as great as the total number of cases, living and dead, reported by official statistics. This suggests that the death-rate throughout the country is nearing the point at which it will no longer be possible to conceal the actual extent of the epidemic.

If the LaRouche candidates are allowed to campaign on this issue, and do so skillfully, they might be able to excite a contagion of fear that could put them in office. The majority of Americans no longer care about what will soon happen to their race, their culture, and their children, but it may be that they retain enough of the mammalian instinct of self-preservation to react to an imminent danger to their own lives. But the results of the referendum in California and the present apathy of the public makes it more likely that the Jews' newspapers and boob-tubes will be able to keep the feckless Aryans befuddled so long as the death-rate is not so great that it can no longer be ignored.

Let me repeat that I am uninformed about the strength and financing of LaRouche's organization, which appears to have gone partly underground, and the characters of its candidates, matters which are irrelevant here.

The important point is that, on the record, the followers of LaRouche, whose candidates include both Jews and niggers, and who would never think of noticing biological facts of race, must be far more acceptable to the ruling powers than any Aryan organization could possibly be. Their leader has been successfully removed from public life, and if he had not, the mentality evinced in his book and the books manufactured to his specifications is one that makes any serious fear of him absurd. He appears to have no successor, and any acephalous organization is sure to be ephemeral.

It would be hard to imagine an association of persons determined to break into politics without becoming lackeys of the rulers that, on the evidence, would be more innocuous to those rulers than LaRouche's remaining followers. The bitter opposition they have encountered must therefore come from politicians whose interest is only in maintaining their monopoly of public office as obedient servants of those rulers.

The political gang, which is genuinely "bi-partisan," is a tightly organized band of professionals, who naturally resent amateurs who try to break into the club. No man becomes a 33° Mason without passing through the lower grades. In the Army, even today, not even Jews and niggers become generals without having held lower ranks, though they rise through those ranks with the agility of greased eels. The same is true in politics, and for very urgent reasons.

An aspirant to political power must begin by holding minor and relatively unimportant offices, in which his ability to woo voters and his conduct in office can be observed critically, and if he shows a tendency to honesty or other undesirable characteristics, he can be quickly and permanently eliminated.[9]

9. A good illustration is provided by a young and ambitious State's Attorney who took an interest when the body of a new-born pickaninny was found in the garbage of a large apartment building, and the police connected it with the only black female in the rather expensive apartments,

The rewards of working one's way up and proving one's worth are, of course, great, and a talented crook may attain the beatitude of eventual membership in what is, for all practical purposes, a closed club. In its issue for June 1989 the staid Reader's Digest published an article, "Congressmen for Life: the Incumbency Scandal," which took its departure from the election in 1988, in which 99% of the incumbents were reëlected to the Congress, in which, it was observed, there was less turnover than in the Supreme Soviet. The normal rate of reëlection is over 90%, a remarkable figure when one considers the inevitable losses through retirement of the aged (on pensions of more than $80,000 per annum plus many other emoluments) and death. The article goes on to explain the ways in which life-time tenure of office is virtually guaranteed to incumbents who are not rash enough to offend the masters, and to list many sources of additional loot.

The subject was taken up by quite a few periodicals, even National Review, and attracted the interest of conscious Americans. A group in Oregon saw the point and organized the Silent Revolt (P.O. Box 1445, Hillsboro, Oregon; 97123). The revolution is to be carried out passively, without fanfare, without rallies, without aggressive action, by the procedure of never, never under any circumstances, voting for the incumbent, and always voting for the rival candidate, however unlikeable, who has the which were occupied by graduate students and instructors in the local diploma-mill. She was on her way to the degree of Ph.D. in Social Service, and explained that she had not known she was pregnant—she thought she had the "flu"—and she was really surprised when the baby popped out. Since she had no use for it, she stopped its crying, wrapped it neatly in newspaper, and carried it up two floors higher, where she dropped it in the garbage-chute that passed in front of her own apartment, thus, as she believed, effectively concealing the origin of the little corpse. The State's Attorney was so full of bigotry that he thought that laws applicable to White tax-paying animals were also applicable to Noble Niggers, even to a mental giantess on her way to becoming a Doctor of Philosophy. He proposed to try her for murder, as the state's laws provided. The management of the diploma-mill felt outraged, and in such communities large diploma-mills are big business, just as steel-mills used to be, when the United States was an industrial nation. The political gang naturally protected the industry, noticed the character of the unreliable State's Attorney, and went into action. When I last heard, the erstwhile lawyer was working as a clerk in a "supermarket."

best chance of unseating the scoundrel—and who, of course, is to be voted out of office at the next election.

If this procedure is adopted widely enough in all elections for state or federal office, it might enable Americans eventually to recover control of their country, and it has the great advantage that it is hard to see how terrorists from the Federal Bureau of Intimidation could harass and overawe the offending voters. The proponents of the Silent Revolution hope that there are enough intelligent Americans to make the method successful, and they draw inspiration from Kipling, whose description of undemonstrative but implacable resolve they quote:

Their voices were even and low,
Their eyes were level and straight,
There was neither sign nor show,
When the Saxons began to hate.

The question, of course, is whether there are enough Saxons and others of their race (as distinct from twerps of Germanic ancestry) left in this blighted land to hate their tyrants. But anyway, the idea and especially the verses may induce apoplexy in some politicians and "Liberal intellectuals," and that would be a net gain.

3. ONE SWALLOW

In February 1989 occurred an event that continues to excite more interest in our thin ranks than is currently aroused in the general public by the rather sensational events in Europe associated with the new dance routine introduced by that stellar team of hoofers, Gorbachev & Bush. David Duke was actually elected to the legislature of Louisiana.

It would be redundant to identify the man to readers of this periodical, or to appraise the joy that his election aroused in some quarters. If you are interested, see the typical and encomiastic article in Instauration, September 1989. Our interest here must be in the political process that resulted in his election, after which we may inquire whether Aristotle was right in his warning that one swallow does not end winter and bring spring.

A reasonably fair account of the election, without the usual journalistic caterwauling, appeared in New Orleans in the Sunday edition of the Times-Picayune, 5 March 1989. The cardinal facts are these:

(1) The district, on the southern edge of Lake Pontchartrain, from which David Duke was elected, consists principally of the town of Metairie; the population is 99.6% White; 61% own their own homes (so far as that is possible under Judaeo-Communist rule, where the serfs really rent their homes from the tax-collectors, and often, from usurers, too). This is obviously the primary cause of the disaster. One of the gangsters whom the Commissariat appoints as Federal judges to keep the serfs in servitude should have issued an order, as was recently done in Yonkers, New York, that the serfs must be taxed to build homes for enough niggers to produce "racial balance"—or, better yet, since there are only 2.4 persons per household in the district, he could have ordered every house to accommodate a dozen niggers to teach Civil Rights to the occupants.

(2) The political gang was taken by surprise. The man whom Duke defeated said that he had been sure "it was going to be some sleepy little ol' election, a state representative kind of race where nobody gives a damn who wins." No one gave a damn when the choice was between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. Shouldn't they be even more unconcerned when an alternative to Tweedledee was unthinkable? The gang's political experts and poll-takers had assured them that White worms never turn, and would never vote for someone who favored them. When the gang belatedly awoke to the danger, the harm had already been done, and the candidate whom they had regarded with contempt was recommending himself to voters who were becoming impatient of their servitude.

(3) The all-out measures taken to cope with the emergency were oddly ineffective. The Sheenies, incensed by possible insubordination of their White dogs, screeched as they usually do, and one of their terrorists openly threatened bloodshed. That did not work, and some clever rabbis thought it had been a mistake.

The chief of the dervishes, Archbishop Hannan, supposedly a power in a predominantly Roman Catholic society, yelled that Divine Providence, alias Yahweh & Son, had decreed the "equality of races," it being understood, of course, that Yahweh's Yids and their pet niggers are fifty times as equal as the lowly Aryans, whom the aforesaid Providence appointed to serve them. His retail spook-vendors were instructed to ram his pronouncement into the ears of all their customers. Most of the holy men in other denominations loudly agreed with him, thus incidentally making obvious the source of the infection that has rotted the minds of our race.

The president of the diploma-mill called Loyola University circularized the alumni, urging them to be content with their servile status. (So far as I can learn from the press, the president of Tulane, which had a high reputation in the old days, was more prudent.)

And finally, Ronnie and Bushy, who could not possibly respect themselves, naturally had no respect for the traditional dignity of the position to which they had climbed. They jumped down from their pinnacle in Washington and waved their arms in horror at the danger that the White curs might elect a man who thought they had rights.

Some believe that all that righteousness was, as journalists like to say these days, "counter-productive," or, in English, self-defeating. At all events, David Duke was elected, by a generous margin, to a seat in the legislature in Baton Rouge, where, according to all accounts, he is behaving prudently and well, within the very narrow limits of the position he holds.

The Jews naturally rushed in from California their big Holohoax show about the millions of sweet Sheenies who were incinerated before they crawled into the United States and anchored their mandibles in the hides of their American cattle. The obscene fraud was sponsored by the Governor of Louisiana, the Louisiana State University, the Louisiana Endowment for the Humanities (!), and other scum.

I do not know whether any newspaper in Louisiana published the gob of Jewish excrement, said to be the work of a "New Orleans investigative journalist," that appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, 11 June 1989. It was headed, "David Duke, Building a Nazi Base in Louisiana," and was obviously manufactured to impress the feeble-minded. There was the usual offal about Mein Kampf, which it is devoutly hoped no American will read and find in it, mutatis mutandis, a clear description of his own plight, and about the Ku Klux Klan, which will never be forgiven for its activity in 1865-1875, which prevented the South from becoming a lovely jungle of diseased and mindless mongrels, ready for the Jews' One-World. The "investigative journalist," aghast that the vile people of Louisiana have not murdered Duke, implies that soon thousands of jack-booted Storm Troopers will be marching down Canal Street, dragging millions of wailing Yids to a soap factory or a bonfire. If the absurd article was published in Louisiana, many a White man who cringes whenever a lordly Jew frowns at him, said in the secret chamber of his own heart, "Ojalá!" — so that it, too, was "counter-productive."

At all events, the Wiesenthal show did not diminish the popularity of the newly elected legislator. According to seemingly reliable reports, he, elated by his victory, intends to seek a seat in the Federal Senate at the next election.

If he does, the Establishment, including both the professionals, determined to retain a monopoly of their dirty jobs, and our ruling enemies, determined to liquidate our race, will be tensely alert and will use all of its resources to destroy him, no matter what compromise he may make, because he has become a significant symbol. And he will be campaigning, not in a district of which the population is 99.6% White, most of them decent individuals, comparatively well educated, and moderately prosperous, so far as anyone, outside criminal circles, can be prosperous in the United States today. He will be campaigning in a state of which no more than 60% of the population can be considered White and are divided, perhaps fatally, by economic differences and many diverse interests that can be cunningly exploited. It may be that this is the means that has been chosen to get rid of the nuisance.

I have met David Duke, have seen video-tape recordings of some of his appearances on television, and wish him well. If I had ever been associated with him or had known him for ten years or more on terms of some amity, I would hazard a conjecture about his character. As it is, I cannot predict whether he will sell out or be shrewd enough to realize that if he does, it will do him no good. If he does not, he will certainly be suspected of having done so by some of his supporters, because he has not accomplished the impossible or has not accepted their advice or has made compromises that displease them.

Since I unfortunately lack the psychic powers that enable so many of our contemporaries to know matters for which there is no reliable evidence, I cannot estimate even the present situation. A correspondent assures me that Duke is vulnerable to blackmail, another tells me he is an unscrupulous opportunist, and a newsletter reports a latent scandal that would alienate many of his supporters, although unrelated to what is the only real issue, the survival of our race. Whether or not there be truth in those assertions, he is in a delicate and precarious position.

Even his friends report that he is trying to "distance" himself from his former connections with the Ku Klux Klan and even with his own Association for Advancement of White People, as though they were something of which he should be ashamed and for which he should apologize. How hazardous that is is shown by a letter published in Spotlight, 25 December 1989.

The writer of the letter asserts that, in an interview, David Duke said that he was "not a big fan of Spotlight," and that connecting him with it was "guilt by association." That report made the editor of the weekly indignant, because, he said, Duke had solicited its support in his projected campaign for the Senate, and the editor remarked with acerbity, "Nowadays, one never knows what David might [= may] think it is in his interest to say."

Now I do not know what Duke said or the context in which he said it, nor do I know whether the irate editor's characterization is justified, but I do know that no more damning an allegation can be made about anyone who seeks the confidence and support of rational men. The barometer is falling.

I can only suggest that (1) no one knows whether Duke's success would have been possible, had not the gang in Louisiana been overly confident that all Americans had been made so imbecile that they would never think of their own interests and welfare; and (2) before we can tell whether the untoward event in Louisiana was more than a mere flash in the pan of a flintlock, we shall have to see whether (a) other predominantly White districts nominate and elect candidates who profess to believe that White men have rights; (b) whether Duke survives or disappears politically; and (c) if he survives, by what means he has done so.

Only when we know the answers to all these questions can we decide whether the swallow was really the harbinger of a hoped-for but unexpected spring.

The determination of the professionals to retain their monopoly of their lucrative and pleasurable racket is a political force that cannot be overestimated. The foregoing, therefore, is an emphatic lesson for anyone who contemplates effecting a political change by seeking to obtain nominations within one or the other wing of the political gang that now has a monopoly of employment in the dirty business of government.

4. A SECOND PARTY?

The only alternative to trying to infiltrate the existing monopoly is the organization of an independent political party.

Persons who opt for this method are usually inspired by the brilliant success of the present Republican Party, which was formed by an alliance of fanatics, crackpots, and thieves to destroy the American Republic and launch a war of plunder and conquest against the southern states which had been part of the union thus dissolved. They forget, incidentally, that that Republican gang was not a third party, but a sixth party.

It was the last successful new political organization in this country. The Progressive Party of Theodore Roosevelt was just a Jewish promotion to ensure the election of their trained poodle to the Presidency, and it naturally evaporated when it had served its purpose. Other new parties, which were third parties when there still was some real competition between the two large ones, have had a regional success for a few years, e.g., the Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota and the Dixiecrats in part of the South.

There have been quite a few efforts to found a political party loyal to Americans since the final amalgamation of the official Democratic and Republican Parties in 1952. I saw something of one of them.

It was in the later 1950s, as I recall, that I spent some days in Memphis, shuttling by taxicab between the venerable and almost fabulous Peabody, where the "authentic" Constitution Party, having expelled subversives and malcontents, was holding its annual convention, and one of the garish new hotels, in which the "authentic" Constitution Party, having expelled subversives and malcontents, was holding its annual convention. I was, of course, treated to vehement demonstrations that virtue resided in one hotel and evil in the other, but I was convinced only of the dolorous frailty of our race.

Later, another disinterested observer and I discussed the question whether the fission was more than proof that the party had from the first lacked a man qualified for true leadership, i.e., a man endowed with the quality we call 'charisma,' which is not oratorical ability or intellectual acumen or pragmatic shrewdness, nor yet a combination of all three, unless one adds the mysterious force of personality for which there is no adequate explanation. Spengler equates it with a certain daimonic force that is both genetic and a quasi-religious faith. Interested only in men of exceptional ability, he divides them into two exclusive categories: "es gibt geborene Schicksalsmenchen und Kausalitätsmenschen." The latter think about life, the former live instinctively. Erudition, logical ratiocination, and critical acumen are, so to speak, afterthoughts: they do not make history. Men who are born with the vital force live instinctively, and use their keen minds as they might use a hammer or a sword, not to understand a phenomenon, but to accomplish their own purposes. And the Man of Destiny, driven by a will to power, must have an unquestioning belief in his own destiny: der Glaube an einen Stern, such as presumably inspired Napoleon—and, should we add, Hitler?

Whatever the explanation, charisma is innate; it cannot be learned or imitated. So our question really was, What would have happened to the Constitution Party had a man with the requisite charisma appeared to found it or take it over?

It was obvious, of course, that given the great difference between Germany and the United States, the difference between 1918-1932 and 1950-1960, and the enormous difference between German and American populations, neither Hitler nor his mode of action could have succeeded here. And if we asked for an American counterpart of the great Führer, we (who were Kausalitätsmenchen) could not even define in what his inspired leadership would consist, if he were to produce the desiderated miracle.

I believe that the Constitution Party was doomed from the first and could have been saved by no conceivable charisma, because the great majority of Americans no longer cared about the Constitution, such as it was. The schools had been devoted to teaching "life-adjustment," but their lessons may not have been necessary. Our people were so demoralized that their one interest, like a slave's, was in adjusting themselves to existing conditions—in obtaining as much comfort and pleasure as they could within the servile limitations imposed on them by an authority it would be hazardous to question, let alone disobey.

And that, I think, could be a reasonable summary of the fate of all the ephemeral political parties that were organized in the United States between 1946 and the present.

I knew something of the operations of a number of them, and, with an effort, I could probably recall their names and their promoters. I wish someone with scholarly proclivities would compile a roster of all those parties and of the dates that enclose their brief existence. The number of them would astonish you.

Some were mere rackets. I recall one, with a name that has been used several times, that was headed by a man whose aunt was a friend of my wife's; she said she had disowned the man as a nephew ever since he swindled even members of his own family in a closely held corporation. Most were well-meaning, if maladroit, efforts by men who imagined they had found a magic formula that would "awaken the people" and produce a patriotic effort that would be like a fire sweeping through a dry wheat field, and was actually like a lighted match dropped on grass after a rainstorm. Such efforts usually ended in bankruptcy and/or enough lawsuits to rejoice the legal profession.

Such efforts were always inadequately financed. I doubt that the total spent on all such attempts to form a patriotic party in the past forty years would equal the amount collected in a single year by just one of the big-time operators who vend Jesus-jargon to the ignorant and gullible.

They were all doomed from the first by the need to dissemble and compromise with the ignorance and incomprehension of the very public to which they would appeal. I remember a candidate for the Presidency whom I had known for some years and who was in an agony of embarrassment lest he compromise himself by being seen by reporters in an extended conversation with me. I understood, of course. He has since been utterly ruined politically by a scandal that was probably contrived for that purpose, but I still respect him and wish him well in the obscurity to which he had retired.

The same factors, of course, ruined what we may call parapolitical organizations, which hoped to create a climate that would result in political action for American ends. The only one that may have had a chance to be effective was the Birch Business, which I described in America's Decline, with a note in Liberty Bell, May 1985; it deserves a concluding chapter, which I hope to write soon.

One such organization that seemed at one time to have a potentiality was the Congress of Freedom, which reached its acme with a convention in San Francisco (in 1957, if recollection serves me), and attracted an attendance that surprised and perhaps a little overawed the press. It flourished, with smaller but more seasoned audiences, until 1960 or 1961, after which it speedily declined into a group of stalwarts who met every year "for auld lang syne" and to talk to each other, and it ended, perhaps a decade or more later, in a quarrel over a pitiably small amount of money and some battered furniture.

The insoluble problem at its peak was simply typical of all patriotic efforts involving organizations. There were essentially three irreconcilable points of view, viz. (1) God's People should be above criticism; (2) The damned Jews are destroying the world, but the damned Americans are so stupid they will never believe it, so we must arouse them with some subterfuge; and (3) An hypocritical pretense that will not deceive the enemy and only alienate some friends is vain, and the only hope is that of inducing people to accept the painful truth, stated with conviction and courage. Obviously, no ship can sail in three directions, and cutting it up into three pieces will not help.

The same dilemma appears in "new parties," multiplied many times, because their primary and immediate problem must be, What will startle prospective voters out of their apathy and yet conciliate them? There is, perhaps, no answer.

If this were not enough, such efforts face the determination of the professionals to avert any threat to their unsavory jobs. That is all that really interests politicians. A friend of mine, who held a fairly high governmental position, was wont to pun on the original meaning of the word and the one it has acquired in American usage: "Never talk about politics to a politician: he isn't interested, and wouldn't understand, if he were."

In England, any man can stand for election to Parliament, if, to make certain that he is not merely frivolous, he deposits a sum of money that will be forfeited if he does not receive a certain small percentage of the votes (4% or less, as I recall). The National Front, under the leadership of John Tyndall, began to contest a large number of seats, not, indeed, expecting to win any, but to obtain the right to a few minutes on television to explain their position. The professionals acted promptly in Parliament and increased the size of the deposit to make the cost of an unsuccessful candidacy prohibitive.

In the several American states the same result is obtained by increasing the number of signatures requisite on an electoral petition, increasing the number of counties in which a certain minimum of signatures must be obtained, and making many persons ineligible to sign (e.g., if they voted in the preceding primary election). The requirements in the several states are so different that it would take a long time to compile a list of them, but regulations regarding petitions are, I believe, the usual means of preventing competition with the professionals, even if such competition would be no more than a passing nuisance.

I remember one state in which a "new party" raised money, chiefly from many small contributions, and made an earnest effort to obtain a place on the ballot. I do not remember what party that was: it could have been the Constitution Party or one of several others. I was consulted by a worried lady, the wife of a not indigent farmer. She had come to the headquarters bearing $2000 and an offer of her own services. She was assigned to a corps of perhaps twenty women who were industriously forging signatures and addresses from numerous telephone books to bring the number of genuine signatures obtained by intensive solicitation to the minimum legally required. That did not seem honest to the lady, but she was told that that was politics. And so, indeed, it was.

If you must know, I advised the lady to follow her own conscience, as she could do with the more confidence, because the effort, however laudable its stated purpose, would fail anyway. And so it did. As I recall, the forgeries were not detected, but the petitions were rejected out of hand on some technicality about the printed forms that had been used.

Needless to say, a new party cannot hope to win in an election; it can reasonably seek only to present its policy to the public and obtain enough votes to keep it alive until the next election, two or four years later, at which it can hope to make a better showing, and so grow gradually to the point at which it can contest offices with some prospect of possible success. To do this, it must overcome the reluctance of voters who will be assured that they are "wasting" a vote they could otherwise cast on behalf of Tweedledum or Tweedledee. And even if that is accomplished, the viability of the party will be doubtful, for many of its promoters, unreasonably discouraged by the first inevitable failure, will lose interest and drift away to other activities. Its chance of survival is about that of a new-born baby that has been exposed on a trash-heap.

One obstacle legislated to impede new parties is a requirement that a party must present candidates for a certain list of offices, sometimes including quite minor ones, for which it will be difficult to find persons who will make the necessary sacrifice of their time and ordered life to campaign, as the press will maliciously force them to do. This and other disadvantages of a new party can, in some states, be avoided by a man who will file to enter the election as an independent candidate.

One of the states—perhaps the state—in which this is most easily done is Wyoming. And that brings me to a document which should be in the hands of everyone who is contemplating political activity.

The proponents of the Pace Amendment (on which I commented in Liberty Bell, September 1986) publish a periodical, the Advocate Bulletin (1222 South Glendale Avenue, Glendale, California; 91205). On the subject of contemporary politics, the number for May 1989 is the most informative publication that I have ever seen.

Wyoming is a large state and so sparsely populated that it sends only one Congressman to the den of thieves in Washington. It is a state in which outdoor living still predominates, and more of the old West survives than in any other state. Presumably, therefore, it is the state in which American traditions are strongest. The population was almost entirely White, chiefly of British and Germanic ancestry with some Slavs, when I was there a few years ago, and I suppose it still is, since I have heard of an irruption of niggers, mestizos, Vietnamese, Chinese, or other alien enemies. Sheenies seemed to be in a much smaller proportion than elsewhere, so the state is as Aryan as any and far more than most. And it may not be amiss to add that Wyoming was the home of Rudy 'Butch' Stanko, who built up a very large business and was sent to prison for refusing to give it to God's People, as is ordained by the holy laws of the Talmud. (The Federal government, of course, provided plausible pretexts for its trained judges. For the appalling details, see Stanko's book, The Score, available from Liberty Bell Publications, $15.00 plus postage.)[1]

It is a reasonable inference, therefore, that a political effort on behalf of our race will have the greatest possible success in Wyoming.

Such was the belief of William Daniel Johnson, a lawyer of international reputation, one of the very few American attorneys who are fluent in Japanese, with offices in Glendale. He acquired the necessary citizenship in Wyoming, circulated a successful petition, and became an independent candidate for Wyoming's one Congressional seat.

His candidacy released a flood of swill from the newspapers, which are as putrid in Wyoming as elsewhere. The Advocate Bulletin for May 1989 consists of thirty-two pages of photographic reproductions of seventy-eight gobs of journalistic pus. The only editorial matter is a quarter of a page in which George King, apparently the editor, observes correctly that "The world's toughest job is trying to convince several hundred million sniveling palefaces around the globe to stop committing suicide."

1. The book also contains a good summary of the Jewish problem.

When candidates that favor the survival of our race appear, one expects the jewspapers to produce their most malodorous slime, even in what purports to be news, but the nice irony is that they disclosed enough of the truth to have ensured Johnson's election by a "landslide," if the Aryans in Wyoming had been interested in not becoming extinct. He claimed that he was not a "racist" but only a "separatist," but that was thought to be as bad, since it would prevent realization of the great American ideal of Integration and replacement of the present population with half a billion coffee-colored mongrels having the minds of rats. Evidently the Aryan majority agreed. Some journalistic slime stated that he favored "expulsion of non-Whites," a policy which should have commended itself to every intelligent Aryan in Wyoming, and doubtless did: the election merely proved how few they were.

One prize editorial, urging that Johnson be driven from the state, referred to the "excrement-stained banner of racism" and the "mongrel [!] campaign of hate and racism." Whether the journalist was a slavering Kike or a journalistic hit-man earning his wages does not appear.

What makes the affair so instructive is not the journalistic pus, but the reaction of the people of Wyoming.

A few press photographs appear in the cuttings reproduced. One picture shows a mob of one thousand idiots pouring through the center of Casper to protest the suggestion that there could be forms of anthropoid life lower than they are. Another shows Johnson watching three demonstrators, evidently grotesquely female and looking as though they were assorted vampires from a new and more horrible production of Dracula in Hollywood. Beyond the edge of one picture, according to the caption, another harridan was shown at a press conference, waving a "swastika crossed with blood red."

Another picture shows the State's Director of Youth Alternatives, who is also a "civic leader" of Cheyenne, lamenting that a human conscience should be so corrupt as not to perceive the White race's duty to cuddle niggers and stamp out "racism"; he is a nigger, and the people of Wyoming are apparently proud of him—at least a mestiza said so and a Jewess, the Secretary of State of Wyoming, chimed in with a vow that after the election she would attack Johnson with a cudgel.

Johnson was condemned by the Wyoming Educational Association, which resolved to use the schools to warn children that he was an incarnation of evil. The membership of the Association must largely consist of highly paid White females, who normally glow with virtue as they hold children down and inject the "One World" pus to induce infantile paralysis of the cerebrum. They are what John Dewey's racketeers have trained for decades, and have been selected for intellectual mediocrity.[2]

The mayor of a town in which Johnson proposed to rent a house declared that he and the town council "don't want him here" and urged the inhabitants to "shun" him and show him that his "philosophy is anathema to all right-thinking people." To be sure, if Johnson had been someone that right-thinking Americans love and cherish, such as a syphilitic nigger homosexual rapist with "AIDS," the town council would have embraced him in rapturous welcome and probably hoped that he would copulate with as many of their daughters as possible to hasten Integration.

There were letters from boobs who demanded that Johnson be driven out of the state at once or be told to "get out" of any town in which he appeared. And many state officials boasted they were looking for a legal pretext for excluding Johnson or prosecuting him on some charge.

I have given you but a few examples. You must read all of the thirty-two pages carefully to estimate the quality of the population of Wyoming, although that was sufficiently shown by the results of the election. The votes were these:

Tweedledum	74,258
Tweedledee	60,821
Johnson	500

It is obvious that the Aryan majority in Wyoming doesn't want to survive, and doesn't deserve to.

You can find excuses for them. The minds of our race have been rotted by centuries of the hallucinatory drug of Judaeo-Christian superstition, petrified by a crypto-Marxist "education" in the tax-supported boob-hatcheries, and pulverized by alien professors and journalists who profess to believe the Holohoax. Perhaps one should feel sorry for them, but that is far from mistaking them for a viable species, capable of political action. A friend of mine once visited a Federal hospital in which the real victims of our war to establish Communism and savagery in Indo-China[3] are awaiting a belated death. Most of them were so horribly mutilated and mangled that my friend's voice almost broke as he spoke of them, but he did not think of hiring them to build his new home.

2. In the 1950s, Professor Arthur Bestor, the American historian, and I noticed that in our respective departments the 'A' and 'B' students who had entered with the intention of teaching in secondary schools all changed their minds when they had to take the required courses in the "science of education," usually in their junior year, and decided to become librarians or accountants or lawyers or laboratory technicians. We consulted the ranking member of the swarm of deans in the "College of Education," who naively told us, "We prefer the 'C' grade students because they do not question what we tell them."

There is, to be sure, one difference. The spiritually mutilated people in Wyoming are still able-bodied. If you wish to be an optimist, speculate about what they are likely to do when, as now seems inevitable, there will be a total collapse of society in this country and they experience want and privation, and have been robbed, beaten, and stabbed by their present darlings, exasperated because the White serfs can no longer give them everything they want. Although it is far from certain, it is not impossible that the wretched Aryans will then recover something of their racial vigor and remember William Daniel Johnson.

Even today there are, no doubt, little pockets of still viable Americans here and there, but there is no reason to believe that the majority of Aryans throughout the country differ greatly from the ones in Wyoming. So, when you contemplate some political activity, meditate on the 0.03% percent of the votes that Johnson received after a vigorous (and, no doubt, expensive) campaign in a still predominantly Aryan state. □

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. THE COUNTERFEIT GOSPEL

by Nicholas Carter

The great question in theology for the Higher Critics* of organized religion in the late 19th and early 20th centuries was, What is Christianity? The many fine scholars (Couchoud, Guignebert, Klausner, Schweitzer, et al) who dedicated so much of their lives to the investigation of the origins of Christianity, have provided us with a good deal of excellent historical information and a number of educated guesses regarding the theological developments that occurred around 1900 years ago in the Hellenistic Orient. Nonetheless, we are still in the dark regarding the actual origins of one of the foremost religions of our time.

What is now recognized as the Christian religion developed in and through myth. The historical principle that all religions are simply phases of continuous evolution is irrefutable. The creeds of all mankind run into, and derive from, the myths of some other religions. It is logical to conclude, therefore, that no system of belief inculcated on the dangerous and malevolent territory of faith is rational: and, indeed, there is no evidence to sustain a single one. It logically follows, too, that ALL Christian traditions are myths; and that brings us to the crux of the problem: When the facts of reality are woven into the "antique fables and fairy toys" of transcendentalism, they are never easy to unravel.

But what is myth? Is it folklore? Or is it "an effort to explain a custom or belief whose origins have been forgotten"? Is it "an intermediate between collective dreams and collective poems"? Does it "create for itself a collective symptom for taking up all repressed emotion"? Is it "another way of saying that emotion will create for human yearning those goals which mind cannot establish as fact"? Is it "a way of disguising or evading the shocking facts of life rather than recognizing and accepting them"? It it "the pious formula into which life flows when it reproduces its traits out of the unconscious"? Does it "correspond to the displaced residues of wish fantasies of entire nations"?

As often happens, the scholars have provided more questions than answers. We can be certain of one thing, however: Myth does seem to be everywhere in all times. Look around and you can observe the creation of legend which myth absorbs. The legend of FDR. The legend of the Kennedy's Camelot. The legend of Lee Harvey Oswald.

For hundreds of years scholastic theologians have been elaborating on, and in some cases refining, the primitive myths of Catholicism, including the principal myth of the Western World, which is not God or the Mother, but what we call the Christ—the myth, that is, found with practically all ancient peoples of the deliverer, the savior, and with all but the Jews, "the sacrificial offering on the fructifying tree." The Christ myth is the foundation upon which the Gentile church built the orthodox teaching of Christianity.

From time immemorial the death and resurrection of a salvation-deity considered to be both human and divine have been the prime tenets of the gospels of the many Gentile mystery (meaning secret) religions within Hellenistic Asia and the Far East. The origin of death being necessary to life evolved out of the progression of the seasons. If Mother Nature could die down in winter and revive herself in springtime, then surely a god could die for the benefit of his worshipers and then provide redemption by returning to life. Symbolically, the Sun, born as the Son of God, threatened by the powers of darkness, growing up as the shepherd of the heavenly kine, is eventually revealed as the triumphant hero and the deliverer of the world.

Animals have also been used throughout history for essentially the same purpose—to lift the mantle of troubles from the shoulders of the believer. On the Day of Horn Blowing, or the Great Day, also known as the Day of Atonement, the sins of Israel would be transferred to the scapegoat for Azazel (originally a god of the flocks, just as Astarte was a cow-deity), which was then taken into the wilderness and shoved backward off a precipice. (The history of sacrifice is full of surrogates—of the animal for man, of wine for blood, of prayers for sacrifices.)

The scapegoat ritual, which resulted in the sins of the community being expelled into the wilderness, bears a close resemblance to the Babylonian puhu, or substitution ritual. The Judean rite also duplicates the ritual-mystery of the red heifer, which in Egyptian mythology stood for Typhon, the Evil One.

Within the more sophisticated mystery cults of the Hellenistic Orient, the impurity of the guilty human race is done away in the body of a human deity who is himself untouched by impurity. Thus, the dying god differs in degree, but not in principle, from the common scapegoat. He is loaded with the sins of the world, which then die with him on the cross. The obscene sacrifice of the just to the unjust, of the ideal to the nonideal, of virtue to vice, allows the sinner to palm off on someone else the accumulated transgressions and misfortunes which he shrinks from bearing himself.

*Higher Criticism, in contrast to textual or "lower" criticism, describes the kind of broad, scholarly research necessary to eliminate traditions and dogmatic opinions—to clear the historical ground, as it were, of the turgid mythology that prevents objective thinking and constructive building.

Psychoanalytically speaking, the folk-soul seeks to deceive God and evade the claims of justice. This desire leads to the creation of an elaborate scenario in which a salvation-deity dies for the benefit of his worshipers. The Son, the divine sacrifice for all, submits to the Father and is then slain, which results in a sense of guilt, the need for self-punishment to relieve it, and a mystery of salvation based on the suffering and death of the savior-god conceived as redemptive.

And thus it is that myth esoterically reinforces that most subversive of psychological defenses—the denial of reality. In the simplest terms, myths are "life lies" that enable us to believe that supernaturalism exists in a natural world...that nonmateriality exists in a material world...and that miracles and prophecies exist in a world in which there is no scientific proof of supporting miracles and prophecies.

Within the world of mysticism, there are no metaphysical givens. Transcendent theories are created first. Facts are then created to fit the theories, with tradition always altering truth in the process of its development. Indeed, among the reasons which retard the progress of religious history in the modern world, the most conspicuous is this: Dogmas that have been canonized and traditions that have been agreed upon are widely accepted as historical truths.

Conceived in the womb of mythology, the Christian Bible is composed of fetishes, legends, parables, poems, songs, prayers, moral apothegms and wildly exaggerated exploits; and Christianity is a complex mystery religion composed of saints, multiple deities (three gods in one substance), demons, oracles, prophets, miracles, wonder-workers, prodigies, signs, portents, auguries and magical sacraments—a veritable metaphysical dungeon containing much of the primitive "baggage" of the Semitic and salvation religions of Asia. To any student of history whose capacity to distinguish truth from error hasn't been suborned by faith, therefore, the orthodox account of Christian origins cannot stand up to critical examination, and the facts supporting this statement are overwhelming.

On Tuesday, October 31, 1961, the discovery of the largest single collection of historic documents ever unearthed in the Holy Land—second in importance only to the Dead Sea Scrolls— was announced by Dr. Yigel Yadin, professor of archeology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In all, there were 64 documents, including two Bible fragments from the Book of Numbers and the Book of Psalms, which were among the earliest fragments of the traditional Jewish holy writings ever found.

As with the first set of documents that were unearthed in a cave near the Dead Sea in 1947, the newly discovered scrolls, which established the existence of Bar Kochba, a legendary figure in Jewish history whose existence had been questioned, made no mention of Jesus the Nazarene or the early Christian Church—although they dated from 88 to A.D. 135. Dr. Yadin candidly admitted that he found the omission "strange."

Strange? Not to a substantial number of the Higher Critics, who have comprehensively investigated both Judaism and Christianity in conjunction with the AGE in which they were developed, for the very pertinent reason that the two sets of remarkable scrolls discovered in the Terra Sancta belong to an ancient literary country within whose bourne no historical Jesus has ever been found.

The Jewish philosopher, Philo of Alexandria, gained prominence within that literary realm during the alleged lifetime of the Nazarene. He left more than fifty works without a single allusion to the Christ of his followers.

Justus of Tiberius was born in Galilee, circa A.D. 30. In his two monumental works comprising a history of the war of independence and a chronicle of events from Moses to Agrippa, not the smallest reference to either Jesus of Nazareth or the Christ cult can be located.

The Jewish historian Josephus was born around A.D. 37. In his Jewish Antiquities, he purportedly wrote that a holy man called Jesus arose from the grave after he was crucified and appeared before his disciples, and that the holy prophets had "predicted of him these and many other wonders."

Over 200 years ago the statements of Josephus were exposed as forgeries by scholars who had a broad knowledge of Jews and Judaism as well as Christianity. They were able to prove that an intellectual Jew like Josephus, who sincerely believed that the day would come when all men would accept the Torah, would never have written that the holy prophets of the Israelites had predicted the coming of a Jewish savior-god who would be worshiped by Gentiles in a mystery cult setting. When did the spurious insertions take place? Some time in the latter half of the 3rd century, after Origen, who read the Josephus work and stated that the author did not believe that Jesus was the Messiah, and before Eusebius, who read it in the 4th century with the insertion and accepted it. The discrepancies in Josephus' writings are so glaring that even Catholics now admit the forgeries.

Even more mystifying is the fact that the Christ controversy is nowhere to be found in ANY of the writings of the 1st century of the Common Era (as the Jews prefer to render the period A.D.), aside that is from the New Testament—which cannot under any circumstance be accepted as a factual historical document. I am referring to such notable figures as Seneca, Petronius, Pliny the Elder, Juvenal, Martial, Quintilian, Epictetus, Plutarch, Appian, and others, whose works have not left us with a single reference to the Nazarene or the Christ[*]

What on earth happened? Surely some of the contemporaries of Jesus—IF HE LIVED—must have heard of the man who supposedly "attracted the multitudes." Is this blank-out merely accidental? Or coincidental? Or part of God's master plan? Or even Satan's master plan? After all, notable Christians used to preach that Satan, anticipating the true religion to come, had planted such things as virgin births, body and blood ceremonies, stars announcing the births of savior-gods, and resurrections, in a "diabolical parody of the uses of the Church" just to create doubt and confusion when the true Messiah finally arrived. In particular, Clement and Justin Martyr fed the flames of this fantasy. When Justin learned that Perseus was begotten of a virgin, he blamed Satan for counterfeiting the incident. The rationalizing of modern Christians in this regard is a bit more sophisticated: "The Church Fathers saw truly when they saw these aspects of paganism as part of the divine preparation for Christianity." Rather than "satanic," the preparation is now "divine." (The genius for pious falsification appears to know no bounds.)

And what are we to make of the fact that orthodox Judaism has never accepted the Christian Messiah as either divine, or as the same Davidic Messiah whose coming is predicted in the Jewish version of the Old Testament? (In the Talmud, Jesus is represented as a false prophet who supported his claims with sorcery.) In truth, Jews could never acknowledge the divinity of Jesus and still remain Jews. The foundation of all Judaism has been the unity and the spiritual nature of ONE divine being. Just as there could be no ghost, no angel, and no spirit of Yahweh, there could be no SON of Yahweh. Even emperor worship was considered to be blasphemous to the extreme by orthodox Jews.

Like it or not, these devastating historical records tell us in no uncertain terms that the "Christ-Myth" theory is true. And they tell us in even more forceful terms that the religion of Christianity is rooted in fraud, and that the whole Western world has for close upon two thousand years lain under the spell of a lie. Admittedly, this is a mind-

[*] Not until much later were writings produced allegedly proving that Jesus Christ was an historical figure. It is neither logical nor scholarly to accept the 2nd century speculations and conclusions of Tacitus, Suetonius, Pline the Younger and others, however, who were motivated to write off the Christian legends that were by then being developed as if they were rooted in historical fact rather than in evolutionary folklore and evangelical fancy.

boggling impeachment. And yet, if the sense of realism is ever to triumph over the dogma of infallibility in all of its forms, the day will surely come when intelligent Christians will have to accept these harsh historical judgements, and subsequently decide how to save what is worthwhile in their religion.

With what, then, are we left? Without doubt, the most intriguing "Who done it?" in the history of the Western world—a world, incidentally, that now seems to be patently indifferent to this remarkable mystery. Not that this cavalier attitude is surprising, considering the fact that virtually no one today is aware of the radical conclusions cited above. Nor are they aware of the fact that numerous erudite scholars of the 19th and 20th centuries were utterly convinced that the biblical Jesus never existed. To Volney, the Nazarene was an astral myth; to Dupuis, the sun; for Kulicher, a vegetation-god; to Bauer, perhaps the first great scholar to deny the historicity, he was the personification of certain ideals then current; to Kalthoff, he was an illusion of reality more compelling than fact itself; and to others, he was just one more composite image of the mythical savior-gods.

The premier proposition that must be recognized and accepted by the historical sleuth interested in shattering the bubble of this enigma is that the entire New Testament was written and rewritten and expanded and edited over a period of several hundred years beginning sometime during the latter half of the 2nd century. I am referring to the one Gospel, composed, according to the Canon of Muritori, of more than one version, as well as the remaining New Testament books, including the so-called Epistles of Paul that postdate him by several centuries. It is clear to all serious scholars that the New Testament was the result of a lengthy Christianizing process that occurred during that period of time when the Gentile Fathers of the Church were determining what the religion was supposed to be.

The only extant copies of the Gospel reach back no farther than the 3rd century. Not a single copy is free of mistakes and no two copies agree. The first certain traces of a Gospel are to be found in Irenaeus, circa A.D. 180; but its existence is neither mentioned nor implied in the Epistles nor in Barnabas nor in the Didache, a book of moral precepts that was authored around the turn of the 3rd century. In fact, to this day we don't know when the Gospel was accepted without further editing and changing. For example, somewhere along the way, a passage declaring without question or qualification that the three divine entities were of "one" substance ("For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one...") was added to the Book of John; but it was omitted from the Revised Version (1881) after it was demonstrated to be a forgery. And it simply isn't coincidental that Clement of Alexandria, one of the more significant theologians of the 2nd century, never made use of what are now called the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark & Luke)—just one more indication that the Gospel was fabricated long after the events it relates supposedly occurred.

The only logical conclusion that can be drawn is that the Gospel discourses had a wide oral circulation before they were ever written down; and over the centuries the redactors retained whatever sayings and memories that could be reshaped in a messianic light, while discarding any recollections that didn't harmonize with the Christianizing process. According to their own conceptions, they revised, corrected and created history: and what became known as the Evangelic Tradition consisted of little more than anecdotes—"the naive products of the folk-mind"—told and retold for the purpose of explaining or defending differing and even contradictory beliefs and practices of the Church over the centuries. (Tradition invariably goes beyond commemoration and into creation and fabrication in its description of significant events and personalities.)

In time, the first version of the Gospel gained authority in the Syrian congregation; the third was influential in Greece proper and in Rome, where Mark was also in use; and the fourth had taken root by that time in the congregation of Asia. In the finished products, the authors of Mark concentrate primarily upon persuading the readers that Jesus was the Davidic Messiah whose coming was predicted in the Septuagint. Matthew goes further and expounds the view that the teaching of Jesus had the force of a new law. The most conservatively Jewish version of the Gospel, Matthew is also unquestionably anti-Pharisaic, although the Pharisees are also denounced in the Books of Mark and Luke. Luke's authors indicate an acquaintance with Josephus' Antiquities; and like Matthew, Luke contains material that does not appear in Mark.

What finally emerged as the Gospel of John appears to be primarily the work of a Jewish Hellenist motivated to include a Gospel version interpreted from the standpoint of Paul that would stand out from the Gentile impressions of the story. His condemnation of the Jewish people was probably induced by the conviction that the Pharisees had murdered Paul just as they murdered Stephen. Some scholars have described John as the Philo of the New Testament.

Over the lengthy period of time the Christians were seriously involved in creating a Gospel dedicated to proving that their so-called Messiah was the same as the Davidic Messiah, any number of "good news" writings were produced by authors eager to contribute to the newest mystery cult.

There were gospels according to the Ebionites, the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Nazareans and the Hebrews. There were gospels according to various men, including a Barnabas, a Bartholomew and a Pepias. There were little books called Acts according to various Christian leaders. There were letters said to have been written by Jesus, Mary of Magdala, Joseph and the brothers and sisters of Jesus. There were said to be quaintly detailed lives of Adam and Eve and of other persons in the Jewish religious books, not to mention the apocalypses of Noah, Abraham, Joshua, David and Elijah, along with the testaments of Isaac, Jacob, Enoch, Daniel and others. There were books about Solomon telling of incredible wonders that he had performed; booklets relating wondrous prophecies and miracles that were to come; and writings about persons who were said to have known Jesus, including two Roman emperors.

There were even "good news" books on the infancy and childhood of Jesus telling how he caused the sun to stand still: how with his own little fingers he shaped animals of clay and brought them to life; and how he moved mountains, stilled the seas, hushed the winds, made barren trees give fruit, and with numerous other wondrous events proved that he was the long-awaited divine child. From the most fanciful minds of the time came the most wondrous events of all—those that occurred when the divine child was born. The temple of Apollo at Rome burst asunder and fell down; the earth opened in such wide clefts that the doomed souls in hell were able to come up and peer out; and it was a totally painless and bloodless birth for the mother—who, after the event, miraculously retained an intact maidenhead.

More notable among the many contradictions in the four versions of the Gospel that were finally accepted by the Church (probably because there were four established congregations by that time: Jerusalem, Rome, Antioch and Ephesus) are the ones involving the visitors to the sepulcher. According to John, Mary Magdalene came unto the sepulcher the first day of the week; Matthew thought it was Mary Magdalene and the other Mary; to Mark, the visitors were Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James and Salome; and Luke introduced not only the mysterious Joanna to the group including Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James, but also the other women who were with them.

Among other contradictions, the Synoptics limit the duration of the public career of Jesus to one year at most. John extends it to two, or even three years. John tells us that Jesus went up to the Holy City five times, while the Synoptics take him there only once. And John reveals that Jesus celebrated three Easter festivals with his disciples instead of only one, and that he died on the 14th and not on the 15th day of the month of Nisan.

Luke alone tells the story of the twelve-year-old Jesus in the temple. Four brothers and several sisters are mention in Mark. Where does Jesus' age place him among the children? We do not know. In addition, nothing is said anywhere about the physical appearance of the Nazarene or the state of his health or even the language he spoke.

One explanation for the many New Testament contradictions is that community interests controlled the formulation of the information. In particular, the Gospel versions appear to have evolved as literary basins into which materials developed in different conditions and needs, were poured. The 11th chapter of John is a striking example of the way in which the most glaringly opposed inferences can be transcribed side by side by authors indifferent to either embarrassment or shame.

What of the famous Twelve known as the Apostles? The word apostle means "to send or commission." The apostolic implication is that the Apostles were with Jesus and commissioned by Jesus to go forth and preach. But just as there was no Jesus, there were no Apostles "commissioned" by Jesus. Once again, it isn't coincidental that the thoughts and labors of the legendary Twelve are unknown to Eusebius, the eminent Christian historian, in the 4th century. The "Apostles" were all chosen long after the 1st century by different people in different times—which makes it nearly impossible to determine who's who and who's what within the apostolic circle.

Mark and Matthew contain nearly identical lists of the Twelve. Luke has two lists in which he identifies Simon the Cananean as Simon the Zealot. In the place of Thaddaeus-Lebbaeus, he provides us with a Judas, who is a brother of Jacob called James. But which Jacob is he referring to? Jacob the son of Alphaeus or Halphaeus? John's version doesn't list all of the Apostles, but he does make reference to at least some of them: Simon Peter, Thomas called Didymus (the name given in early Syriac literature as Judas Thomas, meaning Judas the Twin), Nathanael of Cana, Jacob and John the sons of Zebedee and a couple of others who are unnamed. We also have John mentioning Philip, Judas Iscariot and another Judas (not Iscariot). Just one of the rather improbable conclusions to be drawn from this jumble of names is that there were three persons among the Twelve with the name Judas.

Why twelve? The number betrays a symbolic intention. With twelve helpers Joshua passed through the Jordan. Jason went after the golden fleece with twelve helpers. The sun wanders through the twelve signs of the zodiac. And so it was that Jesus wandered through the Holy Land with twelve disciples. In the religion of the sun-worshipers the twelfth month is the betrayer of the sun that sickens and dies at the winter solstice. Ergo, Jesus is betrayed by the twelfth disciple.

The reasons cited above explain why it has always been so difficult for scholars to identify, not only the Twelve, but also the family of Jesus; why one author writes of Joseph's pedigree AND the account of the virgin birth; and why another has Jesus attack Jewish laws AND, in practically the same breath, censure the slightest departure from them. Typical of the confusing elements to be found within these writings is the fact that prior to the Council of Nicaea in 325, Eusebius time and time again quoted the Great Commission in Matthew 28:19 as follows: "Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all the nations in my name."

Is it any wonder that St. Augustine once saw fit to remark that he wouldn't believe the Gospel to be true if it wasn't for the authority of the Church?

There are additional reasons to believe that the Christianity that supposedly existed in the 1st century didn't begin to develop into a Gentile mystery cult, with the notion of the doctrine of spiritual immortality apart and free from the body attached to it, until much later. It was late in the 2nd century in the city of Antioch, located in Southern Turkey, that Christians were first identified by that name. There was no distinction at that time, however, between the active and passive members of the faith. What later developed as the Catholic conception of the priesthood was foreign to the first two centuries. By the end of the 3rd century, the "clergy" of the new faith were thought to be a divinely "chosen" group. A bishop, according to Ignatius, ought to be regarded as the Lord himself.

As late as the 4th century, seven pieces—Epistle to the Hebrews, Apocalypse of John, and five Catholic Epistles—were not acknowledged as canonical by some of the congregations. Typically, the Christian author of the Epistle to the Hebrews—written long after the 1st century—not only misconstrues every verse, but also misreads several words of Scriptural text.

The LAST or HOLY Supper—"The flesh is fed with the body and blood of Christ that the soul may be made fat from God."—wasn't transformed into the Mass until the latter half of the 4th century. The word "Mass" derives from the Egyptian Eucharist in which the cakes were called "Mest." The Israelites learned the word and called it "Mass" (or plural Massoth). The Church of Rome adopted it as "Mass" or "Messe." The word "host," which is used in the Catholic ritual is from the Latin Hostia, which can be interpreted as an animal slain in sacrifice—a sin offering. As the Mass came more and more to be regarded as a heathen sacrifice, so it increasingly was equipped with external trappings and observances borrowed from pagan rituals. Purgatory, on the other hand, wasn't accepted by the Church for the first five centuries, because it was considered to be a heathen tenet and therefore heretical. It's interesting to note, too, that by the 7th century, the Church was endeavoring to suppress the picturing of Christ as a lamb because of the paganism inherent in the idea.

It wasn't until the 5th century that the Church hierarchy decreed that the Christ would be represented to the world as a tortured body fastened to an instrument of punishment more infamous than any ever invented. The cross, chosen as the emblem of the Christian faith, was borrowed from the mystery cults, where it usually signified salvation. It was the sign of the T-shaped cross by which Osiris (the Egyptian god of vegetation) gave eternal life. Soon thereafter the image of the cross was stamped upon all nature and all art within the Christian world. Even the doctrine of the trinity wasn't proclaimed by the Church until around the time the new city of Constantinople rose to power-approximately A.D. 380.

The transmission of the power from the legendary Apostles to those who were assumed to be their successors is one of the most audacious frauds in history. The first definite reference to the founding of the official church by Peter and Paul was made by Dionysus of Corinth about 170. The founding of the Papacy, the first distinct signs of an episcopal government, and the Roman claim to be in a special sense "the see of Peter," all occurred long after the Nazarene and supposedly ordered the establishment of a Universal (Catholic) church. As to the time of the origins and relative ranks of various church officials (bishop, presbyter, deacon), there is still uncertainty. (Presbyter is a Greek word meaning "old men." The word priest is derived from this term.)

Surprisingly, there was no authentic portrait of Jesus—no identifiable type of features had been determined—as late as the 5th century. The Nazarene was variously represented as dwarfed, ugly, and sometimes repulsive. Not until the Middle Ages was he distinguished by handsome, straight-nosed, Gentile features—with, at times, blond hair.

Most difficult for some Christians to understand is, why Christmas day wasn't introduced as the birthday of Jesus until the 4th century. At that time, religion hadn't reached the point of proclaiming that God must be sought within the domain of the ideal and the absolute outside of the world of sense. The only rational and scientific cult they had to turn to was that of the Sun. During the process of creating their own savior-god, therefore, the Christians were drawn more and more to the most significant days in the calender of sun-worship. December 25th was the birthdate of the Persian savior-god, Mithra, and other sun-gods. By the middle of the 4th century, Christians were beginning to assign the Nativity of Jesus to the winter solstice in December because that was deemed the Nativity of the Sun. Not until the 6th century, however, was the day of Jesus' birth finally commissioned. A Scythian monk, Dionysius Exigius, chose for Jesus the birthday of the sun. The festival of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin was then commissioned to be celebrated in the Roman Church on March 25th, a date fixed by the fact that it was exactly nine months of embryogeny before December 25th.

The date of the crucifixion was also determined following the assimilation of the new Christ to the savior-gods of Asia. For the purpose of giving some credence to the claims of the supernatural events that supposedly occurred when the "Son of God" was cruelly put to death, the Catholic hierarchy chose a day when a partial eclipse of the sun had occurred—an actual event (April 3rd, A.D. 33), according to modern astronomers. The Cappadocians first made the vernal equinox the date of Easter or the resurrection. The attraction to the glory of the Sun's day, coupled with a growing resistance to purely Jewish observances, prompted the Christians to shift their Passover celebration to the Sunday following the Jewish celebration. Our Easter was initially dedicated to the celebration of the pagan resurrection of the unconquered sun. For reasons both obvious and ironic, modern theologians would prefer not to be reminded of the fact that for the first few hundred years most Christians were sun-worshipers. According to Leo the Great—Pope from 460 to 460—it was the custom of many of the Christ-folk to "stand on the steps of St. Peter and pay homage to the Sun by obeisance and prayers."

By now, it should be apparent to those people to whom the facts of reality and the conclusions of reason are of value, that the traditional origins of Christians are false.

HISTORICAL COMMENTARY

BACON, B.W.: "St. Augustine's view of the predictive character of Psalm 22 is of course impossible."

BATES, M.S.: "From the two Testaments taken together, the dogmatist, the bigot, the man of faction, the literalist, the bureaucrat, the disciplinarian, the sadist have been able to justify their will, from that day until now."

CARPENTER, E.: "Early man felt great truths and realities of life—often, I believe, more purely than we do—but he could not give form to his experience. That stage came when he began to lose touch with these realities; and it showed itself in rites and ceremonials."

CHEYNE, T.K.: "The Christ religion is a synthesis, and only those who have dim eyes can assert that the intellectual empires of Babylonia and Persia have fallen."

GOGUEL, M.: "Tradition has so little belief that baptism goes back to Jesus, that the 4th Gospel after quoting a statement that Jesus had baptised, itself corrects this (John: 4-2)."

GUMPLOWICZ, Ludwig: "Every code of human morals from the earliest times to the present day has this thoroughly characteristic peculiarity: the product of actual occurrences and relations is everywhere explained by, and derived from, imaginary circumstances."

HALL, STANLEY G. "True miracles are things which are absolutely false. They never happen...Why then the persistent credulity of so many who should know better concerning this class of marvels?"

HARNACK, ADOLPH: "I would reject the current opinion that Jesus was formally tried by the Sanhedrin for an alleged offense against the Hebrew criminal code...The case against Jesus could under no circumstances be tried by any tribunal except that of the governor...All four Gospels must be wrong in stating that the trial occurred on the day before the Sabbath, for it was forbidden to hold court on that day."

LIPPERT, JULIUS: "If to the savage in his intellectual isolation a soul seems to be the cause of every phenomenon, then in the natural development of thought to a philosopher, whose intellectual horizon has expanded to comprehend the idea of the universe, the cause of causes behind the universe, must seem to be a universal soul. From this idea, so evidently derived from the domain of the cult, man has never been able to extricate himself."

LOISY, ALFRED: "...the sin of the guilty human race is done away with in the body of the Man-Christ, who was himself untouched by it...childish dreams worked up into a theological nightmare and adapted, by hook or crook, to a lofty moral conception!"

McCOWN, CHARLTON C.: "The 19th century ended with the destruction of its characteristic 'liberal' portrait of Jesus. It would appear that after nearly forty years [now nearly 100 years], the 20th century has discovered none at all of its own."

MENCKEN, H.L.: "Men simply credit to Gods whatever laws they evolve out of their own wisdom or lack of it."

MURRAY, GILBERT: "Previous historians of Christianity have generally been theologians, convinced of the miraculous nature of their subject, and consequently, however learned, compelled to be uncritical."

ROBERTSON, J.M.: "There is not one teaching in the Gospels that cannot be paralleled in the ethical literature of the Jews, Greeks, Romans, and Hindus...I shall be obliged to any theologian who will bring me a saying which I cannot prove to have been already in existence in his time."

SCHECHTER, SOLOMON: "Although the Jews of Jesus' time are supposed to have been both the target of his wrath and the object of his pity and prayers, the literature of the Jews of his time has not left us a single reference to this controversy." □

THE LATE GREAT BOOK:
THE BIBLE
AN ACCOUNT OF
CHRISTIAN AND BIBLICAL ORIGINS.

Nicholas Carter feels that it is time for us to sit down and do what many Christians rarely do: Study the Holy Bible. In doing so, we may discover whether or not the Bible is indeed "Holy" and the "Word of God." In strict biblical order, the author methodically, and scathingly, examines the various claims made in the "Holy Book" and shows how many of them bear no relationship to reality whatsoever. Americans who support the interest of the United States over the interest of the State of Israel by the exercise of their basic First Amendment right of Freedom of the Press when they write a letter to a newspaper, soon become aware of the tactics employed by those who support Israel above all else and reject the demncratic process of a free and open debate for the more productive fields of censorship by intimidation. To wit: The "Coinbox Commandoes" who try to censor all opposition to the machinations of Israel by telephone death threats.

As for the Americans who have not yet had the experience of having creeps screaming death threats, morning, noon and night over the telephone, this letter may serve as a basic primer for the many "delights" one may look forward to sampling if one dares to write a letter that even inadvertently boots the sacred cow of Israel in the rump roast.

It's sad to say, but these "Telephone Terrorists" have been quite successful in their organized censorship of Americans by threatening to murder their families. Having been on the receiving end of these telephone death threats, on and off, for nearly six years, I can certainly claim some expertise in the field.

I can't fault Americans for putting the lives of their families above a letter to the editor that might be considered as critical of Israel by its fanatical supporters. As one man put it: "I can't put my wife through that again." I know exactly what he means. I've listened to countless howling, screaming, shrieking threats to murder my wife, my children and myself. And I've also listened to some filthy creatures—that their female victims call "heavy breathers"—graphically describe the disgusting sexual perversions they were going to commit on my wife. Therefore, I have the deepest sympathy for all of my fellow Americans who have had to endure these threats.

Having never married, all the threats to murder my nonexistent wife and children are wasted on me. So the Coinbox Commandoes are left with the rather difficult task of trying to censor me with their silly threats. As in these choice items:

By far, the most popular threat is: "You're a dead man!" Or a simple: "You're dead!" It gets to be quite boring when one hears it over, and over, and over... At times, I've even implored my callers: "If this is a death threat, do try to be a bit original." All to no avail. I guess the effort expended in screaming and shrieking leaves little room for original thought.

When they find the courage to frame a longer sentence, it's something like: "We've got our Uzis. And we're coming to get you!" In a kind of cute and smirking tone. When I tell them to: "Come on over...I'm waiting for you." It seems to take all the "cute" out of the conversation. Apparently I'm not sticking to the script.

Of course, one does have lighter moments, as in this threat from one monumental ass: "We're coming to get you with our Ouzos!" Oh, the horror of it all! Assaulted by a band of fanatical Jews wielding bottles of Greek brandy! As a professional soldier one may expect to die with the smell of cordite in one's nostrils; however, to die in a cloud of licorice is quite unseemly for a "pro." Naturally, I'm terrified!

Of course, this is America and not Vietnam. In Vietnam I wasn't always allowed to return fire when I was shot at, so I'm rather looking forward to exercising my constitutional right of self-defense, and with a bit of luck I might even be able to end the telephone careers of a few "heavy breathers."

All wishful thinking of course, year after year of death threats, and not one of all those Coinbox Commandoes has found the courage to show up—with or without Uzis. I'd even settle for a few bottles of Ouzo! Well...one can but live in hope.

What does one do when the caller is spewing nothing but screaming, howling curses? Unless one is trained in the fine art of profanity, I'd recommend hanging up on the caller. However, as a former NCO who functioned back in the good ol' military days when one prided oneself on one's ability to string perfectly matched profanities, I had the pleasure of returning their pathetic efforts with a soaring dissertation on the antecedents of my howling callers, giving particular emphasis to their mother's lineage. And the love life of goats.

Along with the Coinbox Commandoes, one also gets death threats delivered by the post. All anonymous, of course. However, I had the great good fortune to identify one of my death threat pen pals due to the pompous, posturing style that he had employed when writing letters to the press in support of Israel.

This poison pen pal is a former commander of a Jewish War Veterans Post and conceivably the greateast windbag and blowhard to ever stroll the planet earth. In fact, one is forced to assume that he must stagger about clutching a very large anvil, lest the "Montgolfier Effect" of all that pent-up hot air make him airborne.

This splendid leader in the organized and orchestrated intimidation of American citizens also devotes his time to printing childish death threats in—of all things—RED INK. I could not resist it! I sent him a letter commenting on his sandbox mentality and his craven cowardice. His reply was a WHINE that it really wasn't a death threat—it only seemed that way. It would seem that someone informed him that death threats are felony crimes and sending them by the U.S. Postal Service is a Federal Offense. Ergo, the pathetic WHINE!

My latest experience with Israel's Coinbox Commandoes was a couple of laughable phone calls from two certifiable jerks. The first jerk used that old, tired saw: "Stano, you're a dead man!" I told the jerk he didn't have the guts. His pal called me a minute or two later spitting: "Christian filth!" At least that was original.

Having exhausted their limited repertoire, they decided to call my number every few minutes, have the phone ring once, and then hang up. Psychological warfare, or just plain silly warfare? I suppose it eventually dawned on these jerks that the effort to constantly dial my number and hang up after one ring was somewhat labor intensive. They soon tired of their silliness. But it gave me a good laugh every time they "dinged" once and hung up. In the courageous world of the Coinbox Commando, every "ding" was the equivalent of firing a mortar round.

Of course, their "battle" wasn't nearly as courageous as that of one bloomin' idiot who tried to keep me awake all night by dialing my number every fifteen minutes. I simply turned the phone off. Apparently, this never occurred to him. When I turned the phone on at six the next mnrning, he promptly rang at six-fifteen and croaked, "Communist!" before he hung up. Staying awake all night had obviously warped what little brains he had. My connection with Communism has been fighting them and killing them in combat.

This wacko is still calling me some eight months later. He calls me, now and then, at five-fifteen in the evening and hangs up when I answer. Apparently, this is his shot for the day in his war against those nasty pro-Americans who put the interest of the United States above Israel's. I hate to disappoint this courageous fighter for Israel, but my phone number is quite close to the phone numbers of a doctor, a bank, and a funeral home. So I hardly notice his phone call amongst all the other wrong numbers.

Unfortunately, my two Coinbox Commandoes got tired of "dinging" me and decided to pull their infamous "Pizza Routine" on me. These Coinbox Commandoes for Israel are quite famous for it, in fact, they invented it.

The Pizza Routine is where the courageous Coinbox Commandoes for Israel bravely call up all the pizza restaurants in one's area and have them deliver dozens of pizzas to one's home.

To what end? They rob a small businessman of his hard-earned wages. They waste a massive amount of food at a time when people in this country are hungry. And they send a lot of students, trying to work their way through college, out into the winter nights for nothing. All things being relative, one must assume that in the world of these misfits, this "courageous" act is their equivalent of a bayonet charge.

I laughed at their pathetic threats. So these cowardly creatures, who haven't got the guts to face anyone, just had to inflict some kind of punishment on someone—on anyone! They're too gutless to come after me, so they content themselves with punishing a group of people trying to earn a living or get an education. The very fact that they take pleasure in these actions certifies these creatures as more than just cowards. By their actions they confirm a nasty streak of sadism.

It's an old military maxim: "Know your enemy." Therefore, Americans who are being harassed by these Coinbox Commandoes should always keep this question in mind: what kind of a character would pull this routine? In a war one must rely on military intelligence for information on the enemy, these sorry creatures are telling you all about themselves every time they make an harassing phone call. The two jerks who called me on the phone clearly described themselves as sadistic cowards. Miserable creatures who would probably torture a stray dog to satiate their frustrations as cowards. When these Coinbox Commandoes go to the trouble of painting a self-portrait over the telephone, one should treat them with the contempt and disgust that they so richly deserve.

I suppose these characters thought that Pizza warfare was called for in my case, in that, many of these Coinbox Commandoes scream "WOP!" or "Guinea!" and then hang up. In fact, a friend sent me an anonymous letter he received, wherein the writer had admonished him for associating with "a greasy WOP." Clearly, they think my surname comes from Italy. Well, though I have valued Italian friends and relations, the name "Stano" comes from Czechoslovakia. Lots of luck!

I would have informed the howlers of this fact, but these Coinbox Commandoes are so terrified that the police or the F.B.I. has bugged the phone, that they just scream and hang up. And probably run from the coinbox to their cars and "burn rubber."

I've taken pains to tell these characters the truth, I informed a loathsome "heavy breather" that he had befouled a telephone booth for nothing in emoting on all the perversions he was going to commit on my nonexistent "wife." I passed the same information on to the howler who was planning to "strangle" she who doesn't exist. And I rather disappointed a screamer planning to "boil my children alive," by explaining why he could not boil, bake, fry, barbecue, or even microwave my dear little Hansel and Gretel. This Coinbnx Chef was disappointed, to say the very least.

The whole point of this primer on censorship by harassment is simple: These cowards hide behind a telephone for a very good reason. Whenever the police catch one of the loathsome "heavy breathers," a creature who has terrified countless women, and they finally put a body on the disembodied voice that has caused so much suffering, it's not fear that the victims experience when they first see the creature responsible for their torment. It's usually disgust. Disgust with the miserable little creature who hid behind the telephone, and disgust with themselves for being frightened of a creature they would have ignored or laughed at if they had seen him in person.

One can well imagine the sorry collection of wizened gnomes and fat, bloated lumps whose pudgy fingers dialed my number and the numbers of other Americans. Little wonder they dare not show their face in public without becoming a bad joke.

In recent months the people of Eastern Europe stood up to guns and tanks for the right to exercise the very freedoms that we enjoy under our First Amendment. Americans need only stand up to a collection of misfits who dare not show themselves in public. On the two-hundredth anniversary of our glorious Bill of Rights, don't let these pathetic "telephone terrorists" rob you of your precious birthright to agree or disagree with anyone or anything—including the State of Israel. □

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigous academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH–FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor-publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavor to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

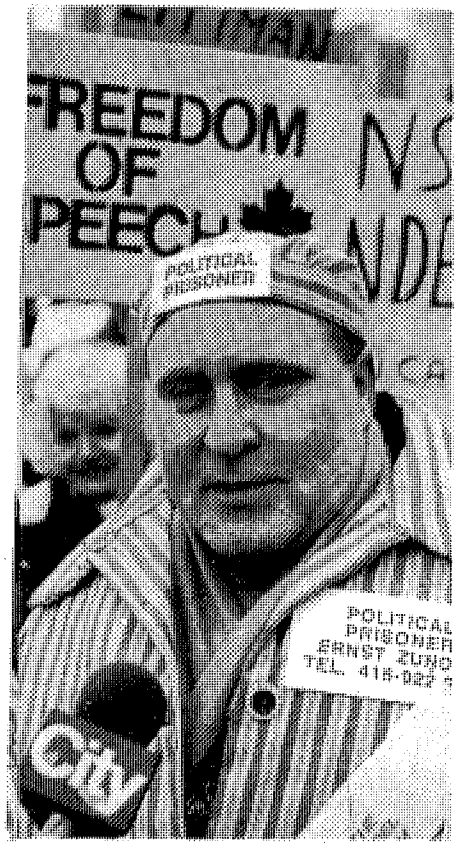
La Via Dolorosa of Ernst Zündel

To my Friends Around the World!

On Feb. 5th, 1990, at 11 a.m., I had to turn myself in at the Toronto "Don" Jail because the Court had announced that they were ready to release the Judgement in my Appeal, which we had worked on for over a year in 1988-89 and which concluded on Sept. 22 of last year. You remember the mountains of books and "Factums" we submitted then! Those of you who were with me in the courtroom will also remember the unfriendly attitude of at least two of the Judges, which was in stark contrast to the tone and attitude we had encountered during my first Appeal. That was the one we won! Maybe, just maybe, the difference then was that the Chief Justice of Ontario, Justice Howland, since retired, was himself presiding.



In my opinion, Ontarians, and Canadians generally, will be increasingly surprised by the kind of people they will encounter from now on in their institutions of learning, their courts, hospitals, tax departments and in their Social Services, the Immigration Department, etc. The almost insane, leftist, even Marxist policies of the late Sixties and Seventies, followed then by the oligarchy in power, are now showing their results. "The chickens have hatched and are now coming home to roost."

I knew in the early Eighties that if we had to go through these political show trials, that we had to get through them quickly, because a wave of people were coming "on stream" who might find it difficult to keep their political biases or ideological inclinations, or even their "ethnic adherence and outlook" out of any proceedings inside the courts.

And so it turned out, pretty well! The anti-Nazi bias, so evident in the university textbooks and courses when I went to university in Canada, have, how could it be different, produced prosecutors, lawyers, court officials and media people with self-righteous attitudes and preconceived notions about that period of European history which they only know from ideologically slanted books, whereas those like myself, whom they accuse and sit in judgement of in cases like mine, and the worldwide hysteria of War Crimes Trials now coming up. Interesting, isn't it!

For almost 40 years, England, Australia, New Zealand, America, Argentina and Canada conducted no such trials, and only Zionist and Communist groups were seen and heard agitating for these trials of vengeance. The much admired former Prime Minister of Canada, John Diefenbaker, now deceased, stated it succinctly when he said that to hold these trials would be perceived to be "pandering to the Jews", or words to that effect. Well, if that was what it was then, what has it become now?

The answer is simple! John Diefenbaker and the generation of politicians then in power were largely "Old Anglos", as we immigrants called them, reared on WASP traditions and ethics. Today's oligarchy is composed of the sons of these people and the wave of pre-war, wartime or post-war refugees from the European conflicts who brought with them many of their prejudices and saw them reenforced in schools, universities, by tendentious television shows and one-sided news reporting.

Castro, you will recall, was an agrarian reformer, the George Washington of Cuba. Yugoslav dictator Tito virtually walked on water, and the Soviets were wonderful, progressive social innovators. People like the Soviet defector Gowzenko, who came over to warn the West, were ridiculed in public, their tales of horrors, gulags, tortures and death camps discounted to this day.

Anti-Nazis were given prominence, there was no story and accusation too wild, too vicious and too illogical. Movies, TV specials, novels, eye-witness accounts, etc., a whole genre of "entertainment", evolved, a whole new industry formed and it is against this background that the Zündel Story has to be seen. Anti-Communists became Fascists and Nazis.

So I was not surprised when I was treated the way I was by police investigators, politicians, reporters, teachers and later prosecutors, juries and even judges. I got a reminder of this when I appeared at 11 o'clock on February 5,1990, outside the Toronto Jail, because even though I was a writer and publisher going to jail for what I believed in, and not even for what I had written, since the publication for which I had been convicted was written by an Englishman—there was no outcry by the Civil Libertarians, the protectors and defenders of Salman Rushdie were nowhere to be found!

The media has become less and less evident, the longer my ordeal in the courts has lasted and the more frequent my visits to jail for my ideas have become.

So it did not surprise me to see my friends and stalwart supporters out there in front of that jail and only one TV cameraman and some reporters, who either came late or must have watched from their cars or the distance to do their stories. The coverage was "sparse." Only the Canadian Jewish News of February 8 and February 15 once gave it some fair coverage. The Toronto Star, Globe and Mail and Sun coverage was pitiful in content and prominence.

The media has to be embarrassed every night, for they really are the villains in this "persecution through prosecution" piece of modern witch-hunt. I saw my friends, some of them weeping, others sad, a few laughing nervously, as I tried to cheer them up on my way to jail, and could not help but reflect how this Canada had deteriorated in my 30 years here.

The authorities would at first not let me into jail because my demonstrators, I was told, were there. I had announced over the prison phone that "Political Prisoner Ernst Zündel was ready to enter the Canadian Gulag." Finally, police re-enforcements arrived, and I was escorted inside.

The "processing" of Thought Criminal Ernst Zündel had begun. I heard one of the white guards mockingly say quite loudly, "We got Zündel down there," to which a number of blacks, who had been eyeing me from their cells, said, where, where, where? The result? As they were led past my cell, where I stood in solitary, a mulatto cursed me and cussed me out as a dirty Nazi German pig and, although handcuffed to other prisoners, let loose with a stream of spit in my eyes and face. So within minutes of entering jail, I harvested the fruit of the mood created by the media and system in Canada. The rest was all routine!

Strip! Search for drugs! Issued prison clothing. Taken to cell! No mattress for a while, no blankets, no toothpaste, no pillow, no soap, and of course no freedom!

I wrote a letter while in prison, but could not find anyone courageous enough to take it or mail it out whatever the procedure was there, so in the end I took it out when I was released on bail. Naturally, it was written knowing that the Censors were going to copy it and pass it into my file, but I did want to convey to the outside world what I was thinking and I want to share it with you!

Towards the end of the newsletter I will reproduce Keltie Zubko's summation of my case and the tone and content of the Judgement. I will add a few observations of my own and ask you to help me one more time with some projects, and then I will have to go back to the humdrum of organizing my next moves! For I may only have three months before I begin serving my sentence. The Immigration Department already called, the Jews are clamoring to get me out of the country via deportation, and naturally, Canada's inefficient bureaucracy works smoothly and efficiently when the Zionist Lobby wants something done!

Toronto "Don" Jail, 8. Feb. 1990

Letter From Jail to My friends!

Status Report

On Monday, February 5, 1990, at 11 a.m., I honoured the promise I had given earlier in writing, to voluntarily check myself in at this Toronto landmark, which is only about half a mile from my home. From my sunroof, where I spent many a summer's day writing and researching, I could see this old building in the distance, with its typically 19th century British colonial style.

I was met at the jail entrance by approximately 50 Zündel and Free Speech supporters, all of whom carried placards demanding an end to my persecution through prosecution. I saw representatives there from various newspapers, and at least two video cameramen were present. One team was there from City TV, which has been following my 10-year case very closely.

It took about 35 minutes before the jail door opened to admit me. There is apparently a policy not to open the gate while demonstrators are nearby. Police reinforcements sorted the matter out, and I was finally admitted. The heavy steel doors rumbled and creaked shut behind me, I handed over my bail papers, and my "processing" had begun. I was familiar with the routine.

First, I was relieved of all my pens, keys, and my trusted "companion" of many years, my U.S. Dept. of Justice issue heavy-duty Keflar and steel plate body armour vest. It was this vest which, you will recall, together with a plainclothes Toronto policeman, had saved my life as I had been assaulted on the courthouse steps, in front of Old City Hall Court House on December 29, 1983. The vest had protected my chest and kidneys, where I was furiously kicked by one of the attackers.

The vest and pens gone, I was put into a cell alone. As I sat there, a group of prisoners, all handcuffed, were led past me outside my cell. One of them cursed at me and let fly with a load of spit square in my face—so my baptism into my new fraternity had started. Luckily, I had brought along two handkerchiefs, and "mopped up".

Then it was time to take my "mug-shot", with my number in front of me, just like I had seen in the Auschwitz Album. The photographer was a Chinese guard. The man who did the processing was a Negro whom I had been processed by once before. He was efficient, matter-of-fact, correct!

Money was counted, items of clothing counted, my concentration camp garb caused a few laughs, then it was over to the clothing issuing counter. I was relieved of my civilian stuff and handed my blue navy denim shirt, light blue woolen socks, surprise, surprise, brand new running shoes and brand new pants, which had a superior design over the "old uniforms"—they had a velcro waistband and fly, making for a much better, more individual fit. I was grateful to whoever had had this simple, but for prisoners' comfort brilliant idea! Now I could walk to the various interviews with classification officers, prison officials, to the exercise yard, without "losing my pants".

This time, I was given two sheets, a towel, a comb, a toothbrush, toothpaste immediately. I figured by this that I was going to be "inside" for a while. I had judged the mood of the Judges at my appeal in September of 1989 correctly. They did not grant us a single Appeal Point and did not reduce the 9-month jail term by one day.

In a perverse way, I had been proven right over all the other liberal pundits and believers in the impartiality of the System etc. In fact, it seems that I could feel and judge the mood and mind-set of Canada's, or should I say Ontario's, ruling caste, much more accurately than the native-born, Ontario-raised friends and pundits.

A tall, good-looking, older Scottish-descent prison official, I don't know his function, came in the afternoon to bring me a copy of the court's lengthy, 95-page verdict. He was courteous, even a touching kind, I felt, considering the negative news coverage I have had in the last few years. He told me when visiting hours would be, etc., and I felt that this was a further indication of what the verdict would be. So I stretched out on my metal bunk, with the new mattress on it, and started to read, Justice John W. Brooke's, J.A. beautifully crafted judgement, point by point, page by page, for the rest of the afternoon.

I was immediately struck by the lack of typing errors, for the previous few hours I had spent studying the Crown's "Factum", which was in modern Canadian, which is to say, it mirrored the terrible decline in spelling and writing skills which has taken place in this province since the late 1960's. This was one of the chief reasons why I sent my two boys to terribly expensive private schools.

I read the Judgement and mentally allowed myself to be transported back to the courtrooms, the many months I had attempted in these places to defend myself against the accusation that I had intentionally set out, all the time knowing that I was lying, and for some 25 years had knowingly published, written or spoken nothing but deliberate lies, about my German people's history. In two long trials, some who were not the accused but just helped in the trials, called them ordeals, lasting 7 weeks in 1985 and almost 4 months in 1988; we are not counting now the many preliminary court appearances of 1984 where up to 400-500 screaming, punching, kicking and spitting demonstrators frequently barred my entry to the courthouse. We are not counting the beatings I suffered, the bombing, still unsolved, of my home in September of 1984, or the many court appearances since 1983, all to the background of vicious media reports about me, my alleged ideas, beliefs, etc.

All this flashed past me like some TV Special on my life, as I read that Judgement of Mr. Justice Brooke.

I wondered to myself if this Judgement would have sounded different if anyone in Canada, be it government, social agencies, or the Judiciary or even a Human Rights body, had ever bothered to enquire what the German Canadians felt about "how they and their heritage, their people's history" were treated in Canadian school textbooks, news reports, novels and films? I reflected on the many missed opportunities, by the many individuals and government leaders I had contacted over the years, pointing to the inaccuracies, the negative stereotyping in books, and I wondered what was going through the minds of the reporters of the CTV, of CBC, of CHCH, all of whom have lengthy, in-depth programs "in the can" or on tape and who never saw them broadcast on their networks. I wondered about the high-ranking police officials whom I had shown my files of school texts, comic books, clippings and video clips, and who had shown such insight and understanding?

I wondered about the ministers, priests and schoolteachers, in whose churches and schools I had spoken over those last 31 years of my life in Canada, and I wondered what they thought about the latest turn of events in the Zündel case?

I wondered, as I was sitting there in my cell in Toronto's old, venerable and much-talked-about Don Jail, what impact, if any, my letters, visits with these people and interviews with them had had over the years. I wonder if they picked up the newspapers the day after my incarceration, or saw and heard the evening news that February 5, 1990, if it made them think back to our meetings of the mind?

I understand the satisfaction and vindication my opponents feel, for they are not plagued by anyone else's doubts or misgivings about the Zündel case; they won—I lost, that satisfies them, but what goes on in the minds of this vast land's majority? People who have always been decent and kind to me and have listened to my pleadings for relief from the constant media-born rehashing of W.W.II?!

I wondered if my 9 years of educational work in Quebec, and my hundreds of speeches, articles and press interviews, really had only the effect of me after 31 years in this place, the second-largest country in the world, having merely "spat against the wind"?

Those were my thoughts as I read the Crown's Factum and the Appeal Court's decision. Was this all I had to show for my 30 years of intellectual labor? What would all the thousands of my supporters from all across Canada, the US, Brazil, Australia and New Zealand, South Africa and Europe think, what would they think when they read all those negative news stories which would now appear about myself, with me unable to answer back?

Those were my thoughts! No—those are my thoughts every day. The only, very limited way I have to fathom what goes on in the hearts and minds of ordinary Canadians are the inmates and the guards at this institution. Some of the prisoners seem to have made up their minds already, the guards and officials seem the way I have gotten to know Canadian Police, Court Officials and Prison Guards to have been towards me, correct, no-nonsense professionals.

I wish I could say the same about prosecutors and their bosses, and the arbiters in this drama, but I cannot, in all honesty.

The parole officer was just here; I am eligible for parole on May 3rd, 1990. For release without parole on August 3rd, 1990. After the tone of the Judgement, don't expect me out before August 3rd, or Christmas.

All the Best!

Zündel Appeal Decision

A Summation by Keltie Zubko

At about 11:30 a.m. Ernst Zündel turned himself in to Toronto's Don Jail, so that the Ontario Court of Appeal would release its decision in his second appeal of his conviction for knowingly publishing false news, damaging to a public interest in racial tolerance. The appeal was unanimously turned down by three judges of the appeal court, Justices Brooke, Morden and Galligan.

Presently, Mr. Zündel remains in the Don Jail, in isolation, pending his possible release on bail while his lawyers Douglas Christie and Barbara Kulaszka seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Decision

Although the decision covers 96 pages, it is very sketchy in its treatment of the numerous appeal grounds, and leaves out several extremely important grounds, for example, the trial judge's exclusion of the Leuchter Report and the inclusion of the booklet Six Million Did Die, by the Crown. There are very few actual reasons given, but extensive quotes from the trial transcript.

It appears that the judges could not attack Mr. Zündel personally, as he did not testify, but spent their emotion by attacking Mr. Zündel's lawyer, Mr. Christie, for daring to allege judicial bias on the part of the trial judge.

The court seems to take the lazy way out in many respects by failing to apply their minds to the second appeal, and instead adopting the reasons of the first appeal court.

The first ground of appeal dealt with is that the trial judge wrongly took judicial notice of the holocaust, thereby removing the onus on the Crown to prove the booklet's falsity. The decision of the appeal court was basically that the trial judge "took judicial notice of non-contentious historical facts which were background and declined to take judicial notice of historical facts which the Crown had to demonstrate in proving that specific statements or allegations in the pamphlet were false..." Despite the confusion over the use of the term "holocaust," the court found that the charge to the jury was all right.

The second ground of appeal considered by the court was the admission of the evidence of Raul Hilberg, which was read in from the first trial, without the doctor coming back to testify and be cross-examined again by Doug Christie. The court held that the judge should have realized he had a discretion to exclude Hilberg's evidence, but that there was no prejudice to the accused by allowing its admission.

A very important ground of appeal was that which dealt with the accused's knowledge of falsity of the booklet, which the Crown said could be extrapolated from a finding that the accused had National Socialist beliefs. The court agrees with the appellant's argument that there is no logical connection between a person's being a follower of National Socialism and having knowledge that the statements in the booklet were false, but they fail to see the significance of the trial judge's instructions to the jury to the contrary. Their rationale on this ground upholds an earlier reason by the first court of appeal, in another context.

The next ground of appeal that is considered is that of the judge's instructions to the jury about actual knowledge (or falsity). Once again, this court does not dare (it appears) contradict a finding of the earlier court of appeal, in another context, when this argument was not considered, i.e., that the accused could not possibly have actual knowledge of falsity of the booklet, having been only six years old when the war ended.

The court deals very superficially with another important ground of appeal, that of the booklet being substantially or wholly opinion, and the judge's failure to adequately instruct the jury about this important aspect, since only statements of false fact can be caught by the section. Throughout their so-called reasons on this issue, the appeal court fails to note the nature of history as opinion, and the importance of the evidence called by the defence by its experts in linguistics that the booklet in question was a political opinion, or that it was the opinion portions of the booklet that would have any effect at all upon racial and social tolerance, while the "facts" would have no effect.

Once again, in this ground we note that the second appeal court appeared loathe to criticize the first appeal court's finding that an expert historian can give opinion evidence to establish fact—an entirely unprecedented finding in law.

Another ground of appeal was the judge's answer to the jury's question during their deliberations, which many observers in the courtroom at the time could see had a profound effect upon the jury, because of the manner of the judge. The appeal court interprets what the jury "must" have meant by their question and finds that the judge's answer was proper.

The appeal court judges mount a massive attack upon defence lawyer Doug Christie when they deal with the last ground considered in their reasons (but certainly not the last ground argued) that of judicial bias. This is where they spend much effort to discredit Mr. Christie, by condemning him for his criticism of the trial judge. Indeed, they find that the "trial judge conducted this trial in an exemplary fashion." They quote excerpts of the trial out of context, and certainly without the benefit of hearing the judge's tone of voice or seeing his demeanor. Many people who sat through the entire trial would be sure to disagree with the appeal court in their findings, and see it therefore as merely an attempt to protect one of their own brother judges.

They contend that "nor is there anything to suggest that [the trial judge] would have had any reason to have a personal animus toward the appellant." The trial judge is lauded as fair, correct, restrained, etc. etc. etc. The appeal court in particular rationalizes the trial judge's shocking treatment of defence witness expert Dr. Fann. Having seen the trial, the appeal court's treatment of this whole subject appears to me to be highly biased, itself, when they find that "there is nothing to provide even minimal support for the allegation of actual bias against the appellant." They go further and comment on Mr. Christie, calling him irresponsible and reprehensible for complaining about this bias.

In the final pages of the appeal decision, the court unanimously upholds the nine month sentence for this word crime. They say he is not being punished for his political beliefs, but "for what he has done." □

* * * * *

The remarks of the Court of Appeal judges do not bode well for the rights of defence counsel in trials where unpopular persons are accused. They decide, contrary to the evidence, there are no grounds to complain and then condemn the lawyer for complaining. Your letters to the Judicial Council about these judges' comments might be useful to remind them of the need to protect the rights of defence counsel, at least to complain with impunity. Otherwise, defence counsel will find it unsafe to complain unless they have previously gotten approval to do so—which means not to complain at all! Though the judges need not uphold the complaint, they should not attack the lawyer for complaining.

The address of the Judicial Council of Canada is: Room 450, 112 Kent Street, Ottawa ONT K1A OW8. Please write the following sample or similar letter to the Judicial Council and to other addresses given below. When writing, do not be abusive, please! Do not call people names; that could only harm Doug's career even more, and hinder a proper re-examination of my own case! Be civil, polite, firm! Get your facts straight. You can write in English, French or German. You must do it soon—time is running out.

Dear Sir

I wish to complain about the abusive language of the Ontario Court of Appeal in the case of Ernst Zündel, used February 5, 1990, against defence lawyer Douglas Christie.

The judgement (which has been widely reported) unfairly and improperly referred to Mr. Christie as irresponsible and reprehensible for complaining about the bias of the trial judge Thomas.

When a trial judge refers to the accused as "being a kook" and "maybe that is the best thing he has going for him," even before the jury is empaneled or any evidence is called in the trial, what do you call it? I call it bias and very blatant bias at that. And so do most reasonable people.

It seems that the court of Appeal says it is not bias, which is their right, but to attack the defence lawyer for complaining about it has a shocking and chilling effect on the rights of a lawyer to represent his client.

Mr. Christie has a tough enough job defending an unpopular client like Mr. Zündel without receiving abuse like this from the Court of Appeal. If you do not take steps to protect the reputation of defence counsel from such judicial intemperance, even the appearance of justice will disappear and the administration of justice will be brought into disrepute.

I demand this unfair attack be brought home to these judges who, because of their position, cannot be brought to correction in any other way than through your council.

Those justices are well within their right to find the bias of the trial judge of no significance to them but to insult the lawyer who complains about it in this way and to publicly humiliate him is totally unacceptable in a free and democratic society. What is he supposed to do, ask leave to appeal such bias, as is apparent in the trial judge's comments?

If you cannot rectify the justices intemperate remarks, I fear no one can remedy bias at all. The justices in the judgement referred to the trial judge's biased remark, which they could not deny, as merely "unfortunate."

I am of the opinion that counsel are under a duty to allege grounds of appeal which their client feels are justified. To attack a lawyer where such complaints are raised is unfair and results in timid lawyers who cannot represent unpopular clients. I believe the justices were intemperate and their remarks should be rectified by an apology. There is a prima facie right to complain without being attacked as irresponsible or reprehensible.

I trust you will take steps to rectify this frightening situation of judicial arrogance.

I would take this position regardless of whether I agree or disagree with Mr. Zündel's views or Mr. Christie's submissions about the alleged bias, and in the interests of justice and fair play in our judicial system.

HELP FOR DOUG CHRISTIE NEEDED!

The Globe & Mail, who used to cover the Zündel-Trial-I case quite well and was promptly visited by Zionist censors, and later got a public thrashing by the Zionists, has virtually stopped covering the Zündel controversy.

In a front-page article, on 14 February 1990, a lawyer called Doug Christie, of questionable ethnic adherence, who claims his mother attends church, and who, according to news reports, in my first trial was sent mail meant for Doug Christie and myself, which I never got sent by him, says he may have found a way to free himself of the mix-up with our Battling Barrister. He is quoted in the Globe & Mail as musing, "His [our Doug's] Achilles heel is that every time he comes to Ontario, he needs the approval of the Law Society of Upper Canada. They are charged with making sure the conduct of lawyers is not irresponsible!"

(The Appeal Court Judges had claimed in my case that Doug had acted in an "irresponsible" and "reprehensible" manner, by saying the Judge in my case had a bias against me!) The other Christie continues slyly, "Well, I have indicated to them that while I am not very subjective about the matter, I am curious whether somebody can come back to this province after being accused by the Ontario Court of Appeal of conduct such as that."

I don't think I have to spell it out for anyone what that means. The powers-that-be want to eliminate our Doug Christie, that's all!

He is the one man in Ontario—maybe even in the entire country—who stands between what used to be Anglo-Saxon legal traditions and the vindictive, niggling, mean-spirited political persecution of dissident thinkers who refuse to bow to the whims, wishes and pressures of the Zionist Lobby in Canada.

Persecution through prosecution, Israeli or Soviet style.

You can help save our Doug Christie's career and strike a blow for freedom by writing letters to the Judicial Council, the enclosed address of the Law Society of Upper Canada, plus the media and politicians' addresses given below.

Sample Letter:

In the name of justice, I ask the Canadian Judicial Council rto reconsider the manner and conduct as well as the verdict of the Ontario Appeal Court in the case of Regina vs. Zündel, heard on Sept. 18-22, 1989, File No. 424/88, verdict released on Feb. 5, 1990, so that the Canadian Justice System does not fall into discredit through a politically motivated erroneous judgment. The circumstances of the Zündel case are a scandal and unworthy of a civilized nation, especially an alleged democracy.

Court accepts Holocaust as fact as Zundel's appeal is turned down

By PAUL LUNGEN

TORONTO —

The Ontario Court of Appeal last week upheld the conviction of Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel, ruling that the District Court trial judge acted properly in accepting the Holocaust as an accepted fact that reasonable people would not question.

The unanimous judgment by the three-man Appeal Court also criticized defence lawyer Doug Christie for raising "a virulent attack on practically every aspect of the trial judge's (Ron Thomas) conduct," including unsupported allegations of bias.

"To make unfounded charges of personal bias against a judicial officer, where there is a complete absence of reasonable grounds, is irresponsible and reprehensible," the judges stated. "Mr. Christie did so in this case."

Zundel, who turned himself in to police prior to announcement of the judgment, was in custody for about six days before being released on $10,000 bail pending an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Court of Appeal justice James Carthy released Zundel on condition he not publish anything connected with denial of the Holocaust.

Zundel's application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada will be considered by three justices of the high court, who determine whether the issues raised are of sufficient national importance to warrant hearing legal arguments, said John Pearson, one of a three-man prosecution team in the Zundel case.

Pearson noted that the constitutionality of the Criminal Code section under which Zundel was convicted has not yet been tested in Canada's highest court.

Zundel was charged under Section 177 of the Code for wilfully publishing false information likely to cause damage to a public interest in social and racial harmony. The document in question, a pamphlet called Did Six Million Really Die?, alleges the Holocaust did not occur but was a hoax perpetrated by Jews to extort massive reparation payments from West Germany.

Charges against Zundel were initiated by survivor Sabina Citron of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association and were subsequently taken over by the Crown.

Zundel's eight-week trial began in January 1985 before a 12-person jury. He was convicted and sentenced to 15 months in jail.

That conviction was overturned by the Ontario Court of Appeal, which found the trial judge erred in the jury selection process, in decisions on admissibility of evidence and on the the charge to the jury. But it rejected defence contentions that the law violated freedom of speech guarantees under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A new trial was ordered.

Zundel was again convicted by a jury, following an even lengthier second trial, and sentenced this time to nine months in jail. He had been out on bail pending a decision in the second appeal.

Zundel's launch of an appeal to the Supreme Court will also put a stop to another legal matter — a move to deport Zundel to his native West Germany. Proceedings to deport him were launched following his first conviction, but put in abeyance pending the appeal and second trial.

An immigrant to Canada, Zundel has never taken out Canadian citizenship. Under Canadian law, a landed immigrant with a jail sentence exceeding six months is liable to be deported.

Following a criminal conviction, the Immigration Act requires that a report be written by an immigration officer after which the individual is called to an enquiry, Immigration Canada spokesman Carolyn Moore told the CJN.

Under the conditions of the Zundel case, she said, the report won't be written until the Supreme Court decides whether to hear Zundel's appeal.

In dismissing Zundel's appeal, the Court of Appeal upheld the trial judge's ruling taking judicial notice of the Holocaust. Thomas had instructed the jury that "the mass murder and extermination of Jews of Europe by the Nazi regime during the Second World War is so notorious as not to be the subject of dispute among resonable persons."

Calling the judicial notice ruling "narrow," the Court of Appeal noted the defence was left with the opportunity to prove the truth of allegations of fact in the pamphlet while the Crown still retained the onus of proving that the pamphlet was false and that Zundel knew it to be false.

"We think the trial judge took judicial notice of non-contentious historical facts which were background and declined to take judicial notice of historical facts which the Crown had to demonstrate in proving that specific statements or allegations in the pamphlet were false and that (Zundel) knew them to be false when he published them," the court stated.

The Appeal Court also approved Thomas's definition to the jury of a public interest, when the trial judge said: "It is not in the public interest to have one segment of the community racially or religiously intolerant against another segment of the community.

"An attack on one segment of the community is, in reality, an attack on the whole community. If one segment is not protected from criminal defamation and libel, accusations of criminal wrongdoing, criminal fraud, the whole community is vulnerable because the next segment is fair game, and then the next segment is fair game, until you have destroyed the entire community."

Thomas's description "was a graphic explanation of the evil that Section 177 was intended to prevent," the Appeal Court stated.

Turning to Christie's suggestions that Thomas was biased against the defence, the Court of Appeal stated "none of the charges of bias is made out.

"Not one of the incidents relied upon could lead to the appearance of an unfair trial," the court stated.

"Indeed, after reviewing in detail each of the specific allegations, much of the voluminous evidence and the charge to the jury, it is the opinion of this court that the trial judge conducted this trial in an exemplary fashion. He demonstrated fairness, impartiality and remarkable restraint.

"The restraint was remarkable because it was shown in the face of Mr. Christie's refusals to obey his rulings and Mr. Christie's attempts to interject irrelevant issues into the trial. On the occasions when the trial judge reprimanded Mr. Christie, the record discloses that such reprimands were deserved."

Commenting on the case, David Satok, chairman of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario Region, said, "The court has reaffirmed that the activities of socially destructive neo-Nazi agitators like Zundel are criminal and have no place in Canadian society."

B'nai Brith Canada president Moishe Smith said: "We are particularly gratified that the court backed Judge Thomas, who treated the Holocaust as an established fact of history. (This) decision is another victory for historical truth."

SOUTH AFRICA AT THE PRECIPICE

TREASON IS THE REASON

With the F.W. de Klerk government set to use Parliament to scrap the Separate Amenities Act which will destroy white community life, and thereafter to continue to whittle away at the Group Areas Act which finally will mark the end of the white nation in South Africa—and with the government stepping up its close collaboration with Nelson Mandela and the communist ANC as the main black players in its "negotiating" and "reform" processes, we would again warn our Defence and Police chiefs, together with our Ministers of Justice and of Law and Order, that the Suppression of Communism Act, the Internal Security Act, and the other protective anti-communist legislation still on the statute books are still the laws of the land, and that they have to be obeyed—particularly so by the nation-destroying government of Frederick Willem de Klerk.

Instead of the full force of these anti-communist laws being brought to bear on the ANC and the whole communist apparatus in the country, we today see the de Klerk government willy nilly breaking, bypassing or circumventing them, and intending to continue to do so—in its mad rush into its "new South Africa" and Azania.

MAIN COLLABORATORS

The ANC and its communist allies have clearly emerged as the government's main collaborators in its revolutionary moves towards "normalising life" in the "new South Africa."

With the ANC and communists doing all the running in the "new South Africa" stakes—if not as the sole black players—we see an entirely new situation in South Africa with the ANC openly rallying or marching with its flag, and that of the SA Communist Party, flying proudly.

Having recruited black people and skilfully located them in key positions in the ANC, the SA Communist Party has risen—with the ANC—to become the main factor on the political stage.

They talk as if victory is already theirs and believe they need only keep up the defiance campaign, the boycotts and the other demonstrations, to bring down the White government as well as the existing order.

They are still intent on intensifying the "armed struggle" if their full demands are not met.

Furthermore, the ANC, just like the UDF, had already virtually "unbanned" itself when State President de Klerk in his shock announcement in Parliament on February 2 suddenly unbanned not only the ANC but the SA Communist Party and all other restricted communist organisations—and doing so by presidential edict, and in open defiance of the anti-communist laws of the land still on the statute books.

HARD-PRESSED PEOPLE

Meanwhile, our hard-pressed and unfortunate Police Force has been instructed to "adapt" to the "new South Africa," and perforce has to adopt a low profile when the communist-inoculated black hordes, intimidated and marshaled by ANC commissars, conduct their "peaceful," government-sanctioned "protest marches" through all our main city centres—with the ANC flag and the red hammer and sickle flag flying high.

The Police Force has now been instructed to carry on its tasks in the "new political situations" regardless of their personal feelings and opinions!

"We are in a very difficult phase, which means that changes are being brought about," our new Commissioner of Police, Lt. Gen. Johan van der Merve, said in an interview with the Johannesburg Sunday Times.

"The police will have to adjust and be ready and prepared to face any challenges that come our way."

The police would adapt to "changes in the present government's attitude, together with changes in our society and also many other political changes that may take place."

He said the police were already adapting well to the changes and said all force members understood they were "only tools of the legislature" and could only apply the law.

"A policeman might not like to arrest a person for carrying an ANC flag—you cannot arrest a person merely for carrying an ANC flag.

"But if together with that action there are some other actions as well, then it may amount to promoting the aims and objectives of the ANC and then it is an Offence," General van der Merwe said.

PLUMMETING MORALE

But there was not a word, or even a peep out of him, about the many offences being committed on a daily basis, by not only the ANC but by the de Klerk government itself, in not enforcing the anti-communist laws of the land.

Is it any wonder then, that the undercurrent of resentment and frustration in the Police Force is growing.

Is it any wonder that the morale of our highly-trained and highly dedicated Police Force is plummeting—with 12 policemen quitting the SA Police, a situation described by General van der Merwe himself as "alarming"?

A policeman is not a policeman anymore. He does not know when a law is to be applied.

He today is a missionary of "reform" who has to stand by with his hands tied behind his back and witness law after law being broken in front of his eyes, without being able to do anything about it.

And the rescue of a black prisoner from two policemen by a black mob in Durban recently, without a shot being fired, will also go down as a day of shame in the proud annals of the SA Police Force.

Inevitably by its actions the government is fast losing the respect and loyalty of its security forces.

WARNING TO DE KLERK

The government's actions in allowing the State of Emergency to de facto elapse while maintaining the fiction that it is still in forces, and its general refusal to maintain law and order according to the laws in the statute books, can mean only one thing.

It can only mean that the de Klerk government is encouraging the communist revolution, by crippling the last bastion of South Africa's defence, namely the SA Police.

And by deliberately undermining the effectiveness of our Police Force, one of the finest in the world, de Klerk government is precipitating something which our communist enemies for the last four decades have been trying to accomplish.

We would again war Mr. de Klerk and his military and security chiefs—at this late hour—that the only consideration that their policy of "negotiation" with Nelson Mandela and the ANC, and with other agents of communism within and without South Africa, might not be construed as treason, is that all our communist enemies are no longer to be considered as enemies.

But if they have now in fact become not enemies, then our National Party leaders and our military and our security chiefs have either deliberately lied to us about the dangers of communism, or have themselves been paranoid or wicked in stirring the witches' brew of the Cold War, since the days of Dr. Verwoerd.

These are the same men who have consistently warned us of the communist menace. Their rise to power has been built on it. They have used the threat posed by communism to justify the existence of the Special Branch, the setting up of the Bureau of State Security and then its successors, the National Intelligence Service and the National Security Council, and the vastly increased security expenditure.

DEADLY DE FACTO ENEMIES

And the de Klerk government is today still using the threat of communism to stampede the electorate into supporting its whole "negotiating" and "reform" process, with the ANC and its communist allies as the main players.

These are the same men who are giving absolutely vital aid and comfort to communists inside and outside South Africa who are de facto enemies of the white man, whatever they might be de jure.

And if communists inside and outside South Africa are not de jure enemies of ours, then that in itself makes them more deadly de facto enemies.

If communism is a nightmare, which of course it is—ask Hungary, ask Czechoslovakia, ask Tibet, ask Vietnam, ask Cambodia, ask Afghanistan, ask Azerbaijan, and ask the other 1300-million people under the communist heel today—then deliberate strengthening and building up of their side, as our government is doing is tantamount to treason.

As for those who support it all this sorry business, we would again remind them that they might not know what misprision of treason is.

Misprision of treason is the crime of not doing something about treason when it is known to exist.

SHOULD HAVE BEEN OBVIOUS

It should have been obvious from the start that the Suppression of Communism Act, the Internal Security act and all the other anti-communist protective anti-communist legislation still on the statute books, are the laws of the land—and that until such time as they have been repealed, by Parliament, all the collaboration with the communist apparatus that we today see taking place between the de Klerk government and Nelson Mandela and the SA Communist Party's terrorist front, the ANC, is a serious crime against not only the white nation in South Africa, but against every law-abiding and self-respecting Indian, Coloured and Black man—and its perpetrators must be brought to justice and punished.

Simply stated, it is treason—and deserving of the ultimate penalty.

It is one thing to deal with one's declared enemies because one has no alternative, while remaining determined to defeat and destroy them.

It is quite another thing to fraternise and collaborate with them as a permanent affliction to be endured and finally accepted and surrendered to.

That is the road of surrender, of sell-out at the top, to the forces of International Finance and the Zionist-communist world revolution.

For our part, we are still waiting patiently for the treason trials.

F.W. DE KLERK: SOUTH AFRICA'S KERENSKY?

By D.L. Du Bois

History tends to repeat itself, and since his accession to power Mr. F.W. de Klerk seems to have conducted himself in a way not unlike Alexander Kerensky, head of the moderate provisional governent in Russia before he was ousted by the Bolsheviks in November 1917.

As a liberal regime tolerant of dissent and glorying in the slogan 'no enemies to the Left' Kerensky's government did not act against the Bolsheviks until it was too late.

During its short period in office it released terrorists and political prisoners; it ended discrimination on the grounds of class and national differences; it tolerated the dissemination of revolutionary propaganda.

In an almost bloodless coup in November 1917, the Bolsheviks, led by Trostky, ousted Kerensky and his cabinet from the Winter

Palace in Petrograd.

When de Klerk became Head of the State, his government had already initiated a process of discussion with the SA Communist Party's terrorist minion, the ANC. Already convicted terrorists had been released from prison and others have since been released.

Laws concerning the protection of minority groups and their interests have been abandoned and the right of the White community to its own community life is being openly undermined.

Newspapers scramble to project the view and profiles of revolutionaries as though they were wondrous additions to the social scene.

The ANC have been punted as returned heroes enthusiastically welcomed by the ignorant and manipulated masses just as Lenin was greeted upon his return to Russia in April 1917.

Like the Bolsheviks, the ANC appears to have unbanned themselves and to be flouting the state of emergency regulations.

All the while F.W. de Klerk busies himself with rhetoric about a so-called "new South Africa."

He seems to believe that differences and disparities between the First and Third World communities can simply be cast aside and that somehow peace will prevail if appeasement is followed.

Like Kerensky, he appears to be pursuing an illusion while strikes abound, violence increases and inflation destroys the middle class, namely, the Whites, his own people.

Like Kerensky, de Klerk apparently does not know that the peace which the revolutionaries are seeking is not merely the ending of White political power and influence but an end of resistance to communism.

Just as Lenin directed the Bolsheviks from his hiding place in the months prior to the Bolsheviks' seizure of power, so Nelson Mandela, from the luxury of his confined quarters in Paarl directs the ANC and appears to be awaiting the moment which will thrust South Africa's Kerensky into oblivion and thus signal the beginning of the new RSA—the Republic of Soviet Azania.

Police have been instructed to adapt to the "New South Africa," and so Third World hordes, intimidated and marshaled by the ANC commissars, swarm through our city centres desecrating our national monuments, our statutes and hauling down our national flag.

This has all taken place while the banner of evil and tyranny—the hammer and sickle—has been freely displayed. □

Descendants of Martin Kallikat

The most distinguished encyclopaedia of the German-speaking areas during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries has been the Brockhaus, which has been published in various sizes and editions down through the decades. In my personal reference library there is Der Große Brockhaus, 15th edition, published by F.A. Brockhaus in Leipzig beginning with the year 1928. After the publication of the 20 large volumes of the edition, a 21st volume, an Ergänzungsband (supplementary volume) appeared in 1935. Der Große Brockhaus corresponds fairly closely to the Encyclopaedia Britannica in the English-speaking countries, but with some notable differences. The Brockhaus has somewhat more characteristics of a large dictionary and its articles are unsigned. The 1928 edition of the Brockhaus abounds with colored illustrations of a quality much superior to those in contemporary editions of the Britannica.

In the Ergänzungsband of 1935 there are a number of articles which have to do with National Socialism and which reflect some influence of National Socialist thought. There are long(er) biographical articles on Hitler, Hess and other prominent National Socialists, which, of course, are by no means hostile to them and which present a wealth of organized factual information. One very striking example is a long article on German art (Deutsche Kunst). The six plates accompanying the article have the objective of illustrating the history of German art with an emphasis on its distinctive qualities by contrasting examples of German art with corresponding examples of the art of other nations. These illustrations are subsumed under the word Wesensschau (exposition of characteristics).

While recently leaving through the Brockhaus Ergänzungsband I came upon a small article which I had more or less forgotten after quite a few years and which might be taken as an admonishment to the United States of our days. The article had to do with an incident (date unspecified, but perhaps of the eighteenth or early nineteenth centuries) which had grave consequences down through a number of generations. A soldier, Martin Kallikat, procreated a son with a feeble-minded young women in a tavern. From this son there were 480 descendants during five generations. Of these descendants, 30% were feeble-minded, 10% quite normal, while the remaining were borderline cases and uncertain. Martin Kallikat later married a healthy farm woman who bore seven healthy children. During the subsequent generations there were 489 of their descendants, of whom all were healthy except two and in a number of instances of considerable merit. The small article was apparently based on the second German edition of Goddard's study of the Kallikat family published in 1934. It is accompanied by an abbreviated diagram of the descendants with symbols indicating those who were genetically disadvantaged, those who were normal, and those who died before their reproductive years.

Oh, that every American pupil were to be compelled to read about this act of dysgenic procreation by Martin Kallikat that caused so much misery and expense in subsequent generations and to have its vitally important lessons impressed on their young minds! Faint hope, though! Social studies in American public schools are now as far from concerns with dysgenic problems as the equator is from the poles.

We Americans are now living in an age in which most "intellectuals" (in contrast to successful cattle breeders) simply refuse to face up to biological realities and their crucially important effects on our economic and cultural life.

I seem to recall a statement by a prominent National Socialist, perhaps Rudolf Hess or Heinrich Himmler, to the effect that National Socialism was essentially the application of knowledge in the field of biology and genetics. In any event, it is perhaps of significance that Himmler was an agronomist by educational background.

Although National Socialism stressed eugenic measures, such as the sterilization of feeble-minded and schizophrenic persons, Germany was by no means a pioneer in such measures. As I have pointed out in previous articles, the United States was a pioneer in eugenic measures to a much greater extent. Indiana had laws providing for eugenic sterilization as early as 1907 and quite a few other states subsequently enacted such laws and enforced them.

American political leaders and legislators now regard any mention of eugenic measures as an invitation to termination of their profitable careers. They would face the howls from their opponents and degenerate "intellectuals" about "racism" and their being "Nazis." The overreaction against National Socialism has done much to pervert and paralyze American thinking.

In his voluminous, well-known Untergang des Abendlandes ("Decline of the West"), first published in 1918-1922, Oswald Spengler discerns phases of the rise and decline of a number of great civilizations in which he notes important parallels. Spengler designates the final phase of the decline of a civilization by his neologism, Fellachentum, which he constructs from the Arabic word for peasant and the Germanic suffix -tum (compare English -dom, as in "kingdom"). The word conjures up the image of very poor Egyptian peasants living in mud huts amidst the monuments of a remotely ancient, advanced civilization. Spengler's observations, however, include few, if any, conjectures on the biological causative factors involved in the decline of civilizations. In this regard we should refer to Elmer Pendell's Why Civilizations Self-Destruct (Cape Canaveral, 1977). This work emphasizes the dysgenic factor ("breeding from the bottom") in the decline of civilizations.

Some time ago the erstwhile Prime Minister of Japan, Yasuhiro Nakasone, had the candor—perhaps unusual for his race—to attribute American inability to maintain favorable balances of trade to the racial composition of the United States, with its large numbers of Afro-Americans and "Hispanics." Nakasone's statement evoked howls from journalistic wolves and stupid politicians, of course, and Nakasone felt compelled to apologize, but every concerned American should seriously consider Nakasone's explanation of our trade problems. He might have done us a favor.

Our country is declining economically and culturally, as any halfway intelligent, patriotic American willing to confront reality can discern. Instead of becoming angry about the allegedly unfair practices of our economic competitors, we should start to face up to the mistakes we have been making during the past decades with regard to immigration and welfare policies, policies that have caused an important but insidious decline in the quality of our population.

In past times our spacious country has had great economic successes, but how many millions of "Kallikats" can even a spacious, prosperous country afford to carry on its back? Anyone who doubts that "Fellachtum" has already appeared in the United States should take a drive through East St. Louis, Illinois or similar "black holes," but he should keep his automobile windows locked while doing so. East St. Louis was once a productive industrial community. □

on the month's news

East European Update

In these columns two months ago [reprinted in Liberty Bell, January 1990] we made some attempt to cast light on the momentous events that have been taking place in recent weeks behind what was once called the 'Iron Curtain'. One thing that troubled us was the fact that these events were being loudly applauded by the very people and agencies we have learned to trust the least: the leaders of the mainstream political parties and the commentators of the mass media in Britain, all of whom might be lumped together, for the sake of simplification, under the description of the 'liberal establishment'. In modern times there have been few historical developments approved by these people that could be accounted as good. It was for this reason that we counseled our readers to bear in mind that what is happening now in Eastern Europe may not be all that it appears.

For a long time now, our opinion-formers and leaders of politics have been preaching to us that the age of the nation-state is now past and that national sovereignty is an outdated, even regressive, concept. Yet what have we found but these same self-appointed 'experts' drooling over the various 'national liberation' movements that have emerged in East European countries. It simply does not add up.

At the time of our last analysis, only two East European communist countries had as yet been unaffected by the turmoil of change. These were Rumania and tiny Albania. Since then, the former country has been the scene of the bloodiest and most revolutionary change of them all. The last domino in the Soviet satellite system has fallen, and only Albania—for some time now outside the Soviet orbit—still retains its allegiance to Marxist ideology. And even there the signs of unrest are now gathering.

The Rumanian uprising culminated in the extraordinary circumstances of the death of President Ceausescu and his wife. As part of our quest for an understanding of the forces at work, we should remind ourselves of how this occurred. The former dictator was given a two-hour 'trial'. The 'trial' took place in complete secrecy. And then he and Madame Ceausescu were summarily shot a very short time afterwards. In view of the massive weight of evidence Ceausescu's captors claimed to have against him, the idea that he could be given a proper trial in the space of those two hours is ridiculous. Apart from this, the short notice of the trial, and its secrecy, made it clearly impossible for the accused either to prepare a proper defence or to call witnesses. Then his shooting in the immediate aftermath of this kangaroo court equally clearly made it impossible for him to exercise any proper right of appeal. This procedure exceeded even the infamous Nuremberg 'war crimes' trials in its abandonment of all the basic conventions of European law. Yet all this was taking place in a situation in which, we were told, the forces of 'democracy' had been victorious!

This gruesome act had about it all the flavour of the murder of Czar Nicholas and his family at Ekaterinburg in the wake of the Russian Revolution. It looked not so much like an act of 'justice' as one of Talmudic vengeance.

And yet the western media raised hardly a murmur of protest against this outrage. The severest criticism heard in any British newspapers was that the manner of the President's and his wife's demise was 'unfortunate' but understandable in the extreme circumstances prevailing. Just contrast this with the howls of rage which the same organs emit when terrorists are executed, after due process of law, in South Africa.

Looking at all these tumultuous events that have taken place over a period of just a few weeks, the first thing one is struck by is the almost clockwork precision of their timing—one after another, in quick succession. Even if we grant that the peoples of the various countries of Eastern Europe had much over which to be disconteted—as undoubtedly they did—it seems naive in the extreme to accept the 'orthodox' view of our mass media that these revolutions were 'people's uprisings', the expression of spontaneous revolt by the masses, and so on and so forth. If this had been the case, is it likely that they would have occurred almost simultaneously, as they did?

In truth, the manner of their timing suggests very strongly that they were the work of a single hand. The question then arises: whose hand?

As is often the case, Ivor Benson, writing in Behind the News (January 1990) is well worth listening to on the subject. This is what he had to say in the article headed 'The past explains the present':—

> In East Germany, the task of transforming the Communist Party into some kind of 'liberal-democratic' party has been given to one Gregor Gysi, a 41-year-old Jewish lawyer and president of the East German Lawyers' Federation. The London Jewish Chronicle (December 15th) reports that Gysi is a member of 'We for Ourselves', a group of younger Jews who meet regularly to discuss Jewish problems. The London Financial Times (December 11th) says that members of the Politburo under Erich Honecker were more inclined to conceal their Jewish identity.
> Czechoslovakia's 'No. 2', one of the two deputy prime ministers, says the Jewish Chronicle, is Walter Komarek. In Poland, says the same paper, an American Jewish Congress liaison office will be run by Stanislaw Krajewski, 'a Solidarity activist and leader of the Warsaw Jewish community.

In Hungary, prominent among the reformers is Gaspar Miklos Tamas, who has been given a considerable build-up in the western media, and could emerge as a candidate for high office. Born in Rumania, his father was a Hungarian journalist and his mother the daughter of a Jewish cantor. Like Lenin, therefore, who also had a Jewish mother, Tamas qualifies as a Jew under Israel's 'Law of Return'. The fact that the Socialist Party (of Hungary) proposes to use a big American public relations company to help it fight the forthcoming elections (BBC report) tells us a good deal about the kind of people now jockeying for control in Hungarian politics.

As a postscript later on in Behind the News, Mr. Benson again quoted the Jewish Chronicle (December 29th) on developments in Rumania, which said that:—

> Professor Silvio Brucan, a Jew, is a prominent member of the new leadership, the Council for National Salvation Front. Another member, Mr. Aurel Dragos Munteanu, has strong Jewish connections and speaks Hebrew. According to Rabbi Rosen, he has a Jewish mother. Others say his wife is Jewish.

Very recently, Brucan has in fact fallen out of favour and been removed from his post. But before this British TV interviewers were in the habit of going to him, more than to any other official in the new Rumanian Government, to obtain comments on the situation.

Of the others that Mr. Benson mentioned, Gregor Gysi, it will be remembered, succeeded Egon Krenz, who had taken over following the downfall of Herr Honecker in the DDR [GDR]. Immediately Krenz came into the limelight, millions must have been struck by how 'un-German' he looked. We are now informed by German-Canadian historical revisionist Ernst Zündel, a diligent researcher, that "Egon Krenz was identified as a Jew by a Jewish professor who appeared on TV recently." Evidently, Krenz did not measure up to the requirements of those who staged the East German revolution, for he was soon displaced. However, considering the DDR's tiny Jewish population, it seems extraordinary that first one Jewish leader, then another, should emerge in charge of affairs in the wake of the upheavals. Just how do they do it?!!!

We have also received information, as yet unconfirmed, that Vaclav Havel, the writer who has just taken over as president of Czechoslovakia, is wholly or partly Jewish. If we obtain further news on this, we will let our readers know.

The observation made earlier about the quick consecutive nature of these revolutions in Eastern Europe reminds one of similar events in 1848, as documented by Mrs. Nesta Webster in her book World Revolution [available from Liberty Bell Publications, $8.00 + $1.50 postage & handling]. Of these the authoress wrote:—

> The outbreak of revolution in Paris had given the signal for the European conflagration. On the 1st March insurrection began in Baden, on the 12th in Vienna, on the 13th riots took place in Berlin, on the 18th a rising in Milan, on the 20th in Parma, on the 22nd a republic was declared in Venice, on the 10th April a Chartist demonstration was organised in London, on the 7th May troubles began in Spain, on the 15th in Naples, and during the course of the year no less than sixty-four outbreaks of serfs occurred in Russia.
>
> Of course, in the pages of official history we shall find no explanation of this sudden recurrence of the revolutionary epidemic, which is once more conveniently ascribed to the time-honoured theory of contagious popular enthusiasm for liberty. Thus the Cambridge Modern History, describing the revolution in Germany, observes: 'The Grand Duchy of Baden was the natural starting place for the revolutionary movement, which, once set on foot, seemed to progress almost automatically from state to state and town to town.'
>
> Precisely. But we are given no hint as to the mechanism which produced this automatic reaction all over Europe. The business of the official historian is not to enquire into causes but to present the sequence of events in a manner unintelligible to the philosopher but satisfying to the unenquiring mind of the general public.

And indeed there can be no doubt that this "unenquiring mind of the general public" of which Mrs. Webster speaks is the type of mind that is expected to accept the proposition that the recent outbreaks of unrest in Eastern Europe are 'spontaneous' uprisings of the 'common people' against tyranny. Tyranny there may indeed have been, and popular unrest there undoubtedly has been. But anyone who would maintain that these uprisings are not in some way co-ordinated and inspired from some central directing source would have to be accounted as having an understanding of politics on the level of the village idiot.

And if we accept that there is such a directing source, we must seriously doubt whether these uprisings are genuinely 'nationalist'. Unquestionably, they have received strong impetus from grass-root nationalist feeling everywhere they have occurred, but that is very much another matter from saying that nationalism constitutes either their underlying political inspiration or their ultimate political objective. If it were so, is it really likely that the mass media in the West, which is almost wholly internationalist in orientation, would give their blessing to such developments?

The references by Mr. Benson and others to the Jewish rôle in these revolutions suggest that what we may well be witnessing is the wheel of history turning full-circle. Readers of this magazine should not need reminding that it was Jewish activists who formed the majority in the cadres that brought about the Russian Revolution in 1917—an upheaval which, at its time, was heralded as a step forward in human progress by good liberals everywhere. When later, in the wake of the triumph of the Red Army in 1945, this revolution was carried to most of the remainder of Eastern Europe Jews were again prominent among the leaders of the Soviet puppet régimes installed: Matyas Rakosi in Hungary. Anna Pauker in Rumania. Hilde Benjamin in East Germany—just to give three examples. David Irving, in his book Uprising, which deals with the attempted revolution in Hungary 1956, has said that, to many of the insurgents, the uprising was as much an anti-Jewish one as it was an anti-communist one, as it was found that the police-state apparatus against which the uprising was mainly directed was heavily staffed with Jews.

If we care to look back over events in Eastern Europe during the 20th century, we detect a familiar pattern. Phase One: Imperial Russia is vilified by western liberals in the mass media as a 'tyranny' whose people are struggling to be 'free'; Phase Two: Revolution breaks out in Russia and a new régime takes over in which Jews play a predominant rôle; Phase Three: the new Russia is greeted by liberals in the media everywhere as 'progressive' and 'enlightened' and the hope of free peoples all over the world; Phase Four: Liberals in the West begin to be disillusioned with the new Russia and instead refer to it, as they did the Czarist régime preceding it, as a 'tyranny'. The same epithet becomes applied to its puppet régimes set up elsewhere in Eastern Europe after World War II; Phase Five: Revolutions break out, first in Russia and then shortly afterwards in nearly all other Eastern European countries. These revolutions are heralded by liberals in the West as 'progressive', 'enlightened' and expressing the people's will to 'freedom'. In these various revolutions, Jews are found to be playing a leading rôle.

Isn't this were we came in?

At this point we may go back to Mr. Benson and take up another theme contained in his articles in Behind the News. Writing this time under the title of '1990—the Mould is Broken', he spoke of the red-carpet treatment given to President Ceausescu of Rumania when he visited Britain in 1978, and continued:—

> Ceausescu's secret police infra-structure was not crated a year or so ago when western media began to snipe at him; it was fully operative ever since the days of that ruthless tyrant Anna Pauker.

The suggestion here is that clearly something has happened in the intervening years to make it a matter of British and western policy to oppose the Ceausescu régime, whereas in the past it was accepted—indeed accepted to the point of conferring on Ceausescu, as Mr. Benson reminds us, the award of Knight, Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath. Here the operative word is 'policy'. For this is what present opposition to the former communist régimes in Eastern Europe amounts to. The opposition does not stem from moral disgust at those régimes' inner workings, as might be suggested by the current propaganda; it arises from the fact that those who wield supreme power in Britain and the West have decided that there is a change in the international situation, calling for a policy change on their own part. Gangster régimes in Eastern Europe which in the past, as a matter of policy, were tolerated, are now not to be tolerated but must be attacked by every weapon, overt and covert, that is to hand. And every encouragement must be given to their overthrow. When that overthrow occurs, it must be acclaimed as a triumph for the forces of 'freedom', 'decency' and all things good—even if in the process former leaders are given secret trials of two hours' duration and summarily shot shortly afterwards, with no facilities given to them to conduct a proper defence.

So, what we have here is a situation, not in which the morality of these communist régimes has changed—making them worse than they were before, but in which western policy has changed. Behind all the moralistic cant, this is the obvious reality.

For what reasons, then, has there been this change of policy on the part of those who control the West (and under whose power we are as much vassals as have been those in Eastern Europe under communist power)? There are two possible explanations. We cannot be certain at this stage which is correct. Perhaps, indeed, there is an element of correctness in both, with some variation depending on which country we are looking at.

For the first of these explanations, we go again to Mr. Benson. Speaking of Britain's former acceptance of the Ceausescu régime in Rumania, he said:—

> The lesson of it is that there was no fault to be found with a cruelly oppressive communist régime so long as it was able to remain firmly in power and hold down its suffering population.

And again:—

> There was no campaign of propaganda and pressure against any communist tyranny—but rather co-operation and support—until the moment it began to fall apart—nothing like the continuous undeclared warfare against Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), South Africa, Chile...."

Mr. Benson was, of course, reminding us here of what is common practice on the part of what has sometimes been called the 'International Money Power', which has been the main directing force in 20th century politics. That power always prefers to have régimes around the world that are stable and firm, rather than those who look like tottering. Stability and firmness here often matter much more than the attractiveness, in moral terms, of the régimes in question.

What is very probably true is that the International Money Power, based in the West, was well informed as to the fact that the various régimes throughout Eastern Europe were fast losing their support and credibility, and that pressures within the countries in question made some sort of change inevitable. It has always been an accomplished trick of the Money Power, when it sees forces for reform gathering in a particular country, to establish for itself a foothold among those forces so as to influence them in the desired direction—in a word, to control them.

If, in the case of Rumania, the downfall of Ceausescu was thought to be imminent, or at least not so very far away, it would make sense, from the standpoint of Western Money, that the successor régime would better be one of 'liberal' complexion and amenable to international manipulation by use of economic, financial and ideological remote-control systems, rather than a genuinely patriotic one, controlled by nationally-oriented leaders and dedicated to national purposes—in the terminology of modern propaganda, 'fascist'.

And, of course, the same may be said of other pending revolutionary upheavals elsewhere.

In our opinion, there is much force and much logic in this explanation of what is now going on. It may be, however, that to regard that as the whole explanation is to oversimplify.

A theme which we have sometimes touched upon in these pages is that of the tendency, often in history, for régimes that have been established by revolutions from the left to move, in the course of time, gradually towards the right. To detail the factors that give rise to this tendency would be to demand more space than is available in this short commentary. It must therefore suffice here merely to record it as a fact. Revolutions that have taken place against the background of slogans of 'democracy' have often evolved, over the years, towards new autocracy. Régimes that have been conceived in a spirit of internationalism have often, over the years, evolved toward nationalism. Régimes supported, in the first place, by artistic and cultural 'radicals' have often, in the course of time, swung back to a support of cultural and artistic tradition.

Taking Rumania as an example, it may well be that President Ceausescu was something of a tyrant and that his régime was evil and corrupt. But, as Ivor Benson says, this must have been known many years back. What could Ceausescu have done recently to have changed his standing in the West? One possible clue may be found in the fact that, as mentioned in the small print of some reports of his demise, he had a policy aiming to rid Rumania of all foreign debts—in other words, he was not enamoured of the idea of having his country in pawn to International Finance—an essential ticket to global respectability! Another thing of interest is the news that the Rumanian President was averse to his people having a low birthrate and had introduced some measures aiming at encouraging Rumanian women to have more children, one such measure being the banning of abortion. Students of the modern world will, of course, know that, while the prolific breeding of the millions of Africa, Asia and Latin America has the full blessing of our global masters, the idea that Europeans should multiply is definitely one that belongs to the dark ages and must be universally rejected. These developments in Rumania constitute just two of many that indicate a deviation of the original policies pursued by communists and their backers.

With such changes, of course, has to come a loosening of ties with the original driving forces of the revolutions in question, and a corresponding loosening of the control of those forces. The economic needs of the state in question, for instance, may indicate policies that involve some disengagement from the international economic 'order'. Internal social needs may dictate the adoption of policies designated as 'illiberal'. Or it may merely be that the emergence of a strong individual to a position of power in a communist state may give rise to the assertion by that individual of greater independence of action in national and international affairs.

For a variety of reasons, those international wire-pullers who have set off a revolution in a particular country may find that, as events unfold, the people taking power in the wake of that revolution may not be willing to be manipulated in the way originally intended. By such process, Frankenstein monsters emerge who escape the control of their creators.

There are many reasons for believing that, across much of Eastern Europe, just such a process has been occurring. The communist Frankenstein monster created in 1917 has started to behave in a manner not entirely planned or approved by its creator.

If we bear in mind the original source and inspiration of communism, if we remind ourselves of the fact that it was created, not in order to provide the 'workers' paradise' for all—as imagined in popular propaganda—but essentially to serve as a means for the control of nations and their peoples by hidden manipulators behind the scenes, it would follow that whenever the manipulators perceive that their creature is getting out of hand and venturing beyond their remote-control system, they should seek to take urgent action to restore their control—by dispensing with the original monster and creating another more amenable and more compliant.

Either or both of these theories could explain recent events in Eastern Europe. It could be that there are further explanations not touched upon here. We may not be able to unravel them until much more is known about what is happening.

We might finally say this: just because certain forces are at work which are attempting to manipulate events in Eastern Europe to their own advantage and purposes, it does not necessarily mean that they will succeed in their objective. There is much evidence, on the contrary, that in many areas such events are getting entirely out of their control and taking a wholly independent course. One such course, for instance, is the movement towards unification of the two Germanies. We can be quite sure that that is a development profoundly unwelcome to those who have been pulling the string of upheaval in the communist world.

Ivor Benson, in one of his Behind the News articles, summed it up in the title '1990—the Mould is Broken'. That is indeed what we are now seeing. The mould in which 20th century international politics have been cast, with their phony 'cold war', their division of Germany and their suppression of other nationalities, is now on the way to being well and truly taken apart. It could well be that, just as the 19th century began, in effective terms, in 1815 and ended in 1919, so the 20th century, that ghastliest and ugliest of eras of history, is ending now—a decade ahead of time. If so, hurrah for that! Ahead of us lies a new age. It will be an age of dangerous pitfalls, some of which have been pointed out in this analysis. At the same time it is likely to be the age of tremendous opportunities. For of one thing we can be sure: those powers that have dominated the century now ending are deeply worried. Everywhere the creations to which they have given birth are crashing down in ruins. The operations by which they are now trying to control events in Russia, East Germany, Rumania and elsewhere may well prove to be their last desperate fling of the dice. We shall see!

More Nonsense on Inflation

Old superstitions die hard, and they die even harder when someone has a vested interests in keeping them alive.

Paul Johnson, one-time scribbler for The nutty left and nowadays an evangelical Thatcherite, was busy wielding his pen in support of one such superstition in the Daily Mail on January 15th. In an article headed 'Inflation: the real culprits', he slammed the ambulance drivers and the Ford car workers for pursuing wage demands that, in his view, were bound to set off a new inflationary spiral.

Clearly Mr. Johnson, like so many others of his kind, needs a few lessons on the basics of economic life.

His theory is, of course, based on the supposition that, if these demands are met, charges for the health services will go up and the prices of Ford vehicles will also rise, with the resulting knock-on effect on charges and prices elsewhere that we are told is bound to happen in such situations.

But the theory is, of course, nonsense.

If the Government maintained, as it should do, a proper mechanism of money supply by which the amount of money in the economy always corresponded to the amount of goods and services for sale, all that would happen through the charges on the health services going up or the prices of Ford motor vehicles increasing would be that there would be that much less money in the economy to spend on other things. Charges and prices elsewhere would therefore correspondingly come down. There would not be inflation.

But this is not the situation that exists. The Government is not maintaining a constant equilibrium between money in circulation and goods and services for sale. Constantly, the amount of money in circulation is increasing in relation to goods and services for sale.

Why is it increasing? Is the Government simply 'printing' more money than it should? That is a popular theory, but it is not correct.

What is happening is that the Government, instead of 'printing' money, as it should indeed be doing, is bringing more money into circulation by borrowing it from the banking sector and paying interest on what it borrows. Likewise, money is also being borrowed in the same way by hundreds of thousands of other bodies and individuals throughout the land. And the banks, when they 'lend' this money, are not simply transferring it from their vaults to the borrower, as is popularly supposed; they are creating it out of nothing—by the mere act of allowing credit!

And as the interest-rate for all this borrowing goes up so does the nation's debt to the banks go up. This debt, de jure, has to be repaid (although de facto it can never be repaid under the present system). At least some part of it is being paid all the time, and that part becomes written into every item of goods and services for sale. That is what causes inflation.

Nearly everyone in Britain is being hit by this inflationary disease, but it hits the hardest those who have mortgages. All that the ambulance drivers and Ford workers are doing is seeking pay raises that will enable them to keep their heads above water in this inflationary situation. They are not being greedy; they are just trying to survive!

The process, of course, will continue—until we tackle the real cause of it. And the cause is not the workers but the bankers.

DOES THE WEST
HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 – except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. Recollections and Reflections of an American Veteran

Charles E. Weber

My interest in the history of the Second World War is a result not simply of my having served in the American army during that war, but also as a result of particular assignments in military service and my subsequent service as a War Department Employee in Germany during 1946-1948. My work in intelligence and "Denazification" put me in a position in which I had unusually good opportunities to hear many views on the war, not only of Germans, but also of people of such diverse nationalities as French, British, Latvian and South African.

My involvement in the Second World War developed as follows:

Like the vast majority of Americans, members of my family and I wanted no involvement in another European war. My father, a professor of law at the University of Cincinnati, despised Roosevelt, in particular as a result of Roosevelt's demagogic feud with the Supreme Court ("the Nine Old Men") and Roosevelt's Machiavellian stirring up of class hatreds. My parents, like so many patriotic Americans, were both active in the America First Committee. In spite of any efforts we made, we had to watch with distress as Roosevelt undertook one measure after another calculated to bring us into the war against Germany, a country approximately the size of Texas and certainly not a military threat to the United States. The outbreak of the war between Germany and the USSR in June 1941 strengthened the desire of many Americans who disliked Communism to stay out of the war.

In 1940 I had commenced my studies at the University of Cincinnati towards a bachelor's degree. During my sophomore year I became a member of the University of Cincinnati chess team and on 7 December 1941 our team went to the campus of the University of Indiana. Having defeated my opponent, I went downstairs to the lower floor of the student union building and heard on the radio that the Japanese had attacked Pearl Harbor, an event which was to have protracted influence on my life. Nearly a year passed before I received "greetings from the President" and on 13 January 1943 I was sworn into the U.S. Army with the serial number 35683098. After some service at Nichols General Hospital near Louisville, Kentucky I was assigned, on the basis of a rather lengthy examination, to the Army Specialized Training Program. While in the ASTP I studied under some outstanding professors at Ohio State University and the University of Chicago (Professors Bergsträsser and Kunstmann in particular). My chief (and prescribed) studies were in German language and area.

Having graduated after some ten months in the ASTP, I was assigned to McDill Field near Tampa, Florida. I served in various humble capacities at McDill from early 1944 to the fall of that year. In the evenings I would often take walks and watch the big B-17's going up on training flights. The officers flying them had all sorts of advantages, but I hardly felt any envy of them, since I realized that many of them would soon be flying over anti-aircraft installations defending western Europe, where scores of thousands of them were killed or captured. My interest in risking my life for the greater glory of Roosevelt & Co. was minimal. My attitude toward military service was somewhat analogous to that of the famous fictional Czech soldier Schwejk, who served in the Austrian army without any enthusiasm. (Novel by J. Hašek, 1921-1923.)

After an assignment at a Signal Corps installation near Fresno, California, where I was trained in radio monitoring of German communications, in early 1945 I was assigned to Camp Ritchie, which was located in a beautiful part of western Maryland. Camp Ritchie was the camp in which the American army trained its intelligence personnel. Many soldiers in Camp Ritchie being trained in counter-German intelligence were Jewish refugees assigned on the basis of their knowledge of the German language. In Camp Ritchie there were some standing jokes, such as "I em speakink sefen lengwitches, Angles de best." And then, what is the German word for "traffic jam"? Verkehrsmarmelade!

In Camp Ritchie I heard officers lecture on such topics as techniques of interrogating prisoners of war, map reading and obtaining knowledge of the German order of battle. (I still have the valuable handbook dated March 1945, Order of Battle of the German Army.) I was given the Military Occupation Number 631, that of an intelligence non-commissioned officer, (I had never applied for Officer Candidate School, and not just as a result of laziness or indifference to a higher pay scale.) Since I had no burning desire to lay down my life to further Roosevelt's criminal ambitions, I shed no tears when I learned of Roosevelt's death in April 1945 while I was still at Camp Ritchie.

In June 1945 I was transported on the huge, new Queen Elizabeth to England. Shortly thereafter I was sent to France. Later that summer I was transported in a dirty boxcar down past the badly bombed Bad Kreuznach. We were let out in Mainz, where I had my first close look at the terrible bombing destruction. I recall conversing with a German civilian, who expressed his doubts that there would ever be financing sufficient to rebuild the badly damaged cities. From Mainz we went to Bad Schwalbach northwest of Wiesbaden. Bad Schwalbach is an attractive old town in the western Taunus Mountains that is famous for its mineral waters. (The famous Frankfurt engraver and publisher, Matthäus Merian, died in Bad Schwalbach in 1650.) Bad Schwalbach was the location of a pool of intelligence personnel.

My first notable assignment out of the pool was to a document center in Fechenheim, a suburb of Frankfurt. I was in a detachment of about a dozen men. Our duties consisted of going through captured records of the Oberkommando der Wehrmacht (German Supreme Command) in search of evidence against Germans who were to be tried in Nuremberg and other places. Nearly all or all of the other men in the detachment were Jewish. I can recall no evidence found in the Fechenheim deposits which would have a bearing on what is now commonly called the "Holocaust." The Jewish lieutenant in charge of the detachment did not like my presence and after some weeks he had me sent back to the intelligence pool in Bad Schwalbach. I believe that my departure from the Fechenheim document center left complete racial homogeneity in the detachment, which had been billeted in formerly German barracks in a northern suburb of Frankfurt.

My next assignment away from the pool (November 1945?) was to Internierungslager 75, as it was designated. This facility consisted of former military barracks in Kornwestheim, a city of modest size north of Stuttgart. The internees were mostly those who had held positions in the National Socialist Party or German government which were high enough to put them into the automatic arrest categories, as in the case of all former German diplomatic personnel, for example. One of the lieutenants in command of our small detachment boasted that the interned men in the facility represented the cream of German brain power and that when they were asked simple questions they could respond with outlines of doctoral dissertations. We were involved in interviewing the interned men in order to determine if they could be released, that is, if they would not come in conflict with the occupation forces and they were not likely to be "war criminals". One of the lieutenants was a half-Jew, whose father, a German dentist, visited us one time. The other lieutenant I recall being named Weil and having distinctly Semitic features and graduate degrees in psychology. Most of the men in the detachment were Jewish. The Jews did most of the interviewing. An Aryan comrade and I worked on the big files on the internees, of whom there must have been at least several hundred in the facility. It was only later that I was assigned to interviewing internees. I learned that one internee had asked for compassion for the internees since Germans had not had enough to eat for thirty years. One day some Soviet officers came to stay with us for a short time, perhaps in February 1946. They seemed to know little English or German, but were assigned to "extraditing" men suspected of crimes against the Soviet Union. I recall that they took several.*

On a beautiful spring day, 13 April 1946, I was discharged from the army at Seventh Army Headquarters in Heidelberg, one of the few German cities of any size to have escaped heavy bomb damage. To celebrate my new freedom, I went rowing on the Neckar river. Before my discharge I had arranged to take a position in Frankfurt as a War Department Employee in the Civil Censorship Division, which censored German postal and telegraphic communications. I was involved in the censorship of telegrams. We worked in a damaged building next to the old Palace of the House of Turn und Taxis, which had been involved in the postal system of earlier centuries. This palace was in ruins, like so much of the center of Frankfurt. Many of my co-workers were trilingual, well-educated Danes. The work was pretty dull and consisted of going through stacks of telegrams looking for violations of regulations of the occupation authorities, notably in manufacturing and commerce, as well as checking names against watch lists of persons under some sort of surveillance or another. After about ten months with the CCD I found a far more interesting position with an historical unit, located in Höchst and later near the I.G. Farben building in Frankfurt am Main. The unit was engaged in translating into English accounts of the German military units which had been engaged in action against the western Allied forces. These histories were written for the most part by former members of the German general staff, but in one instance that I recall well I was given a long paper on the civilian German bombing losses written by Prof. Percy Schramm of the University of Göttingen. As I recall, official Allied estimates placed the number of deaths at something like 300,000, but Prof. Schramm presented evidence that the total must have been more like 800,000. A friend of mine told me recently that some of my translations are still on file in Washington archives. One of the generals who wrote for our historical research, General Günther Blumentritt, wrote so much for us that we joked about his having a case of "literary diarrhoea." In the historical unit I had the pleasure of working under and learning from two fine civilian gentlemen, a wise, witty and well-educated Englishman by the name of Rose and later a sophisticated South African by the name of Helmut Heitman. He had spent the war in Germany, to which he had come for treatments of a tropical disease just before the outbreak of the war. He was a good practical linguist who had been a court interpreter in South Africa. He seemed cynical about the flood of anti-German propaganda, even though he had been interned during the war. In the late spring of 1948 I was declared surplus from my position in the historical unit. I made some attempts to find another position, but my desire to remain in Europe was diminished by the growing and even ominous tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union. I did, however, make a trip to Berlin to be interviewed for a position there.

On 20 June 1948 the western Allies permitted German authorities to introduce a new currency in their zones of occupation to replace the old Reichsmark notes. This currency reform seemed to symbolize a new attitude toward Germany on the part of the British and Americans, but it was the pretext for the beginning of the Soviet blockade of Berlin. This cynically ruthless blockade, which continued for nearly a year, demonstrated to the world just how unscrupulous Stalin's régime was.

In Part II of this article I shall present my observations on a wide range of subjects which I could observe during 1945-1948 and on which I formed opinions and value judgements, either at the time or in later years on the basis of more information.

PART II

As a young American, during the years 1945-1948, I witnessed with sadness, anxiety and incomplete comprehension what I considered and still consider to be the greatest tragedy which has ever befallen Western Civilization, at least since the Thirty Years War (1618-1648). This tragedy of the wartime damage to Europe, as well as damage inflicted on Europe, especially Germany and eastern Europe, after the war has seriously impaired what might be called "the might of the West," to use a phrase employed by Lawrence R. Brown as the title of his important book (1963). The psychological and economic damage to Western Civilization, including the United States, continues to this day, as I observed in Bulletin 19 (republished in Liberty Bell of January 1988). Although I was young in 1945, I was well aware of the contributions of the German-speaking areas of Europe to the "might of the West" in such diverse fields as music, art, printing, theological thought, technology and the natural sciences.

In Part I gave an autobiographical account of my involvement in the Second World War, mainly my assignments in military service in Europe (1945-1946) and as a War Department Employee (1946-1948). I now turn to observations which I made in Europe during that time and my reflections on them, based not only on what I observed during 1945-1948, but also on a great deal of information which I have acquired during the ensuing years, information which was not available to me at the time. I also spent time in Germany during 1951, 1954, 1955, 1970, 1983 and 1986. During 1986 I interviewed a number of German historians and commenced correspondence with them.

In my perception, the conduct of the war and the occupation policies in Germany after the collapse of the German defense forces provide insights on the real motivations for the British and French declarations of war against Germany on 3 September 1939, declarations which converted the German-Polish war into a global war. In my view, these motivations were primarily economic. Even as of this writing, when there is more than empty rhetoric about German reunification, many a British voice has been expressing fears that a united Germany would strongly dominate the European economy. Let us summarize the evidence that the primary objectives of the war declared in 1939 were the economic elimination of Germany as a strong economic competitor, notably in the struggle for export markets, an intense struggle in the 1930s.

The war provided the opportunity to destroy German shipping and German factories, as well as the homes of those who worked in the German economy. (We might note here, however, that production for the German armed forces reached its zenith during the course of 1944, when it was becoming ever more apparent that Germany would be treated very harshly in case of its defeat.) Then there were the dismantlings of German factories and subsequent shipments of the machinery to the USSR, where it frequently rusted on the railroad cars by which it had been transported. These dismantlings took place for several years after the surrender of Germany in keeping with the spirit of the Morgenthau Plan. Perhaps even more important is the fact that the Allied authorities continued the principles of economic controls that had been in effect during the war when there was far less currency in circulation. During 1945-1948 I was a day-to-day observer of the results of the Allied control of the German economy. Frankly, I am not certain whether the economic policies of the Allied occupation authorities were a product of stupidity or were calculated to paralyze the German economy, but I strongly suspect that they were mainly the latter, from what I could observe.

As I recall, the prewar circulation of the Reichsmark currency totaled around RM 6,000,000,000., a rather modest amount for the size of the German economy. By the end of the war that circulation had been increased to about ten times that amount and within a rather short time the Allied occupation authorities had just about doubled that circulation by the issuing of the "M" series of notes that they put into circulation. A Jew of Lithuanian origin, Harry Dexter White, an official of the U.S. Treasury Department, saw to it that Russian authorities received the printing plates for the currency, which circulated throughout the four zones. (White later committed suicide when his loyalty to the USSR was revealed.) The Russian issues were, as I recall, distinguished from ours only by a small dash in front of the serial number.

In the face of this huge note circulation the old laws pertaining to wage and price controls were retained, at least in principle and largely in practice. This monetary situation resulted in a severe paralysis of the German economy. People had to stand in long lines in the hope of obtaining even just loaves of bread on the basis of ration coupons, which thus became the "money" that really counted. Such conditions wasted whatever economic strength that Germany had. Many desperately hungry Germans who had justifiably lost their confidence in the Reichsmark did what they could to obtain food, soap and clothing on the black market. This activity absorbed a great deal of time on the part of the civilian population, time and energy that could have been used to produce badly needed food and goods. The black market activity involved German city dwellers and peasants and American military personnel [as well as plenty of—as we now know, "gassed" and "resurrected"—Jews domiciled in U.N.R.R.A. Camps, who set up their "trading posts" at city street corners peddling American chocolate bars, Chesterfields, Luckies, and what-have-ye to us (nicotine)-"starved" youngsters at horrendous prices! —Editor, Liberty Bell]. It was bitterly claimed that German peasants were getting so rich that their only lack was Persian rugs for their stables, but this was rhetorical exaggeration in most cases. After some time the Americans were able to import privately items which had become the "currency" of the black market, such as cigarettes, coffee and cooking fats. They traded these favorably for jewelry, cameras, ornate beer mugs and the like. Packs of 20 cigarettes sold for as much as 100 Reichsmark or more, and the Allied notes could be exchanged at a rate of 10 cents for a Reichsmark, a gross overevaluation under the circumstances. While it is true that many Germans whose houses and personal effects survived the bombings used the black market to keep themselves from starving, they were living on their substance in an economy that was largely paralyzed by a lack of a realistically valued currency. It was not until the currency reform of 20 June 1948 that the conditions brought about by the enforced, continued circulation of the Reichsmark really changed, although its replacement, the Deutsche Mark, got off to a rather shaky start as a result of continued rationing and an understandable pessimism abut the future value of the new currency. As I recall, the new "German" currency in the western zones traded as low as about ten to the dollar in Switzerland during the summer of 1948. The chaos of the German currency system was vividly impressed on me on a streetcar one day. An elderly German woman was crying when she complained to a fellow passenger how she had saved her money over the years and was now experiencing its almost complete devaluation. Streetcars and trains were greatly overcrowded as a result of the fares, which were low in relation to the real value of the currency.

Since about 1870 the population of Germany expanded so much that it had to import food from overseas, as was the case with England and some other parts of Europe. During 1945-1948, for most German civilians the main economic problem was trying to live on the small amounts of food available on ration coupons. These amounts varied from time to time, from zone to zone, and from consumer to consumer, depending on occupation and ration class. Typically, during the first years of the occupation the ration coupons supplied only about 1000 to 1200 calories per day, and the quality of food was also not always especially good. American authorities eventually got around to sending a great deal of corn (in the American sense) into their zone. To Germans, "Korn" meant grain in general and they were not familiar with recipes for cooking corn, since very little corn is grown in a country as far north as Germany. I have seen some corn growing in little patches in Germany, but it is grown for fodder. I heard of some cases of German men who died from starvation in the American zone, but I believe that there were very few instances in which deaths could be directly attributed to starvation, as far as the civilian population was concerned, in contrast to deaths which occurred in considerable numbers amongst Germans in Allied prisoner of war camps, as the recent book by the Canadian author James Bacque, Other Losses has shown. (Other Losses was reviewed by Ernst Zündel in the November 1988 Liberty Bell and is available from Liberty Bell Publications, $30.00 postage paid.) The lack of food, fuel and soap increased the susceptibility to various diseases, of course, but with a notable exception. The food available on ration coupons included so little milk, butter, cheese, eggs and meat that the lowered fat intake is reputed to have reduced considerably the incidence of heart disease. Many Germans, it is true, supplemented what little food could be bought for very small amounts of money (as it should have been realistically valued) and ration coupons by some sort of black market activity or another, but black market activities were time-consuming and wasteful from the point of view of the economy as a whole.

A large number of Jews were living in Zeilsheim, a suburb of Frankfurt. Zeilsheim became well-known for large scale black market activity involving gold and jewelry.

While roaming around ruined German cities and witnessing the misery, poverty and humiliation of the German population, I frequently asked myself why Germany had fought on long after it was apparently doomed to defeat. The last eight months of the war had been especially destructive. No later than the liberation of France during the summer of 1944, if not long before that, perhaps as early as the conduct of American naval operations against Germany during 1941, quite some time before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, it had become obvious that Germany was doomed to defeat. Most Germans themselves with whom I talked did not seem to have a clear grasp of this matter and those who opposed National Socialism were all too ready to ascribe the costly continuation of the war to a selfish desire on the part of leading National Socialists to save their own lives as long as possible. As the years passed, however, I began to piece together what I had witnessed and what I later learned. The main motivations for the continued resistance would seem to have been the following:

1. By the autumn of 1944 Soviet troops were beginning to push into East Prussia, where they committed mass atrocities against German civilians, as they had been urged to do by the Soviet Jewish propagandist, Ilya Ehrenburg. A notable example was the East Prussian village of Nemmersdorf. The German army temporarily recaptured Nemmersdorf and reported what it had found there. Of course, such atrocities stiffened the German will to fight on, thus increasing the mortality of Soviet soldiers.

2. Many German officers thought that the western Allies would never permit the Soviet domination of Europe and hoped that they would continue to advance to the east after occupying Germany if German forces could hold out along the eastern front. This illusory hope was founded on false assumptions. The USSR had a backward economy that was incapable of competing on world markets.

3. There was a desperate hope that new weapons might turn the tide.

4. Wars have a tendency to continue by their own momentum as a result of national pride and other factors.

5. The unconditional surrender demand made in January 1943 by Roosevelt frightened Germans who remembered what had happened to Germany in 1919 ff.

6. At Yalta Roosevelt & Co. promised harsh punishment or even death to Germans in high governmental positions.

7. The Morgenthau Plan, which was initialed by the incredibly irresponsible Roosevelt in September 1944 and which would have brought about an at least partial genocide of the German nation, became known to the German government, which quite understandably publicized the information, just as it had earlier publicized the book by the Jew Theodore Kaufman, Germany Must Perish (1941) [available from Liberty Bell Publications, $4.00 + postage], which brought forth a plan for the genocide of the entire German nation by means of mass sterilization. (See the important article on the Morgenthau Plan by A. Kubek in The Journal of Historical Review, Fall 1989.)

The last three of these factors were political decisions on the part of the Roosevelt administration. They could hardly have been better calculated for the purpose of prolonging the war.

After the war there were still reminders of the last desperate defense efforts in the form of inscriptions that encouraged the war effort. There were stickers with the inscription, "Totaler Krieg — kürzester Krieg" (Total War — shortest war). Destroyed locomotives rusting on side tracks still bore the inscription, "Alle Räder müssen rollen für den Sieg" (All wheels must roll for victory) or "Erst siegen, dann reisen" (First attain victory, then travel). On a bombed house I saw the inscription, "Nur ein siegreicher Friede kann diesen Schaden beheben" (Only a victorious peace can alleviate this damage). On a wall in Frankfurt I saw "Frankfurt bleibt fest" (Frankfurt is going to remain firm).

Any American who saw Germany in 1945 was overwhelmed by the results of the Allied bombings, largely results of fires started by phosphorus bombs. Not only buildings were bombed, but railway installations and bridges were especially hard hit in an effort to paralyze the movement of goods. It is easy to understand how conditions in German concentration camps deteriorated under the circumstances. After all, the bombings created bad conditions for friend and foe alike. Amidst the ruins of many towns there were still huge air raid shelters with very thick concrete walls. I remember a particularly tall one in Mannheim and one camouflaged to look like a ruined building near the main railway station in Frankfurt. Even today, many of these huge concrete shelters are still standing as grim reminders of a desperate defense effort made nearly a half century ago. Something like one-fifth of the dwelling space in Germany had been destroyed and some towns (e.g., Düren) were almost completely destroyed. (To be continued.)

ACTION OR REACTION?

Separating the Wheat from the Chaff

By Travis Wayne

The tides of history and the events of man have been determined since the beginning to be either ACTIONS or REACTIONS. Understanding the past, present, and future is possible only if the observer can determine whether an occurrence was indeed an action or a reaction.

Americans have been conditioned to associate ACTION with aggressiveness, negativism, guilt; conversely, REACTION is associated with justification, naturalness, understanding. If the casual observer knows which classification applies to an event, he is able to form a viable judgment as to the positive or negative effect such an event has on his own existence or upon the existence of his people. If that observer's judgment is flawed, however, by the event being related to him as the OPPOSITE of what it actually was, then said observer's understanding and rationale are adversely affected; his ability to do any cognitive thinking will end until the deception has been corrected.

Many instances of an ACTION being presented as a REACTION, and vice-versa, are available for analyzation. The most glaring of these deceptions, intended to manipulate thought and opinion, always occur when a nation is no longer under the governing power of its own people but ruled strictly by special interests who have only their own welfare in mind. The terrible consequences of these deceptions are usually a blood-payment extracted from the ignorant victims of the manipulators. The best examples of nations so beguiled would today be England and, of course, the United States. Bear with me as I cite a few examples of these deceptions which have been quite disastrous, not only to specific nations, but to the Aryan in particular.

The Great Depression is understood by most to have been an ACTION, unexplainable, just one of those quirks of history that caused misery throughout much of the world. In reality, it was REACTION, caused by the manipulations of the super-rich oligarchy who feared the emergence of a strong and independent middle-class.

The German invasion of Poland in 1939 is taught to the dupes in all nations as an ACTION—an aggressive violation of an innocent nation's sovereignty, etc. The same may be said of the 1934 Nuremberg Laws passed by the National Socialist government of Germany, and denounced by the ruling elite in other countries as an unspeakable offense directed against the "innocent Jews of Germany." The TRUTH is that both of these "ACTIONS" were indeed REACTIONS to extreme provocation and deprivation, and were the responses of a nation threatened by destruction from without and within. The Hitler government itself originated as a REACTION, reflecting the disgust of a people forced to believe that their choice of existence had to be under Jewish capitalism or Jewish communism (for you "conservatives," capitalism and free enterprise are in now way, shape or form, the same thing).

More recently, the "great deceivers" in control of the U.S. media exercised their power to the detriment of the nation in another glaring distortion of TRUTH. In 1968, Arab freedom fighters/"terrorists" based in Lebanon and Syria would raid Israel, then go back across the border for safety. Of course, these sorties were the only means of retaliation to a brutal and repressive assault upon the Arabs by the Zionists. The raids were effective, however, and attracted the attention of much of the world. The Israeli response was to bomb and napalm Arab villages, violating the sovereignty of both Syria and Lebanon, as well as to step up their already brutal treatment of the Palestinians within Israel. Predictably, the U.S. media headlined this Middle-East tragedy thusly: "ISRAEL STRIKES BACK." The average Joe seeing this headline and reading the accompanying tripe, saw the Israeli killing as a REACTION—therefore, justified and worthy of his sentiment and of total American support.

On the other side of the world at about the same time, Viet-Cong guerillas were striking at the U.S. military from sanctuaries inside Cambodia, then returning to their safe havens. They knew American troops were forbidden to cross the borders from Vietnam into any neighboring country. This went on until Nixon ordered Westmoreland to go after the Viet-Cong and destroy their bases of operation. How was this incident presented to the American people by the same Jewish media that had so readily excused the Israeli excursions? The headlines read "U.S. TROOPS INVADE CAMBODIA"-a violent ACTION, American violation of a nation's sovereignty; the predictable reaction of the American "sheep":—burning the flag, demonstrations, campus riots, Kent State, national disunity. Why did the headlines not read "AMERICA STRIKES BACK"? Because this would have been supportive and unifying, something those in charge did not want.

These events show the power of the Zionist-controlled media, and how it has blinded most Americans to media duplicity as well as robbing them of the ability to interpret events and to then act in their own best interests.

Most recently, syndicated columnist Mike Royko devoted his article of 1/2/90 to the recent letter-bombings that took the lives of a federal judge and a black lawyer. Royko says that the evidence points to "white supremacists" as the murderers, and proceeds to tell us all over again about the evils of racism (White racism only, of course) and classifies the perpetrators as cowardly idiots with a malignant complex (my words, not his) who have the postal service do their dirty work for them. He uses the same column to extol the virtues of military Chief-of-Staff, Colin Powell, the mulatto whom Royko holds up as the average black. The columnist in effect asks his readers whom do they consider "supreme", the crazed White loonies or the ambitious, decorated "black" who has earned his way to the top of his profession. He intimates that the specter of Powell really must be frustrating to those terrible white racists, as Powell proves their convictions hold no truth. Royko, naturally, wants you to understand that the letter-bombings are vicious ACTIONS directed against the respectable of our society.

Well, if I may, Mr. Royko, let me say this: first, the acts may very well be orchestrated by the C.I.A./MOSSAD to satisfy the aims of the corrupt ruling clique in keeping their herd of ignorant servants in line (remember those slayings in Atlanta of black children, when national attention was focused on what was probably the work of some white racist hate-monger? When the culprit was discovered to be a black homosexual, my, how quickly the national media dropped the story!). That is certainly not beyond the realm of possibility and is more common than you might think (nobody can paint a better swastika on a synagogue than a Jew). Secondly, if you are correct, and White racialists ARE doing these things, those attacks are a REACTION, and definitely not an ACTION, as you and your cohorts portray them and want us to believe. The bombings are a REACTION to frustration at a system that has done absolutely NOTHING for White people for decades. A judicial system that frees black rapists and murderers because an all-White jury is incapable of rendering a verdict void of racial discrimination; legislation passed that uses the White man's money to subsidize food stamps, housing, preferential job hiring and contracts, solely for "minorities"; no effort or legislation to protect the White farmer from being raped by financiers who steal his income and his land; no politician with an open ear for complaints of abuse from White folks, but a myriad of these prostitutes anxious to bust their butts to prove their dedication to the welfare of any and all non-Whites. We see a White policeman in Dallas trying to arrest a black thug getting his gun wrestled away from him. We see that same black thug standing over the policeman, listening to the chants of a gathering of his fellow Ubangi tribesmen scream "Kill him! Kill him!", and we recoil in horror as the goon does just that, at the behest of his brother savages. No "racism" here; no federal marshals or FBI sent down to investigate any "civil rights" violation; no national outpouring of disgust or sympathy from talk-show hosts; no television documentary, a la the Howard Beach incident.

No, Mr. Royko, I don't think any White racial nationalist is the least concerned one way or the other about the abilities of your show-pig mulatto. Though I may not condone the tactics, if indeed they are being committed by my people, I certainly understand WHY they are doing it, which is more than I can say for you, apparently. It is the only way left to them to strike back (REACT) at a system—which, like it or not, you are a part of—bent upon the destruction of their people. This striking back is an instinctive REACTION to a threat to their very survival.

In conclusion, one must be aware of how the Zionists and their pimps manipulate thought and opinion by their classifying of ACTIONS and REACTIONS. If you have trouble with this, a good rule of thumb is, if the "Jew-S-media" or "Jew-S-government" portrays some crucial happening to you as an ACTION, it is, in all probability, a REACTION, a symptom, not a cause; and if they swear to you that something is a REACTION, you can bet that, most of the time, the TRUTH lies in the opposite direction. After all, what else can you expect from a deceiving, lying enemy, who knows that his continued dominance and control rests upon his ability to destroy YOUR capability to think for yourself? WHITE MAN, THINK AGAIN!

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. FOR MY LEGIONARIES. The Legionary Movement in Romania, commonly known as the Iron Guard, —perhaps the oldest anti-Communist movement in the world still alive—was founded by Corneliu Z. Codreanu in 1927. For My Legionaries (353 pp., pb. $8.00 + $1.50 for postage & handling), Codreanu's stirring work, is a complete and authoritative account of the ideals and principles of the Legionary Movement which shaped the character of young Romanians before WWII. Control over the communications media and the normal channels of book distribution by our international enemies makes it impossible to reach the broad market this unique book deserves. We are certain that For My Legionaries will soon become a collector's item. This book also provides the 'missing pieces' of the drastically censored The Suicide of Europe by Prince O. Sturdza, the identity of those who masterminded Romania's takeover and who are now engaged in carrying out the same program in the U.S. will no longer be unknown to you. ("Solzhenitsyn would appear to have not the slightest inkling of who conquered HIS country!" —B.C.) FOR MY LEGIONARIES, Order #06003, single copy $8.00, 3 copies $21.00, 5 copies $35.00

THE ANTI-HUMANS, by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb. $7.00 + $1.50 for postage & handling) describes what was done to the young men whom Cornelu Z. Codreanu, the founder of the Legionary Movement in Romania, inspired, when seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented 'Pavlovian experiment' on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti-Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. Reading it will be an emotional experience you will not forget. "A sequel to Orwell's 1984." —R.S.H. "A searing expose of Red bestiality!" —Dr. A.J. App). THE ANTI-HUMANS, Order #01013. LETTERS to the EDITOR

From the F... Family:

If you didn't get a Greeting from us, it's because I (that's me—JoAnn is more responsible) sent any. The past few months have been psychologically chaotic for me. I am gradually going brain dead. JoAnn was after me about sending out Greetings but she soon stopped as I threatened to eat all of her favorite fruit cake.

I stopped teaching last June. People who hate me say that I have retired. I am really on an extended leave and collecting Social Security benefits. This was done because I needed a massive amount of time to complete the upper floor in this old house. It was a large attic with one light and lots of dust. I stuffed in heating ducts, water pipes, drains, telephone lines as well as TV cables and electrical outlets. Then came the walls, sliding doors, closets, shower, sink, cabinets, lighting fixtures and carpets. I am still working on window frames using some decent old oak that someone saw fit to cover with a million coats of cheap paint. Paint removal is something else! [All this reminds me only too well of what I had to go through in trying to remodel a more-than-120-year-old farm house in the "sticks" of West Virginia, during the past 21 years! — Editor]. I was not too happy with the available removers, so I formulated my own concoction. It is cheap and really works. The paint falls off the wood only slightly faster than the skin and fingernails are removed from your hands. I used plastic gloves at first but after they started to rot, I then violated all of the safety precautions. I hope to be finished with the whole mess before Spring. I don't mind the sweat, bashed fingers, missing patches of skin, slivers and bruises. The thing that rally puts me in a mood to kill, is the crap that is sold as raw material. Junk fixtures, warped lumber, split panels, etc., that have insane prices pasted on them. I hired no one since I have yet to find a painter, carpenter, plumber or whatever that could work any closer than the nearest foot. I am not an artist in this sense, but I do know a perpendicular when I see one.

The teaching thing was getting too wearing. Each new generation is lazier and dumber than the preceding one. The 1989 SAT National Average Verbal score was 412!! Imagine...that is only one step above a high level baboon. In 1965, the same score was 503. In my case, I was saddled with a bevy of students who scored in the low 200s (psychologists label this a "moron") and was expected to teach them Trig and Advanced Algebra. This nonsense eventually drives out competent teachers which are replaced by lessers.....and so it goes.

The dog had an abscessed tooth which was removed for 12 dollars. This is cheaper than the local dentists, so I'll probably start seeing a vet myself. Is there a real difference?

Save your teeth. Avoid dentists. About 5 years ago, a dentist sent Carolyn to one of those "there's gold in them thar teeth" ortho fellows. Her lower incisors came in in all different directions. We heard the usual story about deformed faces, poor mastication and earthquakes. We could avoid all of those horrors by enrolling in a lengthy plan of wiring, pulling, pasting and poking, all to the tune of a lengthy payment schedule. After a discussion with a trustworthy and obscure West Coast dentist, we decided to let nature take its course. Lo and behold, the teeth straightened themselves out, much to the envy of Carolyn's metal-mouthed friends. Last year we got another horror story about bicuspids growing out of the roof of her mouth. We were sent to a specialist who then sent us to another specialist. Oral surgery was needed together with wire loops about the teeth to "pull them up", braces, patches, poking and X-raying, invisible reweaving, and a lifetime payment schedule. Carolyn wanted to see what would happen if we did nothing. OK kid, it's your face and you are a great big teenager now. Guess what? Horrible, late and screwed up teeth are now coming in straight as a die. I suppose that the huge dental industry can only be maintained by selling services that are usually not needed.

Carolyn loves horses and skis. I tried to get her interested in cheaper sports such as bird-watching and checkers, but it didn't work. She has an exuberant time falling down the slopes and getting frostbite. She rides in horse shows once in a while and proudly displays her Reserve Champion ribbon along with the several Blues. She also has a nice Math trophy for her 1st place in the State Sigma contest. She insists that she hates math. She placed 7th nationally and 1st state-wide in a French language competition. She has accumulated a nice collection of medals, plaques and certificates for her academic work and managed to win two scholarships at secondary private schools. The public school for this district is a cross between a revolving insurrection and a halfway house, so we were happy to enter her into a private school. She is being noticed by the young fellows now, but she has managed to filter out the hormone types, much to my pleasure.

JoAnn is still at her formal job (ain't womens' lib great?) trying to save the wayward from getting into confrontations with the law. The way society is going, she'll never have to worry about a lessened demand for her services. She still makes the best apple pies this side of Grandma Cole's and the great bread keeps me from getting too appealing to the younger ladies.

All sorts of interesting things ... a Canadian friend of mine invited me to a late lunch type of beer fest and introduced me to General Ernst-Otto Remer, the officer loyal to Hitler who rounded up those responsible for the bomb plot in July of 1944. He told several humorous tales about that period and concerning Goebbels, Hitler, and his capture and treatment at the hands of Rumanian Jews posing as American Officers. He is a very striking personality who holds his own with a beer stein, and it is easy to see why troops were loyal to him. Of course, the German side of WWII has never been told and the Hollywood version still parades about uncontested. Gen. Remer conversed mainly in German and I would have been at a total loss were it not for my good friend, who is also an Ernst. At one point, the General smiled and suggested that I learn German so that I could understand fully. I suggested that he learn English, but the suggestion was met with a smile and the statement, "Yes, but I am the General." My experience has led me to agree with Gen. Patton who remarked that the Germans were the only decent people left in Europe.

Merry Christmas and Happy New Year from all of us!

Yalta's 'skeletons' were 'removed from history'

Before Soviet glasnost exposes American crimes against humanity during and after World War II, Patrick J. Buchanan suggests that we bring our own skeletons out of the closet.

In his column of October 30, "What Comes After the Confessions?", Mr. Buchanan notes that in Potsdam the United States agreed to the expulsion of 16 million Germans from Eastern Europe, and that 2 million of them died. Having researched this whole matter in Poland in September 1946, and later in the German refugee camps throughout the year 1948, my conclusion is that the proper number of those who died on the way out is more like 5 million.

Just west of Gdansk [Danzig, an old German city. —Ed. LB.] within sight of the island of Westerplatte, I risked my life in September 1946 to witness an enormous concentration camp of Germans, none of whom ever reached the West. This prompted some systematic research.

In my still-extant files, I have certified statements by witnesses that 5,000 Germans were machine-gunned to death in one horrendous hour in the main stadium of Prague; and that every evening on the way from Prague to West Germany for as far as the eye could see the telephone poles were strung with human torches, as men, women and children burned alive. Pregnant women were systematically clubbed in the stomach until they aborted or died. Catholic priests were made to run the gauntlet until their sexual organs were clubbed into hamburger. Their crime? Simply that they were Germans.

When I brought all this documentation to the United Nations' headquarters in Paris, in June 1949, the American Embassy ordered me never to reveal this information to anyone: and the military government in Germany, where I was a student, expelled me from the country. Eyewitness accounts in books by those who fled were systematically removed from even the Library of Congress. The results of Yalta and Potsdam were simply removed from history, not only by the Soviets, but by the American government.

Mr. Buchanan is the bravest columnist in America. But does he really know what he is saying when he concludes his column with the words: "Let us go back to Nuremberg and complete the work begun there—and bring all the murderers to justice." The modern generation of German youth knows nothing of such things, nor does the American. Perhaps it is better that way.

Dear Landsmann:

I wanted to send you a little Christmas donation but, like most Americans, I was broke. At that, I am better off than the average American homeowner who has $20,000 in short term debt besides his mortgage. Anyway, I came into a few dollars and I am enclosing $20 as a New Years present to show my appreciation for your good work.

Dinkins [the new black mayor of New York] was hardly installed in office when the financial boom was lowered on him with front page headlines that NYC was bankrupt again. All the austerity being imposed by the Jew bankers is apparently to be blamed on him. Dinkins is an open black racist. Not one white man has yet been appointed to his administration, only Spics, Niggers and women, plus Jews in every area of finance. What is more disgusting, not one white group or newspaper has dared to protest this or even mention this. It is exactly the same as during the carpetbagger era of the old South. Whites pay most of the taxes but have no say whatever. Blacks are supposedly in charge but the real rulers are the Jews who get most of the stealings. Already they are making service cuts and talking of more taxes. The economy has been so bad that tax collections have fallen off sharply.

AIDS is doing wonders here. A new program to test the bodies of the dead derelicts (some 8,000 unclaimed bodies are found every year) has revealed that 53% of them had AIDS. None of these were counted in the past. A recent double suicide of two AIDS fagots prompted the head of a "Gay" organization to say that there had been five suicides among his members in the last month. Most of these were not counted as AIDS deaths either. The city health department revealed that 27% of AIDS deaths were Spic and 33% Nigger. Of the remaining 40%, I estimate, 35% were Jewish and 5% White. Over the holidays, every hospital in the city was jammed full with emergency rooms having 800 patients laying on stretchers in the halls. Nobody dares complain that 20% of city hospital beds are now full of AIDS filth. Just now there was a big outcry when a Spic AIDS baby was refused admission to a hospital and died at home. But what could they have done for it at the hospital? The kid was three years old and already had been in the hospital 19 times. It was brain damaged and both its parents had already died of AIDS. A Texas legislator commented that appropriating money for AIDS treatment was pouring it down a rat hole and that AIDS carrying male prostitutes should be killed. Big outcry about this, but this is the opinion of roughly 90% of White men. In the future, such opinions will harden into action as the pressure on us continues. We owe AIDS carriers nothing but a bullet in the head and a can of gasoline to burn their bodies. I can feel compassion for victims of the plague, but they must be quarantined at once to prevent the spread of the disease. Anyone deliberately spreading the disease deserves to be killed at once. But I can applaud the Liberals' policy of no quarantine and no testing. It is allowing the plague to spread to every Jew, Nigger, Spic and faggot in the nation and will kill them all. So far it shows no signs of spreading to Whites except through injection and blood transfusion. As for a cure from the Jew-ridden medical racket, forget it. The two main anti-AIDS drugs are simply chemotherapy, the most worthless and vicious of all cancer treatments.

Amazing how many moral problems are clarified by taking a racial outlook. Abortion is a vicious crime for Whites, but for blacks it is a blessing and a public benefit. I wish they would all have abortions. And Jews too. Israel has 30,000 abortions per year. A toll greater than Hitler ever inflicted. As a matter of public judgement on the relative merits of black and white, White babies are worth from $10,000 to $30,000 to childless White couples, while black babies clog the orphanages and are thrown in the trash bin.

I wish you a Happy New Year. The 1990s are going to be the decade of AIDS. Up to now the disease has just been nibbling. Now it will take big bites.

Incidentally, a Jewish publication of B'nai B'rith reveals there were only 3,600 Jews in Panama but they owned 90% of the stores looted by Noriega's trash militia. They are demanding $1 billion in compensation from the US government! Any bets on whether they'll get it?

Sincerely,
S.R., New York State

Dear Mr. Dietz:

Enclosed is a gift along with my book order.

I am new to White issues, and I have grown quite fond of my White race and its many heroes. I just regret the great divisions of our people. If only we could get our minds off of petty issues and focus on the major issues of our race and its survival.

I know of no one in my area who shares my views. I've never met a Klansman or a "Nazi" or any other racist, but I share their pride. I have run across many racist publications but Liberty Bell is my favorite. Keep up the good work.

C.H., Westminster CA

* * * * *

Dear Mr. & Mrs Dietz:

Hope both of you are in good health and in some way enjoyed the recent holiday season. You certainly make many lives more enjoyable through your efforts with Liberty Bell. I thank you for your time, effort, and expenditures. May the enclosed donation help you in some way.

I see now that we had a famous fighting company of niggers in the civil war, on the Yankee side, naturally. Isn't it amazing what modern "historians" can come up with in the way of information that was hidden for decades, even centuries, from previous chroniclers of the past? I've even learned that Hannibal was a nigger, that there wouldn't have been any cattle drives in the Old West if not for the huge contribution of nigger cowboys and also that nigger combat units distinguished themselves through heroism in both World Wars! I can tell you, I'm certainly better off and more well-informed now that modern historians have enlightened me.

Keep up the good work. Maybe your "research staff" can dig something up to go into the Bell concerning our overwhelming debt to the niggers for their immeasurable contributions to our past! I'm sure it would be enjoyed by everyone!

Dear George and all the Liberty Bell Family:

Enclosed please find a contribution to your extremely important work of saving our White Race and spreading the truth. All Liberty Bell authors, especially Revilo Oliver, are excellent, and we have gotten much helpful information from your magazine throughout the years. When we read Liberty Bell, we are continually reminded to be very proud that we are German. Thanks very much for all your sacrificial efforts on behalf of our benighted race.

My best to you and your families. For our White Race and Truth,

E.S., Missouri

* * * * *

Dear George:

The very best wishes to you and yours for a prosperous and healthy new decade—I see that once again it's LB renewal time. Please deduct the cost of another year's subscription from my contribution, which is enclosed.

The last few issues have been excellent. The more Professor Oliver contributes the better the issue. Mr. Carter's recent articles on "Minorityism" were quite pertinent to current events. Many savages use the excuse of oppression to justify their attacks on civilized people. I feel this will translate into more frequent and more vicious attacks. Of course, the legal and judicial criminals will have to work harder to ensure that the murdering savages are set free to continue their lifestyle. Wouldn't it be terrible if the predators were locked up and quit being a source of income for the legal and judicial criminals.

The natural drives of savages are being deliberately enhanced in order to spread more terror and destruction on society, as well as to enhance the incomes of our Executive, Legislative, and Judicial parasites. Motorists are often harassed by packs of savages while driving through a town near my parents, something that was unusual (except during the "King Years") until recently. I have heard of many recent examples of such behavior and my impression is that the savages are indeed getting restless, ready to really raise hell.

Unprepared, soft civilians will be unpleasantly surprised in such an event. The well-known incident in Miami, when a White woman was beaten to death and a rose placed in her mouth by rampaging Congoids shouting "get the honkey!", will be a familiar sight for many who will wish it wasn't so.

Preparation will benefit those who have the intelligence and ambition to get ready for the inevitable. Confused and angry Aryans will crave effective leadership. Such a time may be our last chance .

Upon such events depends our chance for survival. The success of "respectable Conservatives," who temporarily protect us from some symptoms of decay, will not benefit our people. I would rather see a coalition of obvious Congoids and mongrelized bandits in elected positions, as they will hasten the showdown. Postponement only weakens us.

The spread of the African Plague will probably help us, provided not too many innocent people, such as the lady doctor in New York who was infected in 1983, are forced to pay with their lives for the alternate lifestyles of queers and dope addicts.

We should hope for the best, but prepare for the worst. Individual preparations will vary, and should be done in secrecy. Intelligent planning will pay dividends.

The chances for German re-unification seem good, regardless of Jewish apprehensions. Maybe the media shysters will produce another blast of lies about baby-roasting or lampshade factories to combat these feelings of nationalism. The Jews sure dislike the Republicans [the Republican Party in Germany].

That's about it for now; I hope you and Mrs. Dietz continue to enjoy good health necessary to perform your services to thinking Aryans.

Hail Thor!

F.G., U.S. Army, Europe

Dear Mr. Dietz:

Thank you for the reminder that my subscription is a bit overdue. If I ever had to cut back on the literature I subscribe to, your's would be the last to go.

The four articles by Zündel, Stuart, Tyndall and Schmidt give a much needed perspective on the events in Europe that is impossible to obtain from our controlled press.

Reading about the events in Germany, and especially Tyndall's analysis of history, reminded me of some graffito I saw on a wall a while back. "Destiny—the fact that no matter which road you take, you will arrive where you are going." As Tyndall stated, two World Wars, tens of millions of White lives and Germany is back where it is supposed to be: the center of gravity in Europe. England paid for its stupidity with the loss of her empire and Americans paid by losing control of their destiny to a bunch of Asiatic aliens from Eastern Europe.

Enclosed the cost of my sub renewal and some extra for your work. Also some addition to the above for four issues of January 1990 Liberty Bell so I can give them to friends.

Sincerely,
T.K., Alaska

Dear Sir:

I have just sent you a money order to renew my subscription, the balance is a donation.

Here in Europe we are witnessing the rapid collapse of Communism, which had kept half of our continent in subjection and things look more promising now than they have in a long time. Much success for the Nineties!

Yours Sincerely,
P.L., Netherlands

Dear George:

Enclosed is a money order for a 1st Class renewal...

The events in Europe and the Soviet Union give us hope, but I figure "democracy" has been such a good money maker and indoctrination tool for the Jews that they are exercising the preferable option for their aggrandizement. You can bet that they will be the middlemen between the U.S. and the eastern bloc and that part of the deal will be a suppression of "anti-Semitism."

If Germany, once reunited, can be such a powerful economic force that the U.S. can be aced out along with our Jewish control, perhaps Europe will have a chance. If this happens, of course, we can expect another war with the U.S. and Israel against Germany and perhaps the Soviet Union. —We shall see...

Sincerely,
M.B., California

ABOUT THE AUTHOR: Dr. Revilo Pendleton Oliver, Professor of the Classics at the University of Illinois for 32 years, is a scholar of international distinction who has written articles in four languages for the most prestigous academic publications in the United States and Europe.

During World War II, Dr. Oliver was Director of Research in a highly secret agency of the War Department, and was cited for outstanding service to his country.

One of the very few academicians who has been outspoken in his opposition to the progressive defacement of our civilization, Dr. Oliver has long insisted that the fate of his countrymen hangs on their willingness to subordinate their doctrinal differences to the tough but idealistic solidarity which is the prerequisite of a Majority resurgence.

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor/publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavour to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of our Western culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change, or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

Recollections and Reflections of an American Veteran

By

Charles E. Weber

PART III

In what happened to Germany and Japan after they laid down their arms there lies a striking anomaly. Germany was a nation with Christian traditions and a European intellectual development. It was racially similar to its adversaries, at least its western adversaries. Japan was not only different in these respects but had attacked the United States in a manner which could hardly have been better calculated to provoke a desire for revenge. Japan, however, received far more lenient treatment after it laid down its arms. It was not divided into four zones of occupation nor its territory (as of 1930) greatly reduced, nor a large number of its people killed during massive expulsions of its populations. Even its soldiers who surrendered probably received better treatment than disarmed German soldiers on the whole. The Japanese head of state, Emperor Hirohito, was allowed to continue his reign.

How did this anomaly come about? Were these differences a result of different attitudes on the part of Generals Eisenhower and McArthur toward their defeated enemies or were directives for Germany and Japan from Washington of a different nature? If so, was Germany considered at that time a greater economic threat, so that German productive capacities had to be severely limited? The status of Austria was still another matter. Austria was considered to have been a victim of "aggression" and received milder treatment, even though it was also divided into four zones of occupation, like Germany. The Germans had a bitter joke about this situation: The Austrians had only one Nazi and they sent him to us. (On attitudes of Austrians toward National Socialism, see John M. Ries' review of the book by E.B. Buckley, Hitler's Hometown: Linz, Austria, 1908-1945 in the Journal of Historical Review, Fall, 1989, pages 380-383.)

After the end of hostilities General Eisenhower continued to command American occupation forces in Germany for several months. Eisenhower showed little compassion for the defeated German nation and was no doubt responsible for at least some of the decisions on handing over German soldiers and others who had fought against Communism to the Russians, the infamous "Operation Keelhaul," one of the most stupid acts (if not one actually disdainful of American interests) done by American authorities in Germany. Eisenhower's attitudes toward Germans were in spite of his German name with an Anglicized spelling, or perhaps even a result of it. As is well known, General Patton, the great American commander of armed forces, became much more sympathetic with the German population, but he was killed in the American Zone in an automobile "accident" on 21 December 1945. There is evidence that General Eisenhower had a personal hatred of Germans, but I do not rule out the possibility that this hatred was feigned for the purpose of furthering his career and to have earned the amazingly rapid promotions which he had been given. These rapid promotions were pointed out by Robert Welsh in his bitterly critical book on Eisenhower published in 1963, The Politician. After all, much of Eisenhower's career had extended through the years of the Roosevelt administration. (As to the question of Eisenhower's merits as a military officer, see U.S. News & World Report of 1 September 1986, pp. 28-41, "Ike: Overrated Warrior?" (Reviewed in our Bulletin No. 6.)

For some time after the war American soldiers were forbidden to "fraternize" with the German population, although there could hardly have been any real military danger from their doing so, since there was virtually no underground resistance to the Allied occupation after the organized German armed forces had laid down their arms. The real reason for the prohibition was more likely the fear that "fraternization" would have given Germans the opportunity to neutralize some of the anti-German indoctrination and propaganda to which American military personnel had been subjected. A few weeks after the war in Europe, American forces evacuated Saxony and Thuringia, of which Saxony had particularly important mining and industrial resources. These areas were served on a silver platter to the Communists, with whom Eisenhower had been so sweetly fraternizing. Approximately one half of the area of Germany (as of 1937) came under Soviet control.

On the whole, the behavior of the American soldiers toward the German civilian population was pretty decent and in some cases even chivalrous, and that in spite of the fact that American military personnel had been subjected to rather energetic anti-German indoctrination and propaganda in various forms, including indoctrination and training films. In addition, the American media—especially the film industry—gave very effective support to the war effort against Germany, quite in contrast to the rôle of the American media during the American participation in the war in Vietnam.

There were, however, distressing exceptions to the general behavior of American soldiers in Germany during the months following the surrender of the German armed forces. I recall that during the time when I was stationed in Kornwestheim I encountered a crude, stupid truck driver who boasted that he had killed Germans with his truck. In fact, the incidence of automobile accidents was very high on the part of American military personnel and I was myself almost killed by poorly disciplined American drivers. After the war (!) some 90% of the sculptures by the famous artist, Arno Breker, were destroyed by American soldiers.* On 13 September 1945 the distinguished composer, Anton Webern, was shot by an American soldier near Salzburg.

I had the impression that attitudes of American soldiers toward the German population varied considerably with educational and social levels of their family backgrounds. In well educated families there was usually an awareness of German cultural and scientific achievements, a factor which no doubt moderated the attitudes of soldiers from such families toward the defeated Germans. Many American soldiers from humbler backgrounds felt that Germany was, at least in a material sense, closer to the United States than any other country in which they had been previously on duty, most notably England and France. It has been observed, probably correctly, that American soldiers from the southern states were the most sympathetic with the plight of the Germans and it has been suggested that this was a result of historical circumstances, namely the fact that areas from which they had come had been subjected to a harsh occupation ("Reconstruction") after the surrender of the Confederacy in 1865.

The harsh conditions imposed on the German civilian population (not to mention the German prisoners of war who were detained for long periods in camps), especially during 1945-1948, were essentially the result of directives from Washington and the resultant continuation of the very harsh policies toward Germany that developed under the Roosevelt administration. These policies included the demand for unconditional surrender of Germany which Roosevelt made as early as January 1943, an irresponsible act which was bound to strengthen the German will to resist and thus to increase the danger to lives of American soldiers like myself. Roosevelt's readiness to sacrifice American soldiers for political aims was not only manifested in the demand for unconditional surrender. It has been claimed, I believe correctly, that Roosevelt could have saved lives of many soldiers and sailors by providing them promptly with information available to him on the coming attack on Pearl Harbor, but that he deliberately allowed an even greater toll of American military personnel *Letter dated 23 January 1990 from B. John Zavrel, President of the Arno Breker Society International, Inc. During recent years Mr. Zavrel has made repeated attempts to learn about the circumstances of this incomprehensible destruction of important works of art. In extensive correspondence with the Central Intelligence Agency Mr. Zavrel appealed for the release of a report dated 8 April 1947 concerning the matter. He cited the Freedom of Information Act but thus far the CIA has withheld the information sought by Mr. Zavrel, as if great secrets vital to the defense of the United States could be contained in the report.

in order to set the stage for a vigorous war effort and to justify his previous policies toward Japan, as well as to open a "back door" to war in Europe. I am strongly inclined to agree with Prof. Revilo Oliver's assessment of Roosevelt and his designating Roosevelt as the "Great War Criminal." During 1943-1946 I served in the armed forces of the United States and followed orders, but I had no enthusiasm for the war and distrusted the conduct and objectives of the war, so much so that I was interrogated on this matter when I was in intelligence training camp in Camp Ritchie. My doubts about the conduct and objectives of the war did not distinguish me from many American soldiers, however. Even Roosevelt's chief military lackey, Eisenhower, complained that many of the American soldiers to whom he talked had no real conception of the aims of the American involvement in Europe.

Attitudes of Germans toward National Socialism, even during its most successful years, when it was undoubtedly very popular, had never been especially simple and unvaried. (See my comments in Bulletin No. 33 on Phillip Jenninger's famous speech before the Bundestag in November 1988.) Attitudes on the part of various components of the population also varied, on average. (See my review of O.E. Remer's Verschwörung und Verrat um Hitler in Bulletin No. 11, page 4.) The central factor in the attitudes of Germans toward National Socialism after the war was undoubtedly the fact that Germany had suffered a terrible, indeed catastrophic, defeat under the National Socialist government after desperate and costly defense measures which demanded great sacrifices.

The western Allies undertook a vigorous program of "Denazification" in the form of trials for "war crimes," compelling all adult Germans to fill out lengthy questionnaires under the penalty of perjury, automatic arrest categories, dismissal of former members of the NSDAP from their employment and having German authorities examine former NSDAP members for the purpose of putting them into specific categories of "guilt" by special courts ("Spruchkammern"). "Denazification," after all, was based on a cynical disregard of an important legal principle going back to ancient times and embodied in our own Constitution, Article I, Section 9, where ex post facto laws are prohibited.

This process of political reëducation caused bitter divisiveness amongst Germans. Defeat is an orphan. The terrible horrors of the final months of the war caused many a German to remark with resignation, "Lieber ein Ende mit Schrecken als ein Schrecken ohne Ende." (Rather an end with terror than a terror without end.) I recall a sort of joke which was making the rounds and which went something like this: Who is hardest on former National Socialists? The Russians? No. The British? No.

The French? No. The Americans? No. Well, who then? The Germans themselves!

An ironic poem also made the rounds amongst those who had disliked National Socialism or who claimed that they had. It went something like this:

Wir waren alle in der Partei,
Wir waren überall dabei,
Wir schrien stets und laut "Heil Hitler!"
Wir waren alle große Profitler,
Wir nannten den Führer ein höheres Wesen,
Doch Nazis sind wir nie gewesen.

(We were all in the Party, we were with it everywhere, we cried steadily and loudly, "Heil Hitler!", we were all great profiteers, we called the Führer a higher being, but Nazis we never were.)

When former members of the NSDAP were tried by the Spruchkammern they frequently presented what became known as "Persilscheine." Persil is the brand name of a widely sold laundry detergent, so "Persil coupons" were attestations that the defendants in question had not been such bad people in spite of their membership in the NSDAP and that they were "clean." Obviously, too, the "Denazification" process also presented opportunities for personal vindictiveness and other abuses.

Although I was myself involved in the "Denazification" process during my military service, notably when I worked in Internierungslager 75 in Kornwestheim during 1945-1946, I found myself tormented by the question of whether or not I would have joined the NSDAP if I had been a German man born in the early years of the century. If I had been, I would have witnessed the defeat of my homeland, the humiliating loss of German territory and overseas colonies, the partial Allied occupation (mostly west of the Rhine), the severe limitation of German defense forces and the economic chaos during the time of the Weimar Republic, namely the hyperinflation of 1922-1923, and the massive unemployment during 1930 ff. Many Germans saw in National Socialism the only possible path to a restoration of decent economic conditions and a restoration of national dignity by overcoming the conditions created by the Versailles Treaty. Then, too, many foreigners were favorably impressed with Germany when they came to see the Olympic Games in 1936. No less a person than the Prince of Wales, the future King Edward VIII, manifested admiration for developments in Germany. The Munich agreement on the Sudetenland in 1938 even gave foreign recognition to a need to revise the terms of the Versailles Treaty.

The war which England and a somewhat hesitant France declared against Germany on 3 September 1939 left Europe physically deeply scarred, psychologically demoralized, economically depressed and politically largely enslaved to brutal Communist governments. During the course of the following years England, France, the Netherlands, and Belgium lost their overseas empires except for remnants. Militarily, National Socialist Germany had been entirely crushed by overwhelming numbers and resources in spite of its determined defense. Today it seems that the most significant heritage that could be derived from National Socialism would be the will of the Aryan nations to survive culturally and racially. It is reasonable to assume that the besieged Aryan component of the population of the United States will become ever more aware of the National Socialist heritage as it struggles against ever greater forces aligned against it, forces which will severely test its capacity to survive in any sort of meaningful way. Furthermore, it is also reasonable to assume that National Socialist Germany will be reëvaluated by future generations of Aryan Americans in spite of all the shrewd, well financed efforts to denigrate it.

I have in my reference library a rather large book (247 pages, 23 1/2 x 17 cm), So lebten wir... Ein Querschnitt durch 1947 (That is the way we lived... a cross section through 1947). The book was published with the permission of the Military Government in December 1947 by the Scherer-Verlag in Württemberg in a printing of only 5000 copies. This book was written by a number of German authors on such topics as the status of the Saar area, the Soviet Zone, Berlin, the black market, student life, the attitudes toward the National Socialist past, prisoners of war still in Allied camps, refugees, the status of German medicine, and the currency question. The chapter on the status of German prisoners of war, of whom there were still many in captivity as late as December 1947 (pages 144-152) [my elder brother, captured in April of 1945, was not released from a Soviet prisoner of war/slave camp until November 1949! —Editor], is of renewed interest in view of the revelations by the Canadian author James Bacque in his recent book, Other Losses [available from Liberty Bell Publications, $30 postpaid], which has caused a sensation in Canada. Thus far we have encountered reviews of Other Losses in Christian News (4 December 1989), GANPAC Brief of November-December, Instauration of January 1990, Liberty Bell of November 1989, and Unabhängige Nachrichten of November 1989, where it is stated that a German edition has already appeared under the title, Der geplante Tod. □

MUST WE BE FOR EVER INFERIOR?

We will never recover from the British disease, says John Tyndall, until we learn to tell causes from symptoms

NEW YEAR'S EVE 37 years ago was a day that I shall always remember because it was my first day ever on foreign soil. An eighteen-year-old national serviceman, I had just finished basic training in the Royal Artillery and had been posted to my service regiment in Hohne, West Germany.

Wearing one's country's uniform abroad was an experience which, for me at any rate, served to concentrate the mind on the larger issues and priorities. Up till that time I had never had any doubt that Britain was a great nation, perhaps the greatest of nations. It was still then possible to talk of the British Empire in the present tense. Casting one's thoughts over the whole panorama of human endeavour back across the ages, it was difficult to think of any race whose achievements had excelled our own. Finally, had we not, just a short time ago, emerged victorious from a war, as we usually did? I was now in the land that had been defeated in that war, and the army to which I had belonged was one of its conquerors and occupiers.

Rather naive and over-simplistic thoughts, the reader will probably observe. Indeed they were, but they were the thoughts of a youngster still in his teens, not as yet very well informed as to the realities of the modern world, but of ordinary healthy patriotic instincts. Such thoughts, I hasten to add, did not seem at the time any reason to strut and swagger, least of all to act in an overbearing manner towards the locals. But they did, I believed, provide ground for a quiet pride and self-confidence, for an inner feeling that we were the inferior of no nation and needed to bow to none.

How spectacularly the world picture has changed since that time!

Germany, the vanquished and conquered nation of those days of my youth, has risen from the ashes and surpassed us in almost every field you care to name. Britain, one of the 'victorious' powers of World War II, has experienced 37 years of defeat and degeneracy on nearly every front. The verdict of the war has been entirely reversed. Germany and Japan are the victors in today's world. And their wartime adversaries and post-war overlords? Apart from our own sickening decline, we have seen the steady erosion of American power, as that country has lapsed into economic insolvency, the total collapse of internal order and irreconcilable racial division. More recently we have seen the Soviet Union beginning to come apart in a wave of nationalist unrest coming in the wake of decades of economic incompetence and political corruption.

But it is the condition of Britain that should occupy our minds the most because we are British. Our record, beside that of the nation over whose defeat our leaders and opinion-moulders gloated in 1945, has been pathetic, and it was amply exposed by Graham Turner in the Daily Mail of the 8th January. In an article headed 'Why do the Germans live better than us?' the writer put the spotlight on the spectacular differences in economic performance between our two nations over the past 30-odd years, pointing to West Germany's £50 billion trade surplus last year by comparison with Britain's £20 billion trade deficit, with £8 billion of this with West Germany itself.

According to Turner, it is expected that this year the latter deficit will rise to £11 billion. What is more, he said:—

> ...it is in areas where the performance of our own manufacturing industry has sagged most alarmingly—engineering and motor vehicles—that the Germans are advancing. Last year, for example, the German motoring industry earned a surplus of £25 billion abroad, while our own made a trading loss of £6 billion.

A fact which, of course, is well demonstrated when we drive along our roads, littered as they are with Mercedes, Volkswagen and BMW cars and Mercedes and MAN lorries—with no corresponding presence of Austins, Rovers, Jaguars, Leylands or ERFs on the roads of Germany.

As to the causes of this superior German performance, Turner went on to list a number of factors. The first was hard work. "The devotion to work as the central cause of human fulfillment," he said, "is certainly still deep in the German psyche. He then quoted a production manager of a chainsaw factory as saying:—

> 'Our workers do have a very high commitment. If one of our machines breaks down, they will stay till eight or nine at night to mend it—and they do that without us even having to ask them."

"Doing a perfect job," said Turner, "requires intensive training, and:—

> ...the Germans have a passion for training unequaled in the western world. The latter stages of their educational system are a massive machine expressly designed to churn out the skills which are essential for companies who want to sell highly-priced goods overseas.

> Seventy per-cent of all German youngsters spend three years [in on-the-job training in an office, bank, or trade shop of their choice, to acquire the practical knowledge and experience necessary for their chosen trade, which is supplemented by two days of theoretical training at vocational schools or Schools of Commerce —Editor, Liberty Bell] to learn a trade or skill. Nor are these schools the lowly-regarded institutions of last resort they so often are in Britain 'with teachers who feel themselves to be second-rate and students who regard themselves as inferior,' as Hartmut Mattees, a teacher in a Stuttgart school, found when he visited Britain.

In addition to having an education system miles ahead of our own when it comes to training young people for aptitude and success in the modern world, the Germans (like the Japanese) also channel far more investment into new technology and industrial modernisation than does Britain. These facts Mr. Turner amply demonstrated in his article, and then mentioned a further one, perhaps less widely known. The Germans, he said:—

> ...also have a secret weapon which we signally lack: an entire population which is fiercely critical of the goods and services it buys, will accept nothing less than the best and is vociferously angry when it does not get that perfection.

The article concluded with a quote from a Daimler [Daimler Benz—maker of the unsurpassed Mercedes Benz motor cars. —Editor, Liberty Bell] shop steward, who said:—

> 'We are now the best. That is in the workers' hearts here, and we are proud of it.'

To which the writer added his own postscript:—

> Justly proud too, and until we are prepared to apply ourselves as the West Germans have we shall remain one of their industrial colonies.

SO WHAT'S NEW?

All of the foregoing will, of course, be greeted by the nodding of many heads, but just where does that lead us? Thousands of articles along just the same lines as Mr. Turner's must have appeared in hundreds of newspapers, magazines and trade journals in Britain over the past 20 or 30 years in which Germany's superior economic performance has become increasingly evident. All the factors in this superior performance have been extensively discussed in our country, so that there really is no longer an excuse for any moderately well informed person here being ignorant of them. One or two additional factors are not so extensively discussed or known, and we highlighted one of these in December when we reprinted a chapter from the book The Money Bomb, by James Gibb Stuart, [see Liberty Bell, January 1990, page 15] in which the author pointed out that the German economy started in 1945 from a position of being debt-free by contrast with our own, which was in pawn to the international bankers. The importance of such a factor should not be underestimated, but it provides nowhere near a full explanation of German superiority, which is primarily due to the factors mentioned by Mr. Turner and listed in much the same way by countless other British writers and analysts over the years.

And the fact is that, notwithstanding all this evidence, nothing has changed. No British remedy has been adopted. We have not, in this country, applied our abundant knowledge of the reasons for the Germans' and Japs' success and our own failure to any effective scheme of action to put things right.

And this is the reality despite all the plentiful Thatcherite rhetoric on the subject. At the beginning of the Thatcher decade we were promised so much in the way of enterprise, energy and initiative to improve things in Britain. We were promised a veritable revolution that was going to rejuvenate our industry by getting rid of old habits of sloth, inefficiency and outdated practices. We were even told—and for several years many believed—that this was actually happening, that British industry was making a dramatic recovery in performance, that we were closing the gap between ourselves and our rivals.

Now, ten years later, all this can be seen as pure illusion. We are still stuck back at the starting blocks while our rivals remain miles ahead of us. The grand economic recovery was just a figment of Mrs. T's imagination—made plausible by the propaganda skills of Saatchi & Saatchi. It has been like the much-heralded campaign to clean up the country's filth and untidy town centres—always something that was about to happen but never actually did happen, the object of grandiose plans and projections but never a visible reality.

These things—along with immigration controls, a tightening up of law and order and the preservation of the British sovereignty in the face of the bureaucrats and regulators of the EEC—have been part of the Santa Claus world in which dwell the publicists of the Tory Government—hallucinatory drugs to keep the brute masses happy and prevent them asking too many awkward questions.

To summarise, despite plenty of knowledge as to what has to be done to get Britain moving, there has been absolute paralysis when it comes actually to doing it. Seen against the background of this reality, what many have thought to be the causes of our decline may be recognised as nothing more than symptoms. To penetrate through to the underlying origins of the British disease, we must dig much deeper.

MASTER RACE?

Hitler believed the Germans to be superior to other peoples and, not entirely surprisingly, such a belief was bitterly resented outside Germany. In the East, the Japanese, at the same time, developed their own theory of racial supremacy along similar lines. This, too, was understandably resented—and, of course, equally hotly repudiated.

But the snag of all this resentment and repudiation is that in the years subsequent to World War II the rest of the world has so far done nothing to prove such theories wrong. Quite the contrary, despite overwhelming military defeat and destruction (the result, it might be added, solely of greater weight of numbers and firepower and not of any superior fighting prowess), the Germans and Japanese have turned the tables on their conquerors and succeeded in the post-war years while the latter have failed. And the more dogmatically asserted the post-war 'democratic' doctrine of universal race-equality the more thoroughly that doctrine has been contradicted by the peerless achievements of the Germans and Japanese in rebuilding their countries and attaining world economic and technological hegemony, while their wartime adversaries have become steadily weaker and less competent.

The big question arising out of all this is: is such obvious superiority a genetic one, or does it have other causes?

These days, to venture into discussion on the question of whether one race is genetically superior to another is to tread, in Britain at least, on dangerous ground—something I myself know a little about as I have served a term in jail for just such a crime. I can, however, at least say this much without fear of further imprisonment: I know Germany well and am convinced that such genetic differences as exist between its people and ours are very minor ones. Both Germans and Anglo-Saxons are sub-divisions of the same basic Northern European racial family. Both contain Nordic majorities and both harbour a substantial Celtic element—though in the case of the Germans this is less generally known than in ours. The majority of Germans, if they were to walk down a street in this country, would not be identifiable as foreigners, and the same would be true of Britons in Germany. I was struck by the physical similarity of Britons and Germans when a young soldier in Germany at the time earlier mentioned, and if physical similarity does not automatically indicate mental similarity it does at least indicate the strong possibility of a similar genetic mental make-up, particularly when it is known that the parties concerned have similar ethnic origins. This is not to say that a different environment and upbringing may not result in a differing form of mental development.

When the environment and upbringing have been the same, Anglo-Saxons and Germans have not shown any marked variations in aptitude or performance. This can be seen by the comparisons between people of British and German stock mainly born and brought up in the United States. In intelligence tests conducted among American servicemen in World War I those of British descent did not score less than those of German descent. Among the ranks of great American achievers, Anglo-Americans and German-Americans are represented about equally in proportion to their total numbers. Interestingly enough, although the United States has over 50 million people of German descent, this section of the population has not produced one single great composer—although Germany, together with Austria, has produced at least fifteen.

Donald Day, North European correspondent for the Chicago Tribune before and during World War II, said in his fascinating book Onward Christian Soldiers:—

> Many Germans cannot understand how it was possible for the extremely large German element among our (America's) immigrants to become assimilated into American life so thoroughly and so quickly. As a boy I recall how in Chicago the city was proud it had almost half a million Germans among its inhabitants. They were certainly by far the most cultured element among our foreign-born population... They had pleasant homes and lived in clean surroundings... But this German element, like the Scandinavian element, did not organise its own schools. As in other American cities with similar settlements such as Milwaukee, St. Louis and Indianapolis, the Germans and Scandinavians sent their children to American schools. And within two generations the German newspapers, turnvereins and other social organisations disappeared completely.

THE IMPRINT OF HISTORY

Here what Day seems to be hinting at is the fact that the Germans, while genetically similar to Anglo-Saxons, have developed a culture and way of life that are profoundly different in many respects, the difference stemming from diverse intellectual and political development which, in their turn, are perhaps the consequences of very dissimilar geography and history. The Germans, a land people of continental Europe, have always lived close to external danger and been subjected frequently to external conquest. In the Thirty Years War, in the Napoleonic Wars and in the two World Wars of the present century, they have known catastrophe, death and suffering on a scale that is quite outside the British experience and comprehension, and such adversity, as Nietzsche said, when it does not destroy, makes one stronger. The British, by contrast, a maritime people on the European periphery, have obtained relative protection from the same upheavals, largely by reason of their peripheral position but also by reason of the Channel—a much more formidable strategic obstacle in past times than it is now. Also, during the past three centuries, we British have had access to a whole vast new world across the oceans in which our racial energies could be absorbed and in which, for most of the time, such conflict as we experienced has been with primitive peoples with whom we could easily deal.

Not for many centuries has Britain had disputed borders with any continental European power, whereas over the same centuries Germany, and her constituent states, have had them constantly.

Graham Turner, in his Daily Mail article, gave an example of the stimulus given by suffering in German history when he said:—

> The reasons for Germany's staggering industrial success are clear enough. The first, quite simply, is terror: the terror of millions of men and women who lost everything in 1945, who had neither beds to sleep in nor food to eat and who yearned to regain their former status. Eleven million came from the East in two years, and the trickle in the decades which followed has become a flood again.

He went on to quote a German sociologist, who said:—

> 'Every one of these refugees has given a very dynamic impulse to our economy, and all of them have passed on to their children the importance of being diligent because of a fear that they might lose everything again.'

But, of course, all this only amounts to an affirmation of what has become a constant throughout so much of German history: familiarity with hardship, with life in the raw. By such experience people 'grow' mentally and spiritually. Mr. Turner might have expanded his theme a good deal further: rather than dwell merely upon the impetus this experience gives to individual drive and ambition, he could also have stressed its effect on the collective consciousness, giving rise to institutions and social convention much more urgently geared to the needs of group survival. Here we can see a marked difference between the German and Anglo-Saxon concept of individualism. To the German mind, individual qualities are resources to be used in the service of the community, while individual is seen to be valuable just to the extent that it provides the individual with time, opportunity and latitude to give full flower to his talents in pursuit of communal objectives and interests. In the Anglo-Saxon concept, on the other hand, individual freedom is seen as a self-justifying end, while society, state, law and government are visualised merely as necessary evils, accepted to the extent that they are required to serve the individual, and no more.

Likewise, with the German and Anglo-Saxon concepts of nationhood. In the first, the nation is seen as a community linked by blood and by a mystical force of common destiny. In the second, it is an institution of convenience, established for the mutual self-interest of so many millions of individuals who happen at any time to inhabit a geographically defined area. This Anglo-Saxon concept of nationhood, derived as it is largely from the now discredited 18th Century 'Enlightenment', has been taken to the four ends of the earth by British migrants who have opened up new continents, and is today the bedrock on which such states as the USA, Canada, Australia and New Zealand are founded. In South Africa it governs the thinking of the English-speaking population—which provides one of the reasons for the vast psychological divide between this people and the genetically similar Afrikaners, whose history is founded on struggle and whose concept of nationhood owes much more to German than to British sources of inspiration.

This very basic cultural and intellectual divide accounts in no small part for the different responses of our two peoples, British and German, to the seductions of 'democracy'. While Anglo-Saxons have fallen for this swindle with the infatuation and wonderment of children grabbing at presents from the Christmas tree, to Germans the democratic form of government and society constitutes just one among numerous theories of politics, to be evaluated, along with each other, on grounds of utility. For a large part of their history, Germans have not embraced democratic institutions—for the practical reason that they did not see them as providing the kind of leadership and organisation required for survival. And at those times when they have embraced them, as today, they have done so against the background of a cultural tradition very different to that of the Anglo-Saxon. Generally speaking, this culture has been a strong and disciplined one, shaped by adult perspectives gained from experience of the storms and stresses of history—by contrast with the Anglo-Saxon culture, which, with all its virtues and attractions, is a relatively 'laid-back' one, and possessed of considerably less maturity.

Thus does the person of German stock born and raised in an Anglo-Saxon cultural environment become an Anglo-Saxon in almost all but name. By contrast, such people as Houston Stewart Chamberlain and Winifred Wagner (nee Williams), transplanting themselves into a German cultural environment, become almost "more German than the Germans."

SUBSTANCE AND FORM

The racket which operates under the name of 'democracy' has in the case of modern West Germany been imposed by the Allied occupation forces as a consequence of the German defeat in World War II, just as its predecessor of Weimar was imposed through defeat in World War I. Anglo-Saxon 'democracy', on the other hand, is the product of much deeper cultural forces stemming from national history and development. In the second instance, democratic institutions represent something of substance, no matter how shallow and flimsy the substance may be. In the first, they represent merely form. An infantile 'democracy' functioning against the background of an adult culture will be largely a procedure of 'going through the motions', whereas the thinking applied to vital public questions will still bear the marks of the adult culture underlying the process. It is for this reason that contemporary German 'democracy', with all its undoubted faults and abuses, never descends to quite the same silliness as British or American 'democracy', under which debate is at the level of the kindergarten and political behaviour assumes the quality of vaudeville.

Though the forms of 'democracy' and 'liberalism' are currently prevalent in West Germany, the underlying culture of the older Germany still survives strongly, with its impassioned will to excellence and its intolerance of the sloppy, the lazy and the second-rate. Not only is this seen in the German attitude to economic activity, to care of public and private places and to education of the young, it is even seen in the field of sport, where today the combined achievements of East (Central) and West German athletes and gamesplayers put the rest of the world in the shade. Why does this happen? Even if there is some genetic cause, this would not account for the wide gulf in standards between German sportsmen and others of Northern European type. The difference is, of course, that the Germans simply try harder and have a stronger desire to win!

We see a particularly stark example of the immense divide between the British and the German mind when we look at the question of organisation. We are accustomed to looking on the Germans as very able organiser, but is it not really a case of different attitudes towards the whole principle of organisation as such? A mature and disciplined culture is going to be one that recognises the necessity for organisation and planning as essential factors in getting things done properly, and this, ipso facto, is going to produce plenty of people who are capable organisers. Before aptitude in the arts and skills of organisation must come acceptance of the organisational ethos. Some strange inhibition in the Anglo-Saxon psyche (no doubt conditioned by the drivel we read which passes for political philosophy) seems to recoil from the idea of organisation except for the most trivial of purposes—or the idea of intensity of effort except in pursuits of the same kind. Is this difference genetic? I think I have already given evidence that it is not. It can only, therefore, be seen as a difference of response to differing national circumstances. If we accept the dictum that necessity is the mother of invention, we may conclude that the necessities of Germany's history have given birth to the ethos of national organisation for national survival—together with that of effort and struggle towards excellence. By contrast, we in Britain, and today in other Anglo-Saxon countries as well, seem to be governed by the view that "few things matter and nothing matters very much."

Returning to the question of the work-ethic, it could be that Graham Turner has got this matter a little out of focus as a factor determining differences in German and British economic performance—at least in recent times. Certainly the Germans worked much harder than we did in the couple of decades following World War II. It is doubtful that they do today, at least in their places of employment. They most assuredly are worked harder at school and at university, and for better purpose, with the result that they join the nation's workforce much better qualified in economic skills. That, rather than hours registered on factory clocks, is the probable reason for the far superior German record. On the other hand, German managers most certainly do work harder—but could that not be because German managers in industry are of a generally superior type? In Britain we have a habit of sending our brightest and most ambitious young people into the occupations that are of the least importance in making for national prosperity and success. We probably have the best lawyers, the best stockbrokers, bankers and financial consultants, the best classical students and the best actors and actresses in the world today. But that does not get us very far in making the products that give a country strength and power!

THE CULTURAL CLASH

But it is not only in the fields mentioned that the vast differences in German and British standards manifest themselves to the discredit and shame of our own country. I have touched on cultural factors in as much as they determine attitudes to work and to organisation for work. But when we are speaking of culture we are speaking, of course, of a sphere which includes the arts—indeed in which the arts are central. The Germans have long been acknowledged as the most highly cultured people in the world, even by those who dislike them, but is there any special reason why they should enjoy a culture so much superior to our own?

And superior it most certainly is! This was highlighted in an article by Denis Vaughan titled 'Music to make us all lager louts', which appeared in the Daily Mail on January 9th. The writer compared Germany's 102 opera houses with Britain's six, and referred also to the ten opera houses and 21 symphony orchestras in Munich alone, a city barely a sixth the size of London.

The chief theme of Mr. Vaughan's article was the effect of music on a nation's social and moral behaviour, and his lament—which I thoroughly share—was that our country was almost totally under the spell of the most barbaric and moronic forms of 'pop' music, a fact which he thought was not unconnected with our being at the top of the European league for the portion of the population in jail. He said:—

> The power of musical therapy has long been known. In ancient Greece it was used to still belligerent people in their tracks; today it is in constant supply, but its effect on general behaviour is rarely considered.

And he went on to say:—

> At a recent run-of-the-mill concert in London, a friend was making his vocal debut at the Marquee. It was impossible not to be struck by the behaviour of the listeners. The huge volume of the music, the mechanical hammering of its rhythm, its sheer physical impact and total lack of nuance left an audience to trail out at the end in a state of complete mental stupor—drugged, numbed and impervious to feeling.

And later on, in contrast:—

> Germanic appreciation of the arts is not just a popular pastime but a national habit and tradition. And German society suffers much less from the hooliganism and 'lager-loutism' it sensitively refers to as the 'British disease.'

The use of the term 'British disease' here is interesting, for have we not for twenty years or more heard the same words employed to describe our poor performance at the workplace? But the common phraseology linking social behaviour with attitudes to work should not be regarded as coincidental, for here are just two manifestations of a national sickness that are closely interwoven, as they are interwoven with others. Putting it in the most basic of terms, we have been allowed to become a nation of slobs, a rabble whose tastes in music reflect its general standards in nearly everything. We have suffered a decline in international strength and power and we have lost an empire, not through some natural stroke of misfortune decreed by the gods, nor because of any inexorable law which must then wane, but because we have become no longer fit to be a great people. And this is not—at least up till the present—the result of any significant genetic decline in the race; it is because we have no leadership, and no institutions able to produce leadership.

Mr. Vaughan has drawn attention to the high status of the arts in Germany, and by this he means contemporary 'democratic' Germany and not just the former 'autocratic' Germany. Here is a classic example of what I have said earlier about the imposition of a traditional culture upon modern political norms. For centuries, German and British governmental attitudes to cultural questions have been fundamentally different. The German approach, rooted in the authoritarian societies of the older Germany, has always been that it is the duty of the state to promote high cultural standards and to act as the guardian of cultural values, with the aim of raising the cultural level of the population by its leadership and example. The British approach, rooted in much longer-standing 'democratic' and 'liberal' institutions, has been essentially a laissez-faire one: culture and the arts, like everything else, should be left to 'market forces'. If there is a demand for high culture, commerce will respond to it and undertake supply. If there is a demand for drivel, commerce will respond to that too, and supply accordingly. And the supply will be in exact proportion to the demand. The latter, of course, according to British thinking, is something that government should not dare to do anything to influence—for that would be a violation of the individual 'freedom of choice' which is part of the national religion, even in the event of such freedom of choice amounting to choice of banality, trash and dirt.

As a result, while being the racial cousins of the Germans, and therefore probably with similar genetic cultural potential, we are a nation with an infant culture whereas they are a nation with an adult culture. This, much more than contemporary forms of government, shapes the enormous divide between the quality of their life and the quality of ours. And it is generally true that the same infant culture prevails in other predominantly Anglo-Saxon countries to which we have exported our way of life, norms and values. Finally, it must be reiterated, people living in those countries who are of German descent are no less vulnerable to the effects of this infant culture than others.

One could almost say that this was what World War II was all about. It was Beethoven versus Boogie Woogie. And Boogie Woogie won, as every such culture will when the contest depends on who can mobilise the larger mobs and tell the bigger lies.

NEMESIS AND HOPE

But that status-quo brought about by the temporary triumph of mob force and mob values could not endure. That which was rotten at first base was bound to crumble. Now, as the Berlin Wall comes symbolically down, we see the falling apart of that whole world which mobsters set up in 1945 and the years following. And in the meantime, those cultures founded on adult perceptions and aristocratic ideals are having the last laugh over their former conquerors, as they rise resurgent, in the West as in the East, to nullify the result of the war fought "to make the world safe for democracy."

It is perhaps appropriate to end this article by returning to the point at which it began: my thoughts as a young British soldier posted abroad for the first time and wanting to believe I belonged to a country of which one could be proud. In middle life I still harbour the same sentiments, hopes and dreams. But the experiences of the intervening years have convinced me that this can only become possible by means of revolutionary upheaval, a revolutionary upheaval that makes Mrs. Thatcher's 'revolution' seem like the bourgeois garden party it has always been. The real revolution that we need must come from the Right—let there be no mistake about that. But it must be the authoritarian Right and not the 'free market' Right of current prevalence. It must not be a revolution that, in Mrs. Thatcher's words, will "roll back the frontiers of the state," it must be a revolution which, for the first time within long memory, establishes a state that will really govern. It must be a revolution which, instead of chanting asinine slogans about 'people's power', gives power to an elite with the courage and the wisdom to lead the people towards higher ideals and better standards, to transform the British race from a rabble into a nation, animated by discipline, duty and patriotism, dedicated to hard work and high culture, and characterised by energy instead of sloth. It must be a revolution of the mind as much as of the political system, for it must be one whereby the British learn to be serious. To use terminology that has been used before, what we need is a nation with an adult perspective towards the world in which it lives—a nation that rejects, in absolute totality, everything that is meant by liberalism.

To this there will be those who will reply: "What about freedom?" To them I would say that at times when a nation is heading for ruin and collapse and is being beaten by its rivals at every turn it is not the appropriate moment to be yapping about 'freedom'; what has to be done must be done to turn that nation around and point it in the direction of recovery and resurgence, so that it has the chance to survive and prosper again and to walk the world in honour. Then, and only then, when the augean stables have been swept clean and a climate has been established in which people, by natural self-discipline and self-restraint, conduct their lives in accordance with a code conducive to national strength and advancement, can we talk about 'freedom'. Ultimately, there is only one freedom worth having, and that is the freedom to do what is right for one's people.

Of course, there will be many who will reject such radical proposals, being as they are so enamoured of the slack old ways, the muddle, the disorganisation, the paralysis, the second-rateness, the undemanding ideals—in a word, everything they have been taught to identify as 'England'—that they will refuse to travel with us along the road that we have signposted. It is all too, too extreme!

Well, if that be their wish one can only say that they must be prepared, in consequence, to be citizens of a nation well along the way to joining the despised serfs of this world, fit only to be kicked and insulted, possessing nothing of their own, the inhabitants of a social jungle and an economic museum, given up to the morality of the curs and the culture of the ape.

I think those many who died on foreign fields wanted something better. □

HITLER WAS RIGHT!

by

Colin Jordan

[Editor's note: The following essay was written by Colin Jordan in 1989 in connection with Adolf Hitler's 100th birthday. Unfortunately, we were unable to accommodate it in our special 20 April 1989 issue of Liberty Bell.]

Never in all history has a man been so vilified as he whose centenary of birth occurred on the 20th of April 1989. According to the mass media of today's democracy, he was an absolute monster, an insane incarnation of evil. However, the very fact that he is presented as so totally black, with nothing at all to his credit, should excite suspicion in anyone other than an utter idiot or some partisan blinded by prejudice.

The vilification was not always total as now. Lloyd George, British premier during World War I, after a visit to Germany in 1936, was quoted in the Daily Telegraph of 22nd September of that year as stating: "I have never seen a happier people than the Germans. Hitler is one of the greatest men I have ever met." In a letter to a friend in December of that year he said: "I only wish we had a man of his supreme quality at the head of affairs in our country today."

Viscount Rothermere, in his pre-war book, Warnings and Predictions, said of Hitler: "He has a supreme intellect.....He has thoroughly cleansed the moral, ethical life of Germany.....No words can describe his politeness.....He is a man of rare culture. His knowledge of music, the arts and architecture is profound." The iron curtain of lies completely descended when the elements intent on destroying Hitler became virtually omnipotent, knowing that they had to do this or they would be shown to be wrong and Hitler to be right: for he stood for Aryan renaissance, and they for an old order spelling decline and death.

The real Hitler, contrary to the mad monster of the media, was a most talented and very widely read man with a phenomenal memory, an exceedingly quick grasp of essentials, a colossal willpower, along with, of course, being the most effective orator the world has ever known: all this in the service of a cause to which he gave himself completely. He was also a charming host, a considerate and loyal friend and colleague, kind to animals, highly appreciative of the beauties of Nature, simple in his style of personal life.

Becoming imbued in his teens with a consuming sense of mission as the liberating leader of his people in the future, he knew poverty as a young man amid the unemployed of Vienna, and danger and hardship in the frontline trenches as a soldier before joining the tiny political body which under his direction was to become the power-winning NSDAP. Night after night his captivating words brought applauding audiences from a defeated and demoralized nation to their feet in new-born hope and determination. His vocal and visual inspiration, plus the plentiful perspiration of his ardent and industrious followers, constituted the means of National Socialist success, not the mythical money-bags of big business as opponents try to make out to explain away their own inferiority in charisma, ardour and effort. As the saying had it in those days, respecting the last of these three factors, the lights always burned later in the night in the offices of Hitler's party than in those of any other.

Exhibiting the burning enthusiasm and sheer hard work: "During one month prior to national elections in 1930, for example, the Nazi Party sponsored 34,000 meetings in Germany, which averaged out to be three meetings in every village, town and urban neighbourhood." (Mothers in the Fatherland, Claudia Koonz, p. 69) Typical of the receptive spirit of the people during the 1932 elections, NSDAP Press Chief Otto Dietrich described a meeting at Stralsund, scheduled for 8 p.m. but for which Hitler was long delayed, finally reaching the place at 2:30 a.m.: "In the open air, and in the pouring rain, we met the crowd drenched to the skin, weary and hungry, just as they had gathered over the night and patiently waited.....Hitler spoke to the audience as day slowly dawned....." There they were, 40,000 people eagerly listening at 4 o'clock in the morning—after all that time and all that discomfort—to the man they rightly regarded as their political saviour! Can you imagine such a turnout for such a trumpery figure of the twilight as our present premier, Margaret Thatcher?

Just try to picture the tremendous scene of rejoicing when the long hard years of struggle were rewarded, and at the end of January 1933 Hitler became Chancellor! For hours that night a river of fire flowed past his window as thousands upon thousands of his torchbearing party comrades paraded through the streets of a reborn Berlin. The above mentioned Claudia Koonz quotes a longstanding NSDAP member regarding that occasion: "We wept with happiness and joy and could scarcely believe that our beloved Führer stood at the helm of the Reich..... A magnetic power radiated everywhere and eliminated the last traces of internal resistance..... We were gripped by an inexpressible joy when we saw our banners, once scorned and belittled, flying high on all public buildings." (p. 132)

Our thesis is not and does not have to be that Adolf Hitler was absolutely perfect and never made a single mistake, for perfection, absolute perfection, is an irrelevant abstraction which belongs not to this world, and accordingly never has and never will be seen here. What precisely we do say here is that, taking everything into account, the man and his movement in championship of our race, was the closest to perfection that this world has ever seen so far, and that is enough for us. We proclaim him right because where he is said to have gone wrong is, in our estimation, so massively dwarfed by where the opposite is true. Given but six short years of peace, he, his party and his people in unison wrought a virtual miracle in that brief span. Never elsewhere in history has so much been done for Aryan survival and revival so quickly!

Hitler was right in the supreme importance he attached to the factor of race, and, consequently, his basic conception of the nation as a racial community to be protected in its ownership of its homeland, and from interbreeding with alien stock; and, furthermore, to be improved by eugenical measures. Beyond any other statesmen in any land at any time, he gave practical recognition to the superior qualities of the Aryan peoples and the need to maximize the higher holders of those superior qualities as the golden means for human upliftment. In this unique dedication, and, consequently in the bitter opposition of all those with a vested interest against the elevation of the Aryans lies the greatest single explanation of the drive to destroy and defame him.

Hitler was right in his opposition to the disruptive party game of democracy which exists to delude and to exploit the people it pretends to represent, and in his belief instead in personality and leadership and unity. In such a fusion of the folk as he achieved, where stood the need for parties other than his? Only a minute minority remained against him after 1933, although the hostile foreign media concentrated on this fragment of discontent, and not on the almost total support he received.

Hitler was right in holding and ensuring that every man in the folk community should have productive employment for the benefit both of himself and that community. When he came to power, no less than 6,014,000 were unemployed, yet by 1938 only 338,000 remained out of work; the vast bulk of this reduction being achieved before any significant rearmament, contrary to hostile propaganda.

Hitler was right in believing in extensive social welfare for all members of the folk community. The NSDAP's "Strength through Joy" organisation had by 1938 enabled over 22 million to visit theatres, over 18 million to attend film performances, over 5 million to attend concerts, over 3 million to attend factory exhibitions, and no less than 50 million to take part in cultural events. The organisation had 230 establishments for popular education, and through it 62,000 educational events were arranged, being attended by 10 million people. By 1938 490,000 had been given sea cruises, and 19 million had been given land excursions. 21 million had taken part in sporting events. All this at a time when the democracies left millions of unemployed to rot, and those who were employed received nothing remotely comparable to such welfare. The best-selling car in history—more than 15 million of the Volkswagen "Beetle" in over 30 countries—resulted from Hitler's project of a people's car, a small inexpensive car for the ordinary man. Connected with this, his Autobahn construction-programme preceded Britain's by decades. (This and other detailed information on the stupendous achievements of Hitler's Germany is contained in the book Hitler Germany by Cesare Santoro (Berlin, 1938).

Hitler was right in the importance he attached to the protection of the peasantry as vital to a thriving folk community, his measures to this end including the legislation for hereditary holdings. Indeed, Hitler was right in so many major ways we would need far more than the whole of this Hitler centenary double issue of Gothic Ripples to catalogue them.

Hitler's revolution accomplishing all this radical reform was a bloodless one compared with either the French Revolution (whose 200th anniversary occurs this year) or the Russian Revolution of 1917. Camps for the concentration of detainees—including women and children—were introduced by the British during the Boer War, and conditions in them were so bad that a great number died. Britain's wartime ally, Russia, still has concentration camps galore in which, according to even Soviet statistics, a million people are currently held. Yet it is only the German ones we endlessly hear about with every conceivable invention and exaggeration. Colin Cross in Adolf Hitler (Hodder & Stoughton, London, 1973) puts the peacetime peak at 26,789 in July 1933, many being held for only a matter of weeks, and most being subsequently released, and says:

"Conditions in the camps were spartan but, by prison standards, there was an adequate diet and reasonable accommodation in dormitories." Inmates were not, as so often insinuated, all poor persecuted Jews or other heroes of democracy, but included the very dregs of society: habitual criminals, pimps, perverts, despicable drunkards, perpetual beggars and work-shy parasites.

Jewish leaders in the outside world proclaimed economic and political warfare against Hitler as soon as he came to power, and set themselves to bring about a war to destroy him. Not unnaturally, therefore, when that war came about, Hitler considered Jews in general in his territories to be enemies and a threat to security, and so he had them rounded up and placed in ghettos or camps. During the final stages of the war—when Germans were enduring the most terrible conditions themselves, including hundreds of thousand of civilian men, women and children slaughtered in air raids such as that on defenceless Dresden—adequate supplies were either unavailable or failed to get through to camps overcrowded by evacuation from the east, and typhus raged, this accounting for the undeniably terrible conditions found in some of them at the end of hostilities, which were, however, certainly not the result of any deliberate policy of extermination, which allegation is an atrocity of falsehood.

After the war the campaign to denigrate Hitler focused on the allegation that 6 million Jews were deliberately exterminated at some of the camps during the war, mostly by gassing with the standard delousing fumigator, Zyklon B, which was certainly in general use in the camps and other places as well for its proper purpose off preventing death (by disease), not causing it. The super-sob-story of mass extermination of Jews in gas chambers has been decisively shown to be a colossal lie by the Leuchter Report, a report by America's leading consultant on the gas chambers in American prisons who, at the arrangement of Ernst Zündel, for the purpose of his recent retrial in Canada, visited Auschwitz and took samples from the structure of the buildings alleged to have been gas chambers which, after submission to independent analysis in the U.S.A., showed conclusively that they were not so used. Incidentally, the recent admission by the Russians themselves that over 30 million were exterminated by Stalin, Britain's and Jewry's ally against Hitler, makes the Jewish allegation against Hitler small in comparison to this very real Red Holocaust.

Returning to the Germany of the 1930s, we can estimate Hitler's greatest conquest as that of the hearts of his people, for his was the most popular regime the world has ever known. His Germany was a land electrified and transmuted. Never, anywhere at any time has a whole nation been so radiant, so disposed to service as was his under his leadership. In their millions the German people daily acclaimed Hitler as right.

Hitler was right in seeking to rectify the iniquities of the Treaty of Versailles, and to unite German territories. His actions received the overwhelming support of the populations concerned. When he entered Vienna 200,000 Viennese packed the city's Heroes' Square in an ecstasy of rejoicing at what the anti-Hitler propaganda machine in Britain called an "aggression." He was similarly welcomed in the stolen territory of the Sudetenland in the synthetic state of Czechoslovakia. Hitler tried hard and long right up to and including the very last days of peace to reach a thoroughly fair settlement with Poland regarding the latter's German areas and inhabitants, the port of Danzig (90% German), and the detached territory of East Prussia; but this has been deliberately obscured by the deceitful Western warmongers, Britain giving a thoroughly reprehensible general guarantee to the backward state of Poland to make its reactionary regime unreasonable and bellicose, and so to bring about the desired war.

Hitler was right in the importance he set on an Anglo-German alliance which he long strove for. With it, the combination of the British Navy and the German Army could have kept the peace of the world, preserved the British Empire which Hitler greatly valued, and served as the core for a world order of the white man safeguarding that white man by world supremacy. The British Ambassador in Berlin recorded on the 26th July 1939: "From the very beginning Hitler has always sought above all an understanding with Britain." (Vansittart in Office, I. Colvin, P. 346) Indeed, a point where Hitler went wrong was when, in persistent pursuit of an Anglo-German agreement even then, he waited after the defeat of France and the debacle of Dunkirk for Britain to come to her senses, whereas, if he had invaded in July 1940, he would almost certainly have succeeded.

Hitler was right in his conception of a New Order for Europe, conforming to ethnic realities in preference to geographical and other demarcations conflicting with those realities, and his encouragement of co-operation to common benefit, and of unity corresponding to common aims.

Hitler was right in forestalling the intended Russian attack, planned to take advantage of the European war, by launching his own attack first in June 1941, accompanied by the European crusade against communism which he sponsored; and, had it not been for the immense material aid given to Stalin by Britain and the U.S.A., he would have undoubtedly crushed Stalin and eliminated the Soviet menace which today is only masked by the sly tactics of Gorbachev, designed to soften up the West. As it was, we today owe it to the gigantic effort made by Germany and her allies (including all the foreign volunteers of the wonderful Waffen-SS), and encompassing the desperate defensive fighting right up to May 1945, that the Red Army did not break through to Calais, and today with the KGB stationed at Dover, Durham and Dundee.

Let it be remembered with high pride that never has a cause been fought more valiantly to the utmost than the National Socialist cause of Adolf Hitler. In the battle for Nuremberg, scene of the greatest rallies the world has ever seen: "German civilians, men, women and youths, armed themselves to stand alongside the SS in bitter street fighting in which the veteran American 45th 'Thunderbird' Division suffered heavy casualties. The fanatical SS detachments defending the infamous Nazi Congress Hall, which Adolf Hitler called the heart of Nazism, flung back nine bloody US assaults before dying to a man." (The Spear of Destiny, Trevor Ravenscroft, P. 335; Neville Spearman, 1972.) These were our people! In Destination Berchtesgaden (Ian Allan Ltd, London, 1975), J.f. Turner & R. Jackson describe the rigours of the advance thusly:- Aschaffenburg: German reinforcements arrived, "many of them fanatical youths of 16 and 17 who refused to surrender and had to be annihilated." Schweinfurt: "Every small town and village on the road to Schweinfurt was fortified, every hill and wood occupied by the enemy for as long as possible, often by fanatical Nazi youths." Würzburg: "Once again, civilians joined German troops in defending their home town, retreating into the sewers and often appearing in the Americans' rear."

In flaming Berlin heroic remnants of the foreign volunteers of the Waffen-SS, Europe's elite, fought to the last and died defending the neighbourhood of the Reich Chancellery and the bunker where Adolf Hitler gave up his life; and while other heroes of the Hitler Youth, some only 14, succeeded in holding the bridges over the River Spree till the very last. With blood sacrifices like this as the nutrient, National Social- ism's potency to survive and revive was assured.

If there is any certainty at all in this world, it is that, if ever a real champion of our folk emerges, he will be denigrated to the utmost by the forces of ruin. So it is that it is precisely those in Britain today who are most responsible for her present ghastly condition who are most responsible for the denigration of Hitler. Those who are damaging us the most are precisely those who denigrate him the most: that is the great equation.

Hitler was right in his denunciation of democracy; this we indeed ought to know now by our own experience in Britain today. Bruce Anderson in the Sunday Telegraph (29th March 1987) said of Britain's Afro-Asian invasion: "The voters were never consulted: if they had been we would have had no large-scale coloured immigration." So whereas Hitler's dictatorship gave the people what they wanted, and preserved Germany for the German people, Britain's democracy gives the British people what they do not want and calls it "freedom".

Hitler was right in his prophecy of the darkness which would follow his defeat. As we take stock of the whole range of evils from which we currently suffer, from recurrent strikes to the mugging of elderly ladies, from drug peddling to the promotion of perversion, from subsidies to the coloured world to the degeneracy known as "rock", we take note of the fact that Hitler would not have allowed us these blessed refinements of democracy. We also take note of the fact that projections of the present coloured birthrate in Britain show that within a hundred years we will be a minority in our own country. Not even the most maniacal opponent of Hitler has ever accused him of wanting to make Britain black. It has been left to those opponents to bring about just that.

National Socialist resistance did not cease in 1945. One epic figure from the war who refused to renounce his belief in National Socialism, and maintained close contact with National Socialists world wide until his death in 1982, was Hans-Ulrich Rudel. This German flying ace held a world record for 2,530 combat flights, and another for 519 enemy tanks destroyed. Single-handedly he sank the Soviet battleship Marat and 2 cruisers, as well as 70 supply boats. His motto was "Verloren ist nur wer sich selbst aufgibt" (Only he who gives up loses").

Another stalwart from the old days was Winifred Wagner, English-born daughter-in-law of the great composer, Richard Wagner. After the war a de-Nazification court convicted her of the crime of actively supporting Hitler's regime by having been his personal friend. For this terrible offence she was sentenced to 450 days special labour service, her personal wealth was confiscated, she was forbidden to hold any public office or become a member of any political party for five years, and she was even banned from owning a motor car. Nevertheless, when interviewed in a film in 1975 by those who tried in vain to get her to express some rejection of Hitler, this magnificent lady rounded on them with the consummate remark: "If Hitler walked through the door today, I would be just as glad and happy to see him and have him here as ever."

And so the fight has gone on, as exhibited in such recent news items regarding Germany as the gaoling of Peter Naumann for 4 1/2 years for master-minding the bombing in 1979 of a television mast near Koblenz which interrupted the transmission of the programme "Holocaust", and for plotting to storm Spandau Prison when Hess was still alive and imprisoned there. Likewise the banning of the organisation Nationale Sammlung to prevent it taking part in local elections: thus demonstrating the utter falsity of democracy in that country, where National Socialism, the wish of a German majority, has been banned since 1945. Likewise the headline in the Daily Telegraph recently: "Neo-Nazism 'on the rise' in West Germany."

As long as man survives on this planet, the name Adolf Hitler will be remembered – with truth or with lies. It is for us in present dismal days to derive the satisfaction of bearing witness to the truth concerning him in the face of the torrent of lies. Make it your obligation to observe and mark the 101st anniversary of his birth on April 20th, 1990! Whatever else you do on and around that date to honour his name, make sure that at 6:18 in the evening, the time of his birth, you stop in silent meditation, lighting a candle in your heart in memory of the greatest champion of the Aryan peoples – your peoples – this world has ever seen!

"What though the field be lost?
All is not lost – the unconquerable will,
And study of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield:
And what is else not to be overcome?"
(from Paradise Lost by John Milton, 1608-1674)

THE ENEMY WITHIN

Strasserites
Hollywood Nazis
"Rock" Rowdies

On the centenary of his birth it needs to be noted that the cause of Adolf Hitler is confronted and conflicted not merely by the hostility of all the regular forces of the old order, but also and no less to its detriment by others who constitute one variety or another of an auxiliary enemy within. These comprise, firstly the Strasserites: persons claiming to be nationalists or even National Socialists, but denigrating Hitler in tune with the champions of the old order, and upholding in his place the Strasser brothers, Otto and Gregor, and Ernst Rhöm, whom Hitler had to eliminate from his party because of their treacherous disruption.

Secondly, there are those who, while plentifully making use of Hitler's name, are as plentifully harmful to his cause by their misunderstanding and misuse of it, and the consequent exploitation by the outer enemy of their association with it. In this category we include the Hollywood Nazis: all those, in other words, who make use of National Socialism as nothing more than a political playtime devoted to its superficial trappings, thereby seeking to compensate for the deficiencies of their arrested development by dressing up, giving themselves titles, and performing sterile and egocentric antics.

Also to be included are all those who, in their virtually total ignorance of what National Socialism really is, have not the slightest perception of, or respect for, the discipline, order and authority central to it, and who are simply excited to associate with it because of the enemy's distorted image of it as something violently notorious, and who accordingly supply the enemy with living proof of validity of their distortion. These latter are the dismal morons whose real cause is no more than crude hooliganism plentifully embellished with swastikas and Iron Crosses and a flourish of Hitler salutes at football matches. At this centenary let it be confirmed that there is no room in our ranks for such human rubbish.

Likewise, let it be declared that National Socialism, so uniquely responsive to harmony and beauty, health and strength, has absolutely no room for "rock", that degenerate din of the African jungle to which the above hooligans, and also others pretending to be National Socialists, are addicted, and which, we would have them know, Hitler would most certainly have prohibited. This is something that skinheads—if they are to elevate themselves from this category, have got to learn.

Returning to the Strasser brothers, they showed themselves to be more of the nature of national communists than true National Socialists, attacking private ownership of property (although upheld in the NSDAP's manifesto) in favour of mere possession on trust for the state (usufruct)—propounded by Otto Strasser in The Structure of German Socialism (1931)—and acclaiming class warfare in the name of the proletariat. As early as 1925 Gregor Strasser in a speech in the Reichstag called for an "economic revolution involving the nationalisation of the economy." On the 21st May, 1930, Otto Strasser met Hitler and demanded what he called "real socialism" and no attacks on Soviet Russia. Hitler replied: "What you understand by socialism is nothing but marxism." The next day in continued discussion Otto Strasser demanded the nationalization of industry, to which Hitler answered: "Democracy has laid the world in ruins, and nevertheless you want to extend it to the economic sphere. It would be the end of the German economy." (Who Financed Hitler, James & Suzanne Pool, Dial Press, New York, 1978; pages 241 & 242) If the Strassers had had their way, National Socialism would have never got to power, for they would have disrupted its appeal, frightening off essential support. No sensible person can really credit these men with the ability to succeed in Hitler's place in winning and holding the hearts of a nation.

Both the Strassers were confined in their concern to the economic side of the cause to the disregard of other aspects such as the racial. This deficiency, aggravated by their distortion of the party's economic policy, meant that they were always a couple of cuckoos in the nest. National Socialism, properly understood, has never been a mere combination of conventional socialism spiced with nationalism, and thus yet another merely materialist doctrine. It most certainly derives from its conception of the Folk a strong belief, and thus the belief—increased by its belief in the Leadership Principle, again derived from its racial belief—that private ownership and private enterprise must be subject to national regulation and supervision to ensure that its productive efficacy is fairly distributed and in accordance with national requirements; but it has never accepted the idea that nationalisation of property is the only and necessary means to adequate social justice, any more than it has been prepared to tolerate the anarchic inequity of liberal capitalism as the only answer and necessary means of preserving private property and enterprise. It has always stood for reconciliation, not a conflict of private and corporate interests. However, along with this economic outlook, National Socialism has always been far more than this, being first and foremost a racial outlook from which its economic outlook has followed.

Otto Strasser left the NSDAP in 1930, setting himself up in opposition to Hitler. In 1931 he was behind the SA mutiny in Berlin—where many SA men were former communists—led by the Berlin SA chief, Captain Walter Stennes, who was advised and encouraged in the revolt by Otto Strasser. The authors James & Suzanne Pool, in their book earlier referred to, reach the conclusion (p. 378) that "the evidence indicates that Stennes was financed by several important industrialists who were intent on destroying the Nazis." Otto Strasser himself admits in his book Flight from Terror that the foremost financial backer of Stennes was the Jewish multi-millionaire, steel and coal industrialist Otto Wolff. Money also came from the major industrialist Hermann Bücher. Hitler, by personal intervention on the spot, quickly swung the great bulk of the SA men away from Stennes and Strasser.

On Hitler's attainment of power in 1933, Otto Strasser went first to Austria to continue his anti-Hitler campaign, then to Czechoslovakia. The Jew, Fritz Max Cahen, head of the German Resistance Movement against Hitler, describes in his book Men Against Hitler (Jarrolds, London, pages 140-142), how, when he was in Prague in 1935, he had a conference with Otto Strasser and others leading to a plan for united opposition to Hitler, and how thereafter he met Strasser at least once a week. The periodical World Jewry (28th August, 1936) carried the following report from its Prague correspondent: "The well-known rival of Herr Hitler, Otto Strasser..... has published an appeal to the German Jewish emigrants to join the newly-formed organisation of German Jews headed by Herr Rossheim." ..... "In his opinion, the solution of the problem of the Jews in Germany lies in the direction of assimilation....."

In 1938 Otto Strasser moved to Switzerland, and afterwards to France. The British Ambassador in Berlin, in a letter to the British Foreign Secretary on the 18th July 1939, said, "So many people, such as Otto Strasser and others of this world are seeking with intense pertinacity to drive us to war with Germany."

According to W.J. West in The Truth Betrayed (Duckworth, London, 1987), at the time of the Bürgerbräukeller bomb plot, November 1939, which failed to kill Hitler as intended—and which the German authorities held to have been masterminded by the British Secret Service working through Otto Strasser—there were in fact very strong links between Strasser and the British authorities through Sir Robert Vansittart (Permanent Head of the Foreign Office and later Chief Diplomatic Advisor to the Government) who in October 1939 recommended to the Foreign Secretary Otto Strasser and Hermann Rauschning (another defector responsible for a volume of lies entitled Hitler Speaks, exposed by Swiss historian Wolfgang Haenel). After the failure of the bomb plot it is significant that Vansittart turned against Strasser, clearly implying that his reputation was bound up with it (W.J. West, p. 155).

Otto Strasser's friend and supporter, the author Douglas Reed, describes the The Prisoner of Ottawa, (Jonathan Cope, London, 1953, pages 712-175) how the former, while in France during the earlier part of the war, plotted against Germany with the Jew Georges Mandel, then Minister of the Interior in the Reynoud Government. With the fall of France, the roving traitor moved to Portugal from whence in 1940 the British helped him to reach Canada to continue his dirty work there.

Material from Otto Strasser went to make up the book Der Führer which was issued in the name of "Konrad Heiden", which, along with Rauschning's above-mentioned collection of lies, was used in formulating the indictment of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg whereby leading Germans were put to death and barbarously so by slow strangulation. Strasser material was also made much use of by Dr. William C. Langer as acknowledged in his book The Mind of Adolf Hitler (Secker & Warburg, London, 1972), a piece of wartime propaganda he was assigned to concoct by the American dirty tricks department known as the OSS. The kind of help muck-spreader Strasser gave to Langer can be distinguished from Strasser's own offering of ordure entitled The Gangsters around Hitler (W.H. Allen, London, undated but on British bookstalls in the middle of the war). Typical of its filth is his tale of a film made, he claims, of two titled ladies from the War Office executed for espionage: ".....when Hitler is unable to sleep he orders this film to be shown again and again, as he sits alone in the cellar which houses his private cinema" (p. 43). Otto Strasser died in obscurity in Munich in 1974.

His brother Gregor stayed on in Hitler's party till 1932 when his disruptive intrigues came to a head. Authors James & Suzanne Pool, in Who Financed Hitler (p. 382), reveal that during the autumn of that year the Jew Paul Silverberg, a very wealthy industrialist, secretly gave money to Gregor Strasser who, like his brother, while presenting himself as such a strict opponent of big business, was quite prepared to be on its payroll. The Jewish industrialist Otto Wolff, whom we have come across as paymaster for the Otto Strasser-Walter Stennes plot in 1931, also extended his purse to Gregor in this following year. "Like Silverberg, Wolff had contributed heavily to Strasser....." (p. 454). When in December 1937 General Kurt von Schleicher became Chancellor, he immediately offered the position of Vice-Chancellor to Gregor Strasser with whom he was conspiring as a move to disrupt Hitler's party. Thereupon Hitler denounced him as a traitor, and he had to resign from the party. This was not, however, the end of his subversion. He was involved in the Röhm plot two years later, and executed for this.

Ernst Röhm, head of the SA in 1934, was akin to the Strassers in political outlook, wanting to pursue a further revolution in the military sphere by elevating the SA in place of the Army, just as the Strassers wanted to regiment industry through public ownership. If Röhm had had his way, the consequent upset to the country, when Hitler had only newly taken hold of it, would very likely have meant the downfall of National Socialism. At that time the SA, two million strong, was—under Röhm behaving with increasing grandeur—running out of Hitler's control. A loyal SA commander, Victor Lutze, brought to Rudolf Hess eye-witness accounts of Röhm's plans to overthrow Hitler and bring about a second revolution (Hess: The Missing Years, David Irving, Macmillan, London, 1987, p. 22). Also, Hitler's personal pilot, Hans Baur, in his book Hitler at my Side (Eichler Publishing Corp., U.S.A., 1986, p. 79 [available from Liberty Bell Publications]) records that Hitler told the author that the Italian Ambassador in Paris had learned that Röhm was planning an uprising, and had entered into negotiations with the French who had assured him they would not interfere, and that Röhm had already drawn up his entire lists for a new government. The Italian Ambassador had notified the German Ambassador in France who had informed Hitler, who, after agonizing deliberation, had to order the arrest and execution of Röhm and his leading conspirators, thereby by his prompt and necessarily radical action very rightly preventing the vastly greater bloodshed and turmoil of civil war.

The Strasserites of today, devotees of the treacherous Gregor and Otto and fellow traveler Ernst Röhm, accuse Hitler of becoming a tool of big business, and betraying his cause and his followers thereby. The crucial point in this connection is not whether Hitler accepted vitally needed money from big business or any other quarter, but whether in so doing he allowed any money from any source to pervert him from the cause he believed in and stood for, and the answer to this must on any sensible survey be an emphatic

"no!" Hitler, whatever the hopes of contributors, was never for purchase, and always remained the master whatever the money.

A major authority on the subject of NSDAP funds is the book here repeatedly referred to: Who financed Hitler, by James & Suzanne Pool [available from Liberty Bell Publications, Ord. #22020, $12. + $1.80 postage]. In 1923 industrialist Fritz Thyssen apparently gave 100,000 gold marks to General Ludendorff who acted as a conduit for various organizations, and part of this may have been intended for and may have reached the NSDAP. Industrialist Ernst von Borsig apparently contributed to the NSDAP in its early years, but not much more than to conservative parties as well. Not till 1927 did Hitler win a further supporter among industrialists, Emil Kirdorf, who thereafter mustered some financial help from others. "Throughout the period of prosperity Hitler received relatively few donations from important businessmen" (p. 155). In 1928 Hess met Thyssen who arranged a loan. In the summer of 1931 the Ruhrlade (group of industrialists) gave the NSDAP on Thyssen's recommendation a small sum (p. 278). In 1931 it was reported that Deterding of Royal Dutch-Shell both gave and loaned large sums to Hitler. In that same year Hitler spoke at The Industry Club of Düsseldorf and Thyssen is later supposed to have written that as a result of this contact a number of larger contributions were made to the NSDAP; "supposed", we here say, because as will be seen Thyssen's writings are distinctly suspect. The Pools say there may have been enough inflow to finance the current election campaign, but no great flow (p. 355). They estimate contributions from industry to the NSDAP 1930-32 as totaling not more than 600,000 marks. They mention help from Cologne banker, Baron Kurt von Schröder, but only in the form of arranging for NSDAP bills to be underwritten, not actually paid, and their overall conclusion is that "the primary source of Party revenue was not big business" (p. 385).

Otto Dietrich, NSDAP Press Chief, in his revised 1955 memoirs, says of the 1931 Industry Club of Düsseldorf meeting that insignificant sums were collected at the door, and nothing great followed. Henry Ashby Turner in German Big Business and the Rise of Hitler (Oxford University Press, New York, 1985), another major authority, debunks the notion of Hitler's dependency on big business sustained by such as the writings attributed to Thyssen, showing in fact how little big business had to do with Hitler's success, its contributions never being critical, and most NSDAP money coming from membership dues, interest-free loans, and the admission charges at meetings. Peter Drucker, the economist, in The End of Economic Man (London, 1939), endorses this conclusion on page 105: "As far as the Nazi Party is concerned, there is good reason to believe that at least three-quarters of its funds, even after 1930, came from the weekly dues ..... and from the entrance fees to the mass meetings....."

A markedly inferior source, although much favoured by and advertised by Britain's contemporary Strasserites, is Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler by Antony C. Sutton (Bloomfield Books, Sudbury, U.K., 1976). Behind the gusto of its blatant partisanship, it shows itself distinctly thin even as simply a survey of big business contributions to Hitler's rise to power, and totally lacking in any proof that in accepting such contributions Hitler was in any way whatsoever corrupted and deflected from his course, without which there can be no culpability on his part, only good sense in gaining necessary finance without compromise.

The book I Paid Hitler, attributed to Fritz Thyssen, has been made much of by the anti-Hitler front, but in 1948 Thyssen denied authorship of the book, saying that it was the work of Emery Reves who published it without permission or payment. Reves—a Jew whose father was formerly Rabbitz—was a New York publisher running an anti-Hitler propaganda machine, who acted as literary agent for Winston Churchill, and was responsible for the fictitious book by Hermann Rauschning, Hitler Speaks, wherein Rauschning claims to have had more than a hundred private talks with Hitler in which the latter revealed the entirety of his views and plans including a world empire, whereas this liar in fact only met Hitler four or five times, never alone, and never at length.

Strasserites, along with their idiotic depiction of Hitler as the paid lackey of big business, also try to reinforce their smears with the equally idiotic tale that Hitler had Jewish ancestry. In the case of author Douglas Reed, the addled supporter of the sordid Otto Strasser, the nonsense even stretched to the extent of suggesting that Hitler was some satanic agent with the role from the start of misleader and destroyer of patriotic forces. The "Hitler was Jewish" canard comes in two main variations, so take your pick! One of them makes out that Hitler's father's mother was once a domestic servant in the household of Baron Rothschild of Vienna, and there seduced by him. The prime source for this is none other than the book I Paid Hitler which, as we have just seen, the Jew Reves wrote while falsely attributing it to Fritz Thyssen. The other version is that the seducing was done by a Jew named Frankenberger in his household at Graz. This whopper is said to have come to us from high NS official, Hans Frank, in memoirs said to have been written while in the custody of the Allies shortly before they hanged him at Nuremberg at the end of the war, when they may well have (as in other cases) done a bit of hand-guiding before neck-stretching.

Colin Cross, in Adolf Hitler (Hodder & Stoughton, London, 1973), says that the Graz Hebrew congregation had no Frankenberger among its members at the relevant time (p. 18); and Joachim C. Fest, in Hitler (Weidenfeld & Nicolson, London, 1974), says, "Recent researches have further shaken the credibility of his statement, so that the whole notion can scarcely stand serious investigation" (p. 15). Yet the self-styled "political soldiers" of the Nutty Farce which the present National Front has become, who have never faced and are never likely to face and endure what vast legions of men and women in Germany in peace and in war did in support of Adolf Hitler as epitome of their ideals, continue to defecate their denigration of his as a fake inferior to themselves, whereby these midgets most of all succeed in exhibiting their own childish and odious charlatanry.

WAR CRIMES WITCH-HUNT UNDER WAY WORLDWIDE

With the Hebrew "Holocaust" facing increasing doubt, a new drive to refurbish it had to be arranged. Hence the present hunt for "Nazi war criminals" to be put on show-trial. The British Government having responded by setting up a War Crimes Inquiry, Gothic Ripples contacted it and obtained its terms of references, which are: "For the purpose of this inquiry, the term 'war crimes' extends only to crimes of murder, manslaughter or genocide committed in Germany and in territories occupied by German forces during the Second World War."

In April 1988 we sent it details of war crimes conforming to those terms of reference committed by British citizens, requesting explicit recognition that the Inquiry's obligation included consideration of such. It took three further letters and five months before the Secretary wrote in September to say: "I can confirm that the Inquiry's terms of reference include the investigation of alleged war crimes committed by people who were then British in Germany or German occupied territory during the Second World War. However the Offences Against the Person Act of 1861 allows the prosecution in this country for murder or manslaughter of people who were British at the time of the alleged offences wheresoever in the world they took place." Accordingly, he concluded, "it seems more appropriate" that our allegations be investigated by the Director of Public Prosecutions to whom our material would be passed. Having been shunted off the main line in this way, it took two letters and further four months before the D.P.P.—who just happens to be the Jew Allen Green—favoured us with the following few words: "These matters are still under consideration." This January 1989 message was the last we have had to date.

MURDER AT SPANDAU

Rudolf Hess, the Prisoner of Peace, was finally laid to rest in the family grave at Wunsiedel on the 17th March 1988. At a time then and now when a War Crimes Inquiry is being conducted in Britain, we specify as a war crime the retention of this peace envoy in custody in Britain from 1941-1945, and, derivatively so, his wrongful conviction by a tribunal of victors' vengeance at Nuremberg in 1945-1946, and his consequent imprisonment in Spandau Prison in West Berlin from then till 1987; and, finally, his ultimate murder there in that year. For all this war criminality we principally accuse the deceitful and dishonourable government of the United Kingdom in its various composition throughout this time.

Prior to his flight to Britain, Rudolf Hess had been energetically engaged with Hitler's knowledge and approval in seeking to end the conflict between Britain and Germany which both of them heartily deplored. Peter Allen, in The Crown and the Swastika (Robert Hale, London, 1983), claims that Rudolf Hess secretly met the Duke of Windsor in Portugal on the 28th July 1940, immediately after the fall of France, and that the latter approved German peace proposals presented by Hess as Hitler's official representative. The Duke was then tricked by the British government of warmonger Winston Churchill whose Minister of Information, Walter Monckton, flew to Lisbon, pretended that the British government was going to give serious consideration to the proposals, and on the strength of this persuaded the Duke to depart for a post in the Bahamas. Manoeuvred out of the way in this manner, the Duke had been manoeuvred off the British throne several years earlier, not really because of Mrs. Simpson, but because he was pro-Hitler and wanted Anglo-German unity.

Hess's son, Wolf Rüdiger Hess, in My Father Rudolf Hess (W.H. Allen, London, 1986; p. 158), records that Albrecht Haushofer, assigned to do so by Hitler and Hess, met representatives of influential British circles in Geneva in August 1940, who indicated that Britain was willing to make peace, if Germany canceled the 1939 pact with Russia. Hitler was in principle prepared to do this, but whished to wait until the complicated situation in the Balkans was clearer. However, the Churchill government was merely concerned to isolate Germany and bring her into conflict with Russia so that Churchill could achieve his long-standing aim of an alliance with Stalin against Hitler, something he had proposed to the Russian Ambassador in London back in July 1934 (I.M. Maisky, Who Helped Hitler?; p. 55); and, according to J.F.C. Fuller in The Second World War, put forward on 4 occasions: March 1938, September 1938, May 4th and May 19th 1939.

Hess's son relates that in the winter 1940/1941 Albrecht Haushofer had discussions in Madrid with the British Ambassador there, Sir Samuel Hoare, through the medium of the Swedish Legation in Madrid (p. 80). In January 1941 the Vice-President of the International Red Cross, Carl Jacob Burckhardt, received unofficial information from London that Britain was prepared to make peace, and on the 28th April 1941 Albrecht Haushofer went to Geneva to see Burckhardt on the orders of Hitler and Hess (p. 70).

It was during this period that Rudolf Hess, having conceived the desperate measure of a personal flight to Britain, had twice—on the 10th January and the 30th April 1941—prepared to fly, but been prevented from setting off, before finally doing so on the 10th Nay 1941. Also, Albrecht Haushofer had in September 1940 written to the Duke of Hamilton (with whom he had been in touch since 1936), at the suggestion of Rudolf Hess, to explore the way for negotiations. This letter fell into the hands of Britain's Secret Intelligence Service. Says David Irving in Churchill's War (Veritas, Australia, 1987; p. 650) [available from Liberty Bell Publications, $30.00 + $4.50 postage & handling], according to Dr. Eduard Benes, ex-President of Czechoslovakia, the SIS saw the Haushofer approach as "an excellent opportunity", sent a reply purporting to be from Hamilton, and further letters arranged for Hess to fly to the Duke's estate.

As to Hitler's prior knowledge of Hess's flight on the 10th May 1941, according to Wulf Schwarzwälder (Rudolf Hess, Quartet, London, 1988; p. 156), Hess's former adjutant, Alfred Leitgen, remembers overhearing snatches of a conversation between Hitler and Hess in which there was mention of Albrecht Haushofer and Hamilton, no problems with the aeroplane, and (from Hess) of declaring him insane. The first German radio communique concerning Hess's flight was not until the evening (20:00 hrs.) of the 12th May, suggesting that Hitler held his hand to see if Britain responded favourably to Hess's mission. Thereafter, as could be the pre-arranged protection, when it was seen that the mission was unsuccessful, the German authorities stated that Hess had become unbalanced.

Hess's flight significantly occurred at a time when—contrary to the Allied picture of an unprovoked attack on Russia by Germany in late June of 1941—Russia was preparing to make a surprise attack on Germany. Ernst Topitsch, in Stalin's War (St. Martin's Press, New York, 1987), assembles evidence that by late summer, 1941, preparations for a mass offensive against Germany would have been concluded. On page 106 Major General Grigorenko is quoted as saying, "More than half the troops of our Western Military Region were in the area round Bialystock to the West of that, that is in an area which projected into enemy territory. There could only be one reason for such a distribution, namely that these troops were intended for a surprise offensive."

In Truth for Germany (Verlag für Volkstum und Zeitgeschichtsforschung, Vlotho, West Germany; p. 411) Udo Walendy quotes H.A. Jacobsen & H. Dollinger, The Second World War in Pictures and Documents (Vol. 1, p. 372) as stating that Russia concentrated in her western territories up to June 1941 13 armies with more than 131 infantry divisions, 23 cavalry divisions, 36 motorized brigades and about 40 tank divisions with almost 4.7 million soldiers. Walendy (p. 416) also cites H.G. Seraphim The German-Russian Relations 1939 - 1941 (p. 85) that Russian General Vlassov stated in 1942 in Berlin after his capture, "The attack was intended for August/September 1941."

Victor Suvorov, a former member of the Soviet General Staff, in an article in The Journal of the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies (London; June 1985), assembled very detailed information to show that beginning in March 1941, and assuming a huge scale in May and June, Soviet troops were being moved to and concentrated on the German border in preparation for a Soviet attack on Germany. "If Hitler had not attacked first, Stalin would have had 23 armies and more than 20 independent corps facing him. This took place before general mobilisation." Suvorov shows that the measures were clearly offensive, not defensive. "It seems certain that the Soviet concentration on the frontier was due to be completed by 10 July. Thus the German blow which fell just 19 days earlier found the Red Army in a most unfavourable situation—in railway wagons."

German intelligence certainly learned what was going on, this causing Hitler to consider a pre-emptive strike a necessity, and he set in motion preparations for this at the end of April 1941, just before Hess's flight, However, he only confirmed the final forward movement a month in advance, that is to say, after it had become clear that Hess's mission had been unsuccessful; and both events shortly followed a Kremlin banquet on the 5th May at which Stalin announced in a supposedly secret speech—which German agents are said to have reported to Hitler almost at once—"Our war plan is ready ..... It follows that over the next two months we can begin the fight with Germany." (Hitler's War, David Irving, Viking Press, U.S.A.; 1977; pp. 238 & 239.)

Attempting to put together and interpret the items of information here presented so as to form a full picture of Hess's flight, it seems evident that the flight was no self-contained impulse of purely personal initiative as is the common conception. It came after a long period of attempted negotiation to which Hitler was fully a party, and was most likely made with his approval. It came, furthermore, almost certainly in response to encouraging intimations from the British authorities, in part at least making use of the Duke of Hamilton, and amounting to giving the go-ahead green light; but all this on their part as merely a ruse to lure Hess to Britain, and this as part of Churchill's design to bring Stalin into the war in alliance with Britain against Germany. In this design Hess was conceived as the catalyst. Stalin for his part had made a pact with Hitler to encourage Hitler to confront the West. Now, in the ensuing war, hopes by Germany of an arrangement with Britain could both encourage Hitler to feel it opportune to fight Russia and, in turn, encourage Russia to feel it had to forestall such an attack, even though it would be far more to her advantage to attack a Germany still at war with the West. This assuredly is the key to the mystery.

Hess is likely to have brought over extensive peace proposals which have been hidden from the British public along with other aspects of his flight just discussed. His proposals were of course ignored, and he was kept in close custody ever afterwards in order to prevent his disclosure of the full background to his flight, his peace proposals, and his treatment in custody. This happened despite the fact that Hess appears to have been in a position of a bearer of a Flag of Truce under Article 32 of the Hague Convention. This piece of international law protects such a person from being held as a prisoner of war, or put under any other form of confinement after negotiations. Churchill, it is to be noted in this connection, put Hess under the responsibility of the War Ministry as if in the category of a prisoner of war, instead of the Home Office, as would befit the bearer of a Flag of Truce.

Repeated reference has been made to the part played by Albrecht Haushofer. David Irving, in Rudolf Hess - The Missing Years 1941-45 (Macmillan, London, 1987; p. 57), states that he had pre-war contact in London with the Special Intelligence Service. Early in 1940 he was introduced into the Wednesday Society, a centre of German resistance to Hitler, says Hess's son on p. 72 of his book. He was arrested in 1944 on suspicion of being involved in the July plot to murder Hitler and seize power; and he was shot just before the end of the war.

Much has been made of Hess's alleged "abnormality" and "instability" during his imprisonment in Britain from the time of his arrival till, four years later, his transfer to Germany for trial. This portrayal was undoubtedly deceitfully done by the British authorities in order to discredit Hess and thereby his peace flight at a time when Churchill was fearful of the potential response in the country menacing his position. It stopped just short of declaring him positively insane, since this condition would have entitled him as a prisoner of war to repatriation under the Geneva Convention.

The "abnormality" and "instability", where they were not a matter of a mere loss of memory which Hess feigned in order to protect his knowledge of confidential German matters under intensive questioning, was due to the wrongful and oppressive conditions to which he was subjected. Although the Geneva Convention prohibited electronic eavesdropping on prisoners of war, apparatus was installed at Mytchett Place at Aldershot before he arrived (D. Irving, Rudolf Hess; p. 101). Military Intelligence 6 provided "companions" for Hess, including Zionist sympathiser, Major Frank E. Foley (p. 103), with the job of penetrating Hess's mind, and seemingly drugs were used to this end (p. 107). Hence Hess's repeated protests and recurrent fear that he was being "poisoned" which his captors paraded as proof of his unsoundness of mind.

Hess was put in the hands of a Jewish psychiatrist, RAMC Major R.V. Dicks who worked with MI6 (SIS), and who posed as a regular doctor, and who progressed to portraying Hess as of unsound mind. Dicks was by then the author of a new textbook, Analysis under Hypnotics, and he is known to have eventually injected Hess with the narcotic Evipan. (For these preceding facts, see Irving on Hess.) It has elsewhere been reported that documents in the U.S.A. indicated that behavioural peculiarities in Hess were caused by the administration of "truth drugs". The British Foreign Office significantly refused a request by Hess's wife that the International Red Cross be allowed to examine her husband.

Moved to Nuremberg in 1945, one of the panel appointed to pronounce on his fitness to stand trial there was a Prof. Ewen Cameron. This worthy was sponsored by the American Central Intelligence Agency to research brainwashing when he ran the Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal from 1943 to 1967. While doing so it was alleged that, for one example, one patient was injected with LSD, put to sleep for up to 50 days at a time, given repeated electric shocks, made to wear a helmet with speakers through which instructions were endlessly conveyed to him; and ended up a physical and mental wreck. (Daily Telegraph, London, 12th September 1988.) Just imagine this had been a German in Hitler's days, and what the Simon Wiesenthal Center would have made of it now—and all the British media!

Hess's continued incarceration from then till his death in 1987—41 years of his total caging for a monstrous 46 years—was arranged in order to exact the utmost in victors' vengeance while, fully as importantly, gagging him from making known the truth about his flight which would have been most damaging to the British government. The means to this end was the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, a creation of, by and for the victors regardless of real justice which it most flagrantly disregarded. For instance, Article 3 of its Charter disallowed objections that the judges, being nominated by the victors, were prejudiced. Article 6 allowed accusations only against representatives of the Axis Powers. Article 19 laid down that the Tribunal should not be bound by the technical rules of evidence. Article 21 provided that proof was not required for what the prosecutors regarded as facts generally known. Britain's Judge G. Lawrence refused to allow Hess's counsel to discuss the Treaty of Versailles, even though the Prosecution had introduced the subject by arguing that the struggle for its revision had been a long-planned conspiracy against peace. One of the American judges at Nuremberg, Francis Biddle, later revealed in the American Heritage journal, Vol. XIII, No. 5, August 1962, that the U.S. judges knowingly permitted the Soviet prosecutor to admit false evidence against the defendants.

Hess was convicted—with the rich irony of a Russian judge reading out the findings against him—of "Crimes Against Peace" encompassing the following:— He had urged the importance of armaments, given support to military preparations, and signed the decree introducing conscription. He had been in Vienna when the German troops entered the city, and had signed the law for the union of Germany and Austria, having earlier made speeches in favour of this. He had co-operated with the Sudeten National Socialists and after the incorporation of the Sudetenland in the Reich he had carried out the fusion of their party with the NSDAP. In June 1939 he had been authorized to participate in the administration of both Austria and the Sudetenland, and in August 1939 he had given public approval to Hitler's policy concerning Poland, and was a party to taking over Danzig and certain areas in Poland. As Hitler's close confidant he must have known of and thus be responsible for Hitler's "plans of aggression". (See Irving on Hess.) For this—comparable to what Western politicians have regularly done, and never been charged or punished for—the man who tried to make peace was convicted of violating peace, and sentenced to life imprisonment.

Sent to Spandau Prison in West Berlin, conditions there were so bad that Pastor Casalis, a chaplain at the prison, said in November 1948 that the prisoners were dying slowly of starvation. "Spandau," he said, "has become a place of mental torture....." He spoke of "an atmosphere of refined sadism....." Even when conditions later improved, Hess continued to be subjected to such harshly punitive restrictions as never to be allowed to touch his wife or son or grandchildren, and for over half of his total of 46 years behind bars he suffered the additional hardship of solitary confinement.

Nevertheless, despite nearly half a century of such veritable torture, and despite the unsuccessful efforts of French chaplain to get him to sign a declaration of remorse this Pastor Gabel had himself composed, he remained steadfast in his National Socialist beliefs and in his loyalty to and esteem for his friend and leader, Adolf Hitler. His martyred life ended on the afternoon of August 17th, 1987.

Schlußworte von Rudolf Hess
Stellvertreter des Führers
vor dem Nürnberger Tribunal 1946

A succession of conflicting announcements as to where and how he died followed from the Allied authorities, exciting profound suspicion. Although the Americans were at the time in rotational charge of Spandau, the British insisted that the death be investigated solely by the Special Investigation Branch of the British Military Police, and that the post mortem be conducted by a British Army pathologist. This autopsy, performed two years later by Prof. James Cameron, indicated that death was due to suicide by hanging, but the Russians refused to countersign the verdict. At it, and not before and during the investigations by the Military Police, an alleged suicide note was discovered in the clothing of the corpse which, when he eventually obtained it, Hess's son saw to be highly suspect, being scrawled on the back of an old letter from the son's wife which lacked the usual prison stamp, and being without signs of having been in the pocket of a body very roughly handled in ostensible efforts at resuscitation which caused 9 ribs and the breastbone to be broken, and the stomach to be blown up like a balloon because a tube for oxygen was wrongly inserted in the oesophagus instead of the windpipe. The piece of electric flex with which he was supposed to have hanged himself had been wiped clean with acetone by the time the Military Police investigating team arrived, and the British Military Governor of Spandau, Lt.-Col. A.H. Le Tissierm later told the son's wife that he had destroyed it.

A second autopsy, arranged by Hess's family and conducted by Prof. W. Spann of Munich University found marks around Hess's neck and throat which indicated he was throttled not hanged, while his hands showed he had not wound the flex round a hand to exert the necessary pressure on his neck for self-strangulation; the inescapable implication being that he had been murdered. In support of this conclusion this second autopsy showed that the victim suffered from disabilities which virtually rendered him incapable of hanging himself—or, for that matter, strangling himself.

According to various sources, including this second autopsy, Rudolf Hess so suffered from advanced arthritis and curvature of the spine—his left arm being of little use because of a frozen shoulder which prevented it being lifted above the horizontal infront and not even as high as that out to the side, his head being incapable of raising backwards to enable him to look up or of turning more than a few degrees to the left and halfway to the right—that he could never have reached above his head to tie a noose. Furthermore, the muscles of the hands of this 93-year-old man were so weak that he had trouble gripping anything, and thus it was impossible for him to tie a knot to hang himself, or to apply the pressure necessary for self-strangulation (when in any event unconsciousness and consequent relaxation of the grip precedes and prevents death). Some other person or persons therefore killed him: that must be our verdict.

Whom could they be acting for? Was it the Russians whom Britain has always blamed for Hess's continued imprisonment? The Russians, despite their fulminations against Hess on occasions, were on other occasions prepared to make use of him. The German historian, Dr. Werner Maser, has asserted that back in 1952, on the night of March 17th, when the Russians were in charge of the prison, they took Hess to East Germany to a meeting with Kremlin officials at which Otto Grotewohl, the East German Prime Minister and Maser's source of information, was present. There Hess was offered immediate freedom, if he would head a new party to reconcile former National Socialists to communist rule. Hess refused, and was returned to prison for 35 more years.

In April 1987, four months before his father's murder, Wolf Rüdiger Hess was amazed to find that his approaches to the Russians suddenly had a favourable response. He was summoned to the Soviet Consulate in West Berlin where officials hinted that his father's imprisonment might soon end. Also, on June 21st, 1987, in a reply to a listener in Germany, Radio Moscow (Department of German language broadcasts) wrote: "Recent remarks by the head of our government, Mikhail Gorbachev, permit the expression of hope that your longtime efforts in behalf of the release of war criminal Rudolf Hess may soon be crowned by success." It seems that Gorbachev did intend to release Hess unilaterally during a Soviet turn of administration at Spandau as a powerful propaganda stroke to exhibit to a nicety the kind tendencies of a reformed Soviet regime, even towards a notorious old enemy it had formerly fiercely denounced. The Russians let the West German President know of their intention. He tipped of the British who expressed through him a resolute refusal to accept this.

The possibility of Hess's release now put the British in a panic. Hitherto they had been able to rely on the Russian refusal to agree to Hess's release as the means of keeping him and his secrets locked up for ever, while they, in characteristically hypocritical style, posed as the forgiving ones favouring his release. What then is said to have happened according to information from American personnel at Spandau reaching German friends of theirs is as follows. In an operation carried out in great haste to proceed even any advance announcement of Gorbachev's intention, let alone its implementation, and thus accounting for flaws, two British Special Air Service men were put into the prison to kill Hess, and the American, French and Israeli secret services were acquainted beforehand, but not the Russian and West German. These two assassins were spotted beforehand on the afternoon in question in the vicinity of the garden shed where Hess met his death. In the region of 3:15 to 3:30, the American warder on duty to accompany Hess on his daily visit to the garden and there to the garden shed, was by a curious coincidence called away to answer a telephone call in the main cell block, leaving Hess in the garden shed. During his absence the SAS men evidently attacked the old man who, despite his great age and great disabilities, put up a fight and these fiends tried to throttle him with flex, and then make it look like suicide. However, although rendered unconscious, the old man was still alive when the warder returned and summoned help. The U.S. officer in charge of the guard, seemingly a party to the assassination, called a British military ambulance which took Hess away, accompanied by the two SAS men who were seen getting into it. Hess then "died" on the way to the hospital. (Probably with further assistance from the assassins—our note.)

The guilty ones were well-protected from justice by the provisions of their masters. No public inquest, as normal under British law, was held because Hess, although in custody in the British sector of Berlin, was a prisoner of the four Allies, and any process concerning them on German soil requires the express permission of the Allied power or powers involved. The West Berlin state prosecutor, "following information received from numerous sources," initiated an enquiry into Hess's death in February 1988, but it was suspended the following month (Independent, London, 18th March, 1988).

The Chairman of the British Bar's European group commented at the time of Hess's death that Rudolf Hess was incarcerated under a sentence imposed by an ad hoc tribunal with no legal status under any national law (Daily Telegraph, London, 20th August 1987). Thus his custody—and all that followed from it, including his death—became a matter beyond and thus above the normal law by virtue of the inter-governmental pact of the victors setting up the tribunal. Murder at Spandau was thus by higher decree permissible. To complete the shrouding of the case of the corpse, already so well-attended to, the British government's Hess papers are placed beyond reach till 2017, and by then you can be sure that anything revealing will have conveniently disappeared.

Hugh Thomas, a former British Army surgeon assigned to Spandau, believes the prisoner was murdered, but also believes that he was not Rudolf Hess but a double sent by Himmler who had the real man murdered in 1941. Thomas's case principally rests on his claim that the prisoner did not have the scars he should have had due to a wound in the First World War. As against this, it is a fact that scar tissue in such an old man could be difficult to detect. Also, for what it is worth, Mrs. Lynda Chalker, Minister of State at the Foreign Office, was reported in The Scotsman (26th February 1988) as stating that the British government had concluded on the basis of various studies and the British post mortem that the man was indeed Hess. Additionally, the Sunday Times (12th June 1988) reported that Charles A. Gabel, the French chaplain at Spandau, had, in a book of his published in Paris in 1988, revealed that after Thomas first published his theory in 1979, two allied doctors visited Hess and did with difficulty find the wound scars. If Thomas is to be believed—and if thus it is to be believed that Hess's wife and son have been deceived for decades as to the prisoner's identity—we are still left with the conundrum which Thomas never really comes to grips with: why would such an imposter as the prisoner still hide the truth decades after the war, and thus acquiesce in his imprisonment till death—when the insertion of deliberate anomalies in his letters to relatives of Hess could easily be made the means of communicating his imposture? The absence of any satisfactory answer to this must discredit Mr. Thomas's theory completely.

As the most recent important development in the case of Rudolf Hess's death, a witness who was at Spandau at the time has come forward to testify that it was murder. Tunisian-born Abdallah Melaouhi was the victim's nurse at Spandau for the last four years of his life, and thereby the closest person to him. Interviewed on the "Newsnight" programme of Britain's BBC Television Channel 2 on the 28th February 1989, Melaouhi had this to say, according to an official transcript in our possession:—

When shortly before his death, there were reports that the Russians were relenting and Hess would be freed, "Hess wasn't very happy about it. Hess said, 'Now something is going to happen to me.' ..... He told me 'Mr. Melaouhi, now they are going to kill me'."

On the 17th August 1987, Melaouhi was at lunch in the canteen adjoining the prison when a telephone call from the French warder summoned him back urgently. He returned immediately to the prison and rang the bell. Usually he was admitted rightaway, but on that day he had to wait for 15 minutes. When he was let in he found his way to the garden hut was blocked. Eventually he managed to get to it by a long way round, taking 40 minutes instead of 4 minutes the normal way. He saw no cable around or anywhere near Hess's neck and the extension cable with which the authorities say Hess hanged himself was still in his normal place, one end connected to the lamp and the other in the wall socket. "His body was quite a distance away from the window where the TV claimed he hanged himself and the chair was in a totally different place from usual ..... I know the garden hut very well. The floor was covered with a straw mat but on that day everything was upside down as if a wrestling match had taken place. The armchair where Mr. Hess always sat had flown about three-and-a-half metres across the room, the lamp had fallen over. It was as if someone had tried to kill him and he'd tried to save himself."

Melaouhi continued, "There were three people there, a warder who has been working in Spandau for eight years and two American soldiers, well they were dressed in American uniforms... [Our note: it would be hardly surprising if, in the circumstances of the American turn of duty, the SAS men had donned American uniforms with the connivance of the American authorities.] ...I'd never seen soldiers near Hess before, and precisely on that day they were there." He explained that soldiers were in Spandau to guard the prison, not the prisoner, which was strictly the job of the civilian warders. Said Melaouhi: "Rudolf Hess was so weak he needed a special chair to help him to stand up. He walked bent over with a cane and was almost blind. If he ever fell to the ground, he couldn't get up again. His hands were crippled with arthritis. He couldn't tie his shoe laces, let alone lift his hands high enough to kill himself."

"Newsnight" stated that Scotland Yard had been looking into the case for a month, following a visit by Hess's son with evidence including a signed statement from Abdallah Melaouhi and the second autopsy report of Prof. Spann; but that so far there had been no attempt by the Metropolitan Police to contact either of these witnesses, and official sources close to the enquiry had said that "it is unlikely the case will be pursued." (For readers wishing to tackle the Metropolitan Police on this, the address is New Scotland Yard, Broadway, London, SW1.)

Rudolf Hess Gesellschaft, Postfach 1122, D-8033 Planegg, West

Germany, has now replaced the former society for the release of Rudolf Hess, and incorporates its former French counterpart. It is an international association—President: Wolf Rüdiger Hess—existing as a memorial to Rudolf Hess, and as such concerned with his work in Germany prior to his flight to Britain, the flight itself, his subsequent captivity, and the manner of his death. Two publications are in course of preparation.

Gothic Ripples, whose editor has campaigned for Rudolf Hess for 40 years, proposed that henceforth May 10th each year be observed worldwide as RUDOLF HESS DAY in honour of this truly great and greatly harmed idealist. It was late on this day in 1941 that he landed in a field near to Floors Farm Cottage, itself near to Floors Farm near to Eaglesham House, the exact spot being marked by a stone. The area is a little south of Glasgow in Scotland. The Ordnance Survey Landranger Map 64 shows the spot as grid reference OS 561 540. Visitors to the spot should secure permission from the Farm or its Cottage before going on to the ground, taking care not to spoil things for others by in any way unnecessarily antagonizing the owner or occupant of the ground or other local people.

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. MORE ON AN ENIGMA

Since I devoted considerable space to Lyndon LaRouche in the February issue, there has come to me a copy of a journal published by what is obviously a subsidiary of LaRouche's still active organization. It is the January-February issue of the bimonthly 21st Century Science & Technology, edited by a Carol White who is presumably the White mentioned in my article.[1]

The periodical does nothing to solve the political puzzle which I stated in February: Why does the concealed dictatorship in Washington want to suppress LaRouche? It does describe the way in which that alien government destroyed one of LaRouche's subsidiaries, the Fusion Energy Foundation.

A pseudo-legal terrorist, disguised as a Federal judge in Massachusetts, fined the Foundation $5,000,000 (!) for what he called "contempt of court." The Federal goons then rushed to the offices of the Foundation in Virginia and seized all of its assets. The tyrants then threw the Foundation into involuntary bankruptcy because it could not pay its debts with the funds the goons had seized. A neat operation and only typical of the terminal stage of the "democracy" beloved by Americans.

What is noteworthy is that there still was an honest judge in the Federal judiciary, specifically in the U. S. Bankruptcy Court. He investigated the case and wrote a decision of 106 pages, in which, as he is quoted in the periodical, he said that "the government's actions could be liken[ed] to a constructive fraud on the court, wherein the court may infer the fraudulent nature of the government's conduct."

As I have said, nothing in the issue of the periodical I have seen gives us a clue to the reason why the thugs in Washington have singled out LaRouche for their pseudo-legal frauds and terrorism. It challenges some political propaganda, but it should compensate for that by endorsing delusions, including Christianity, that serve to keep the boobs in spiritless and mindless subjection to their enemies.

Surely no one will take seriously the pseudo-scientific jabbering about the dire consequences of the "greenhouse effect" until archaeologists have discovered the ruins of the many factories which must have been belching their smoke and carbon dioxide into the atmosphere c. 20,000 B.C. to produce the "greenhouse effect" that ended the third Wurm glaciation. When such ruins are discovered, we can begin to worry about industrial activity in all the preceding glacial ages, back to the Pleistocene. But until such ruins are discovered, we must treat the current trepidation about a "greenhouse effect" as we treat other propaganda for the Jews' "One World."

Denying the "greenhouse" scare probably does annoy the Masters of Deceit, but they should be grateful for the accompanying denial of genetic science and the madcap claim that there are no races and no innate differences in the quality of anthropoids, so that the faster biological scrubs breed, the happier the world will be. And the Masters should be particularly grateful for the attempt to plaster LaRouche's Oecumenical Christianity over scentifically ascertained facts.

The major article in this issue is "Roger Bacon and the Birth of Universal Science," by Paul Greenberg, an article that we read with great sympathy because its author is one of the five who were thrown into prison along with LaRouche by the lawless government.

Greenberg begins with what is evidently part of the LaRouche ritual: a denunciation of "Isaac Newton's petty imperial mind" and all empirical science, which seems to be like the Roman Catholics' habit of crossing themselves to affirm their faith. He doesn't explain the ritual. For a clear statement of that we must turn to a review by one David Cherry of a recent book on Newton, where we are told that "Science is a moral enterprise, in which the scientist always seeks to learn how anyone of good will can draw closer to God by discovering His ways, for the propagation of His will, as a builder." A scientist, in other words, starts by befuddling his mind with illusions that are the very antithesis of scientific inquiry. He knows that the story of Cinderella is true because she wore a glass slipper, given her by her fairy grandmother.[2]

1. A valued correspondent informs me that there may be more than one "Carol White" and suggests an identification of the one connected with LaRouche as a woman whose real name he states. Another sends observations that may or may not confirm the suggested identification, which the woman denies. See addendum below.

2. I am sure the reader does not need to be told that the glass slipper was created by some early translator or scribe who mistook the French vair for vaire (modern verre). The mistake improves the story, as Per-

When one ignores the LaRouchean-Christian lubie, the article, after somewhat exaggerating or misdating the "technological progress" of the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries, gives an account of the work of Roger Bacon (c. 1214-c. 1292) that is, so far as I can tell, fairly accurate, except that, as a member of LaRouche's cult, Greenberg has to deny the Aristotelian thought that underlies Bacon's accomplishments in the observation of nature. Greenberg tells us that Bacon was the pupil of Grosseteste (c.1175-1253), but does not tell us that Grosseteste translated some of Aristotle's works, and was, of course, an Aristotelian in his methods of observing nature, although he wandered into a kind of Neoplatonism in his theological theories.

That Bacon was also a professed Christian is to be taken for granted in the Thirteenth Century, but when we try to define the actual beliefs of men of that time, we must not forget that they were prudent and, like Rabelais, expressed opinions jusqu'au feu exclusivement. There were atheists in the Thirteenth Century, probably including one of Greenberg's heroes, the great Hohenstauffen emperor, Frederick II, but even that bold monarch did not avow publicly such politically disastrous opinions,[3] and men of lesser rank had no desire to be roasted over a slow fire, which was the theologians' favorite means of proving the truth of their spiritual pretensions.

I have read no more than a hundred pages of Bacon's voluminous writings, and I have not seen the translations from which Greenberg quotes, but I feel convinced that Bacon was at least a deist, and was willing to identify the creative god in whom he believed with the one worshipped by the Church in which he was an ecclesiastic. In one passage, which Greenberg could have cited, he says that ancient writers, such as Aristotle, who investigated and ascertained the operations of nature, must have been directly inspired by his god. How much of Biblical mythology he believed is rault perceived. A glass slipper is not only something wonderful and fairy-like in itself, but it is rigid and would thus defeat the efforts of the women who tried to fit it onto their bigger feet, whereas a fur slipper (probably ermine, as befits princesses) would have been soon pulled out of shape.

3. He was accused of being the author of the famous and now lost treatise, De tribus impostoribus (i.e., the three scoundrels, Moses, Jesus, and Mahomet, who deluded their contemporaries with their fictions). It is most improbable that Frederick was the author, but it is quite possible that he had read and approved the iconoclastic book.

quite another question. He certainly expressed no doubts that would have been suicidal,[4] but some contemporary theologians believed him to be secretly a heretic; they may have been right, but we have no means of knowing. The basis of their accusation of heresy may have been no more than a perception that all scientific investigation of nature was deleterious to the superstitions that were their stock in trade.

It is not worthwhile to spend the time and energy needed to verify Greenberg's quotations and statements about Bacon's scientific achievements. The quotations seem to me to be accurate, and it is true that Bacon's achievements were amazingly great for his time. He probably did invent gunpowder and design, at least in imagination, a telescope, as he imagined a machine that would imitate the movement of a bird's wings and so enable men to fly. But these fanciful inventions were extrapolations from facts he had learned experimentally in the manner of Aristotle, and entirely apart from his Neoplatonic theological fancies.

There is one gross error that is significant since it illustrates the operation of a mental process quite commonly found among our political allies. Greenberg writes:

"The evidence that Bacon built a compound microscope and a telescope lies in a mysterious document, discovered in a chest in a castle in southern Italy by antiquarian Wilfrid Voynich in 1912.[5] This encrypted work [was] decoded in the 1920s by...William R. Newbold of the University of Pennsylvania.... Newbold's deciphering was dismissed as 'groundless'...after the untimely death of Newbold, when a neo-inquisition arose to suppress Bacon's work because of its potential to overturn the corpus of Aristotelian dogma."

This is what Greenberg says, although he has read or, at least, cites in his bibliography, an irrefragable demonstration that Newbold's "decipherment" was an illusion, because (a) Newbold takes as symbols not the characters of the otherwise unknown 'alphabet,' but small portions of them, probably marked off by

4. Polemics about the legal limitations of papal power and the corruption of the contemporary clergy are quite another matter. They might make a man unpopular, but were too well embodied in the traditions of the church and its internal competition to serve as a reason for overt persecution.

5. Greenberg cannot be charged with falsification here. He is following the cover-story told by Voynich when he agreed to conceal the name of the Italian family from whom he bought the unique and enigmatic manuscript as a profitable investment.

flaking of the ink on parchment, and (b) one of his symbols may represent two or even three letters of the Latin alphabet, thus permitting anagrams, of which the potential is seldom suspected even by persons who in the games of their childhood solved such puzzles as "Paddle your own OCEAN." Newbold's decipherment would permit one to find a statement in respectable Latin that I wrote the manuscript.

It is true that Newbold's prestige put into reference books for a while his claims that Bacon had invented a microscope and telescope, which were based more on what he had read in Bacon's known works and what he imagined the many pictures and diagrams in the manuscript to represent than on the scraps of text he had "deciphered." These statements naturally disappeared from reference works and the writings of responsible authors after the falsity of his "decipherment" was conclusively demonstrated.

For an excellent description of the Voynich manuscript, complete with photographs of some pages, and an account of the very many attempts that have been made to read it, see The Voynich Manuscript—an Elegant Enigma, by M(ary) E. D'Impero (Laguna Hills, California; Aegean Park Press, s.a.; still in print). I have written a fairly long critique for the author and publisher, but it does not deserve space in Liberty Bell.

The substance of the relevant facts is this. Palaeographic considerations, admittedly not conclusive, place the date of the writing in the Fifteenth Century or later. The first trace of the manuscript appears, perhaps significantly, in the time of the "Rosicrucian Enlightenment"[6] in the first part of the Seventeenth Century, when it was apparently in the possession of the celebrated British alchemist, fakir, astrologer, and spy, Dr. John Dee.[7]

6. On which see the magistral work of the late Dr. Frances A. Yates, The Rosicrucian Enlightenment (London, Routledge, 1972; paperback reprint still available).

7. For Dee's activities as a spy, which were greatly facilitated by his reputation as a master of astrological hocus-pocus, see Richard Deacon's History of the British Secret Service (New York, Taplinger, 1970), pp. 12-36, 41, with references to his biography of Dee. The latest work about the wily astrologer etc. is by Nicholas H. Clulee, John Dee's Natural Philosophy: Between Science and Religion (London, Routledge, 1989). The author is a partisan of his subject and does not sufficiently allow for the extent to which Dee's expressed opinions were shaped by opportunities for fraud and imposture.

The manuscript is either (a) a hoax, i.e., a meaninglessly mysterious concoction to support a fraudulent tale about a wonderful group of sages who had discovered cosmic secrets, or (b) a statement of a secret doctrine, probably influenced by the Hermetic corpus and the Jewish Kabbalah, and possibly by Dee's "Monas hieroglyphica," expressed in the specially devised symbols of an artificial language, i.e., a one-part code logically arranged.[8]

Greenberg, however, as a faithful hierodule of LaRouche and his Oecumenical Christianity, has to imagine a conspiracy and "neo-inquisition" to depreciate the work of Roger Bacon. It is the besetting sin of persons on our side to imagine conspiracies to account for events of which they emotionally disapprove but which are adequately explained by known causes, thereby providing material that our enemies use to deride "conspiratorial theories" and thus conceal the real forces that are hustling our race to the precipice over which nations disappear from history.

ADDENDUM

I have just received a letter from a man who may or may not be or have been a member of LaRouche's organization, of which he obviously has detailed knowledge. He informs me that "Carol White" is a Jewess, whose real name is probably Weiss, and is "one of the Jews who surround LaRouche and try to control the direction of his thinking and activity. They will probably have an easier time of it, now that he is out of the way, leaving the day-to-day supervision of his organization in their hands."

He further informs me that "LaRouche became a millionaire in the '60s through his computer consulting firm," and spent his own money to form his organization. I described the method by which the scoff-law government in Washington procured the fraudulent conviction of LaRouche, but my informant adds the very significant detail that at the trial at which LaRouche was convicted, "it was actually forbidden to mention in court that the reason the loan payments had stopped was that the government had seized the funds!" That is a memorable illustration of the way in which the terrorists who rule us use their hireling courts to give a sickly semblance of legality to their tyrannical oppression of our hated nation. At present, it is not expedient openly to treat Americans, who have not yet been disarmed, as the Semites in Palestine are now treated.

It is greatly to the credit of LaRouche, if, as my informant says, "both the Propositions 64 and 69 in California, requiring enforcement of the public-health laws against AIDS scum, were his work." Both were defeated by "saturation media propaganda," lavishly financed, more than $20,000,000 for that purpose having been raised in Hollywood alone, obviously from the Sheenies, because the quarantine, "if enforced, would not only reinstitute segregation of the races, but virtually decapitate the Jew/Liberal government."

The writer offers the explanation that "LaRouche was brought up in the socialism of the 1930s with its economic determinism and racial-equality theology, and has never entirely freed himself of it. But, in his intellectual development, he has virtually rediscovered National Socialism, except for biology."

He concludes that LaRouche "has shown both sincerity and effectiveness, and deserves better than you have given him [in my article in the February issue], though his racial blindness is a grave fault."

This information will elucidate to some extent the character of LaRouche, who, however, is much less important than the fact that the slightly disguised dictatorship's effort to eliminate him gives you an excellent indication of the viciousness of the government to which the American boobs voluntarily subjugated themselves. And it is significant that the imprisonment of the leader has placed his organization effectively under the unmitigated control of Jews, with proximate consequences that you will be able to predict for yourself. □

SOME QUOTABLE QUOTES FROM AMERICA'S DECLINE:

On the 18th Amendment (Prohibition): "Very few Americans were sufficiently sane to perceive that they had repudiated the American conception of government and had replaced it with the legal principle of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' which was the theoretical justification of the Jews' revolution in Russia."

On Race: "We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congolds unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor/publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavour to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of our Western culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change, or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

AIMING LOW

The British press in November and December was full of pontificating about the ruin of Count Nikolai Tolstoy, of the Russian noble family that produced an astonishing number of well-known novelists, including the author of Anna Karenina and War and Peace. One of two long articles in the Sunday Times, 3 December 1989, is perhaps the most reasonable—or rather the least unreasonable of the comments I have seen.

The present Count Tolstoy is an historian who has particularly concerned himself with the massacre of at least thirty thousand civilized Russians by collaboration between the British servants of the Jews and Stalin in 1945. (The comparable but greater crimes of the Americans are not at issue here.) You may remember his Victims of Yalta and Stalin's Secret Army, a book which distressed the British establishment by showing the close coöperation between ranking members of the British government and the Soviet enemies of civilization.

In his latest book, The Minister and the Massacres (London, Century-Hutchinson, 1986), Count Tolstoy alleged that the massacres were the result of a conspiracy headed by Harold Macmillian, whom Churchill had made "political adviser" to General (Field Marshall) Alexander, and who thus was able to use the General as an unwitting accomplice in the massacres by conspiring with his subordinates.

Tolstoy and his publishers were sued for libel by Lord Aldington.

Let not Baron Aldington's title make you think of Britain's hereditary nobility; he was a young man of twenty-five named Low in 1939, when Great Britain began to act on behalf of International Jewry, which had formally declared war on Germany almost seven years before, but naturally had to wait until its henchmen could mobilize gullible Aryans to do its fighting. Low, through merit or the kind of political corruption that came to dominante the American Army under Roosevelt, soared up to the rank of General, and, as General Low, issued the commands to the British forces that carried out the bloody crime against international law and the ethics of our race. After the war, Low became Chairman of the Board of one of Britain's largest and wealthiest insurance companies, and naturally a wealthy man himself. He was catapulted into the peerage in 1962 and chose the title, Baron Aldington.

When the Baron filed his libel suit, Tolstoy's publishers hurriedly weaseled out by arranging to settle for a mere £30,000, leaving poor Tolstoy, who was the real object of the British Establishment's wrath, to fight alone. (He received no real help from a man named Watts, who was prosecuted with him.) The trial took place before a British judge, who, if the press reports are to be trusted, was overtly hostile to the defendant. It was relatively easy for Low-Aldington to prove that he had acted under orders, a plea which suffices in civilized tribunals, but was ignored by the Americans when they obscenely murdered German officers to please the world's parasites. Tolstoy was simply crushed by a judgement for damages far exceeding what he could ever pay, plus the costs with which the loser is taxed in England, making the total he must pay the staggering sum of £2,500,000!

If the accounts of the trial in the press are to be trusted, I must concede that the verdict that Tolstoy was guilty of libel was legally correct, although the damages awarded were fantastically excessive, but I regret anything that redounds to the profit of Low-Aldington, who, again if the reports are to be trusted, must have sworn that when he had the unarmed men (and some women and children) "repatriated," with elaborate precautions to prevent them from committing suicide, he had no idea they would not be treated with kindness by the Soviets. I am reminded of the Chicago gangster who wiped out some members of a rival gang, and then, when on trial, swore he hadn't known his machine gun was loaded.

Tolstoy's ruin came—legally, at least—from an odd twist in his book. He alleged that the British part of one of the great instances of treachery and barbarity in modern history came from a conspiracy headed by Macmillan, who acted without the knowledge of Winston Churchill. That made officers who carried out orders that Macmillan had no authority to give participants in the conspiracy. I wish I knew whether this was Tolstoy's idea or was suggested to him by some adviser, possibly the weaseling publishers, who urged that the Establishment would not permit derogatory comments about Britain's greatest War Criminal.

Although one of the articles in the Sunday Times is devoted to laundering Macmillan, there can be no question but that he was morally quite capable of the crime of which he was accused. He was probably a traitor, and when Prime Minister certainly acted to shield traitors and enemy agents. He will be best remembered from the widely published photograph that showed him, attired for Ascot, doing his plebeian best to look like a haughty British nobleman, perhaps with foreknowledge that he would soon be jacked up into the peerage as Lord Stockton. What is wrong with Tolstoy's thesis is the notion that Macmillan, a born toady, would have dared to do anything more than sharpen a pencil without the approbation of his blood-thirsty boss.

The very fact that Churchill, in imitation of Soviet practice, appointed "political advisers" to keep commanding generals under surveillance and thwart, if possible, any tendency to observe the code of warfare on which civilized nations had agreed, was evidence in itself of where the real responsibility lay.

Had Tolstoy taken the reasonable and logical position that the crime was carried out on the orders of Churchill, whom British officers, by the rules and ethics of their profession, were obliged to obey, willingly or unwillingly, his position would have been legally as well as historically impregnable.

The historical facts may be definitely established in the awaited second volume of David Irving's Churchill's War. In the meantime, we must wonder what made poor Tolstoy aim so low the deadly projectile of his research and deliberately miss the logical target.

It would be a waste of your time to take notice of the bleating in the British press that the crime was justified by the "requirements of postwar policy" and especially the need to rush American money into Russia to bolster the régime of Roosevelt's accomplice. It is too late for journalistic sleight-of-pen to save the British Establishment. It was unable to prevent the publication of David Irving's Churchill's War[1] or the book by Peter Wright.[2] The hurried murder of the aged Rudolph Hess was botched, and so, in current idiom, was sensationally "counter-productive." Almost every day brings to light more evidence of the Establishment's Judaic viciousness and corruption.

I have just noticed the disclosure, by Aaron Moshel, a retired agent of Mossad, the Jews' agency for espionage and terrorism, that it was he who, on orders from his superiors, warned the notorious British traitor, Kim Philby, that his treason had been discovered by MI5 (which, of course, had been penetrated by the Jews' Mossad) and that his arrest was imminent. Moshel thinks it likely that Philby himself was an agent of Mossad, which sent him to the Soviet KGB. Philby, he says, was inspired (doubtless at Cambridge, where he became a satellite of Lord Rothschild) with hatred of his rather distinguished father's "anti-Semitism."[3] So Philby, who married a Jewess, naturally did his best to destroy his own race, nation, and civilization.

Intelligence and terrorist agencies are compartmentalized in an effort to prevent a given agent from learning more than he "needs to know" to carry out his mission.

3. Here, of course, the absurdity of the Jews' nonsense word, which they have made popular to impose on the thoughtless and disguise their own activities, becomes apparent. Harry St. John Philby, like his friend, T. E. Lawrence ("of Arabia"), was a great friend of the Semites and deplored their betrayal by Britain to please their vicious enemies, Yahweh's Yids. Moshel thus dissipates the foolish but generally accepted conjectures that Kim Philby became a Bolshevik and traitor in emulation of his father's friendship for Ibn Saud and vehement denunciation of the Jew-serving British government's policy to expose the Semites of the Near East to Jewish depredations. The elder Philby, who opposed Britain's war for the Jews and was illegally arrested and imprisoned in 1939, is now perhaps best remembered as the explorer of the Rub'a el Khali, which he described in The Empty Quarter (1933).

Moshel, who was not even told whether or not Philby was in the employ of Mossad, would not have known precisely how Lord Rothschild was related to either Philby or Mossad. That remains to be elucidated, but the Judaeo-British Establishment will, if necessary, do anything to protect its Yiddish darling.

THE VIKINGS' FAILURE

The New Scientist for 20 January 1990 is especially interesting. It contains on one page the latest in a long series that describe the dire effects that the much-touted "greenhouse effect" will have on the world, unless the industrial production of carbon dioxide is halted, which, as no one states specifically, can be done only by the "One World" government for which Yahweh's Yids have been agitating frantically since their victory in the war against our race in Europe.[1]

This article accompanies a map that shows what regions of the globe will be affected by the theoretical rise in the level of the ocean that is to be one of the theoretical consequences of the "greenhouse effect." According to the theoretical projection, there will be minor effects in civilized countries, but the most drastic effects will occur in such places as Bangladesh, where there will be a great contraction of the area in which the wogs can breed, as they now do, at a rate which, if one takes into consideration the longer periods of gestation and infancy in our species, puts the guinea pig to shame.

There is, of course, the usual hint that this consequence of the projected "greenhouse effect" will call for taxing the "richer nations," i.e., the Aryan boobs, and for importing into their countries more hordes of "refugees" to breed them out of their homes.

1. This is not to deny that there are grave ecological problems, ranging from preservation of whales, dolphins, and other friendly species that have as much natural right to this planet as we do and which we should value much more than the species of anthropoids that are our active or potential enemies, to the preservation of the tropical rain forests that are being destroyed to accelerate the breeding of biological trash and the profits of the usurers who finance that destruction with loans that will eventually be paid by the American boobs.

The same issue contains a really valuable and significant article, "Climate and History: the Westvikings' Saga," by John and Mary Gribbin. This reports the findings of the determination of climate in historical times by drilling deep into Arctic ice and extracting cores that show the prevailing climate's fluctuations since c. 500 A.D. There are some very interesting speculations about the effect of presumably world-wide climate on the end of the Roman Empire, but the most positive and significant results explain the fate of the Vikings' settlements in North America.

As late as the 1930s, the public schools in the United States provided some education for children instead of injecting the "One World" pus to blight their racial instincts and befuddle their minds. In those days every schoolchild knew that North America was discovered near the end of the Tenth Century by a Viking from Iceland, Eric the Red, who attracted Norse settlers to the land he called Greenland, and that Leif Ericson led colonists further south around the year 1000. Settlements were certainly established in Newfoundland, and almost certainly on the mainland in what is now New England.[2]

The new climatological data show that Eric the Red did reach a land that was then green and fertile and certainly a Greenland by contrast with the Iceland from which he had come. He arrived near the end of a warm period, called a "climatic optimum," and his settlements would have prospered exceedingly, had not a following period of very cold winters imposed unexpected hardships on the colonists. The climate became warmer again, so colonists were again encouraged.

The two settlements in Greenland became so relatively prosperous that in 1125 a Catholic Bishop was installed in a cathedral, a fairly large church built of stone, of which the foundations are still visible at Gardar. Christianity flourished in the usual way. The authors remark that "Two hundred years later, when the colony was already a hundred years older than the U.S. is now, the church owned about two-thirds of the best grazing land on the island." Although we may assume that the bishop hired servants to tend his herds, more or less inefficiently, the alienation of land that could have supported virile colonists and their families must have checked the expansion of the colony.

2. Archaeological evidence has proved there were Viking settlements in Newfoundland; it is highly probable that there were some on the coast of New England, but proof is lacking. For a non-technical account, see Westward to Vinland, by Helge Ingstad, translated by Erik J. Friis (London, Jonathan Cape, 1969).

As the climate became increasingly colder after the end of the warmer phase around 1225, life in Greenland became ever more difficult. The last bishop died in 1378 and was never replaced, and intercourse between the colonists and the mother country gradually ceased; they had no surplus to export, and the Scandinavian countries were distracted by internal struggles for power and occasional wars.

The Norse settlers were essentially farmers, depending for their livelihood on cultivation of the soil and raising cattle. They could live through cold winters, but were doomed when, around 1500, the summers became too short to permit crops to mature and hence to provide fodder for livestock. The frozen body of the last Norseman in Greenland was found by a ship driven to the coast by a storm in 1540.

As the authors say, "In round terms, the Greenland colonies survived for 500 years, from 1000 to 1500, so they were far from being complete failures: the United States of America have been independent for less than half that time."

The authors do not speculate about the fate of Norse colonies farther south. It is likely that they, having no firearms and only metal weapons that could not be replaced locally, were exterminated by the relatively multitudinous savages and by miscegenation. (Traces of white genes were found in Indian populations for centuries, even individuals who seemed to be White men but had degenerated to Indian customs. Compare the Guayakís of Paraguay.)

Now the fate of the members of our race who came so close to establishing civilization on this continent long before Columbus must be a subject of great interest and pathos to us, but the important point here is the climatic fluctuations from presumably global warming to global chilling that first permitted Norse settlements in Greenland and then made life there impossible for civilized men.[3]

Now, as you have surely seen for yourself, if only there had been a World Government in the year 1000, King Solomon II, from his exalted throne in Jerusalem, would have stopped the industries that were then producing the "greenhouse effect," thus either making settlements in Greenland impossible or assuring their perpetuity. If the latter, he would also have rushed shiploads of niggers to Greenland to teach the Norse about Civil Rights and thus exterminate that colony of the race his race has always hated above all.

If you want to worry about the future, that is the aspect of the "greenhouse effect" you should take to heart.

NORTH BY GOD

We must sympathize with Colonel Oliver L. North, although, of course, we cannot possibly respect him. Indeed, if he had not been a victim of perfidy and injustice, his name would excite only a moment of contemptuous amusement.

Although he probably participated in boyish shenanigans earlier, we had our first view of him when he and his bumbling boss, Admiral Poindexter, having crudely disguised themselves, as boys do when they play detective, sneaked into the Near East as special envoys, sent by the old ham actor in the White House, to deliver to the head of a Moslem nation his gifts, to-wit, a delicious cake and a copy of the Christian Bible with a quotation and signature personally inscribed by old Ronnie. The gifts may also have included a baseball and bat, and a sack of peppermint-stick candy, but there is no record of them.

It would seem that the purpose of that diplomatic mission was to deliver a gratuitous but calculated insult to the

3. The authors, in tune with the times, suggest that the Norse could have survived in Greenland if they had gone native and imitated the Eskimos. That is supposed to read us a lesson about the need to "adapt" ourselves—adapt ourselves, I suppose, to Christian folly and the importation of hordes of barbarians and savages to take over our country. We can at least be proud that when the climate made life impossible in Greenland, the Norse died like men. The frozen corpse found in 1540 was dressed in European clothes.

Moslem President, but the level of mentality displayed by all concerned is so low that we may think the overgrown boys hoped to convert the Moslem to Christianity and so make him aware of his duty to surrender his country to Yahweh's Yids.

The episode reminded my older readers of a delightfully comic film, "The Diplomaniacs," in which similar diplomacy had been enacted by the team of Wheeler & Woolsey, who were able to produce exquisitely ludicrous episodes without the noisome Yiddish vulgarity of their rivals, four Sheenies called Marx, doubtless in pious memory of Karl.

The boy colonel and his callow superior bobbed up again as Ronnie's agents in a complicated scheme to use in the interests of the Jews the Communist vermin whom the C.I.A. had installed in Nicaragua as part of the long-term plan to encircle the United States before openly occupying it.[1] The unfortunate people in Nicaragua who were trying to resist the local Bolsheviks were to serve as a pretext for further enriching Kikes in the armament business by paying them to supply weapons and munitions to Khomenei's Iranians and thus encourage them to continue their war against Iraq, a Moslem state that is an obstacle to the Jews' plans to annex all of the Near East to their Holy Land.

The international intrigue was so ineptly managed that, as everyone knows, it became a scandal which gave to some ambitious politicos in the Jews' Congress in Washington an opportunity to make noises and get their names in the newspapers. To what extent North was responsible for the blunders is uncertain, but on his behalf it may be said that part of the responsibility must fall on the persons who selected him for a task for which he was intellectually incompetent. He, like Ronnie, was given to babbling about "Bible prophecy" and "Armageddon" and "God's plan for his Chosen," and similar nonsense, and no man whose mind is filled with childish fantasies could be competent to carry out a clandestine mission in the real world.

1. It is now conceded that the C.I.A. engineered a couple of assassinations and subsidized a revolt to overthrow the Somozas, who had made Nicaragua as nearly stable and civilized as a mongrel country can be. I have some independent knowledge of the Somozas: a friend of mine was a classmate and friend of the Somoza who was educated at Northwestern University. Cf. Liberty Bell, October 1988, pp. 15-17, and the cited book by the younger Anastasio Somoza. Mr. Taylor, in the pages of Liberty Bell, accused the Somozas of tolerating Jewish predators in Nicaragua, but that was obviously the price they had to pay to avert American intervention for so many years. When the family was overthrown, there was the usual gabble about the "democracy" and filth that Americans love, but the C.I.A.'s purpose must have been to prepare Nicaragua for Communist occupation, so that it could serve as a base for a Communist take-over in Mexico, thus closing one jaw of the nutcracker on the American nut.

Old Ronnie did not have the manhood to avow his part in the transaction that had been made scandalous, and some of his subordinates, including the authors of two books I have noticed in these pages, hastened to pretend that the old actor was innocent and had been deceived by the wicked team of Poindexter & North. What was worse, Ronnie was such a craven coward that he did not even use his power to pardon his agents and thus save them from prosecution and persecution.

One sympathizes with an agent, however stupid, who has served a superior unworthy of him and suffered accordingly. One sympathizes with North even more because he was denied his right under the Constitution (to which lip-service is still given by the aliens and traitors in Washington) to a fair trial. Under the Constitution and under all Anglo-Saxon law since the Magna Carta, North was entitled to trial by a jury of his peers. Instead, according to all accounts, he was convicted by a pack of niggers, who used the opportunity to enjoy comfort and importance as long as they could.

Ever since that grotesque show trial I have felt sympathy for Colonel North, and I still do, although some member of his staff has picked me as sucker.

I have received a printed letter signed by Oliver L. North, in which he avers that he has done a lot of praying, by which, I suppose, he means that he talked to the clouds or the infinite void beyond them, and took some quirk of his glands for a reply. He avers that he believes "that, in the providence of God, nothing happens by accident to those who have committed their lives to Him." On this basis, he deduces that "His purpose" in afflicting him with all the tribulations he has undergone (and to do that, the omniscient god must have contrived the whole mess, perhaps including—who knows?—the civil war in Nicaragua) was just to give North a hint that he should found another play-pen for simple-minded "conservatives," and beg them for $25.00 or more a head.

I think that the boy colonel probably believes what he says, and I am still sorry for him, although I reflect that, given belief in so vicious a deity, who accomplishes his purposes by a kind of Rube Goldberg mechanism and wreaks havoc on thousands just to kick his votary hard enough to give him a hint—given belief in such a god, Aryan manhood would elect to perish as did the younger Ajax, defying the lightnings and the tempests of the gods who slay him.

I do not know how many hundreds of "conservative" and "anti-Communist" Alliances, Legions, Crusades, and the like have been launched during the past half-century and have wasted the money that hopefuls contributed to them. Two or three, perhaps even four or five, were founded by men (Major Pease, Colonel Hadley, et al.)[2] who had a conception of what was really at issue and hoped their organizations would grow to the point at which they could be used for a serious purpose. Quite a few were founded by men and women who, still intoxicated by the prevalent illusions, naively thought they could rally "Christian patriots" to fight what was, after all, a hobgoblin, and never perceived who were their real enemies. And many were founded by shrewd promoters who profited from Barnum's discovery that there is a sucker born every minute—a dictum which must be honored as sound sociological research, even though Barnum grossly underestimated the birth-rate.

After all these years and decades of continual futility and frustration, I can only marvel there can still be found Americans who will pay to chase will-o'-the-wisps around the Dismal Swamp called the United States. But there are such. "Conservatives" and "Christian patriots" seem never to learn from past experience, and, although it is impolite and unkind, one cannot help seeing an analogy in fish, who, after centuries of collective experience, still bite hooks concealed in wriggling worms.

2. I exclude from consideration here Robert the Welcher's Birch promotion. I gave some account of its origins in America's Decline, mentioned its later stage in Liberty Bell, May 1985, and intend to write its obituary and have done with it in some future issue.

Thus there may still be a place for North's Freedom Alliance, which is going to promote national defense, support freedom throughout the world (!), maintain "traditional Judaeo-Christian values," and so on and on. I won't list the rest of the objectives; you must have memorized them, having read them in a hundred begging letters.

So, if you want to join the boys and girls for another jolly romp on the playground, just send $25.00, or as much more as you want to throw away, to Oliver North's Freedom Alliance, P.O. Box 96700, Washington, District of Corruption, 20090. But if you are the kind of person who will do that, why are you now reading adult "literature"? Liberty Bell is for adults and only adults who have the courage to face the terrible and mind-withering reality of the present and, by understanding it, compute the relative chances of the possible ways in which some genetic nucleus of our race can survive the suicide of the Christianized majority.

THE VALUE OF THE UNIMPORTANT

There are thousands of books, many of them by diligent and judicious writers, that are utterly insignificant because they deal with merely local and ephemeral events which are mere motes in the long perspectives of history—even of the limited history of a given nation in a given part of a century. The best of such books, furthermore, are almost necessarily the dullest, because the conscientious author must devote paragraphs and pages to deciding, for example, whether a certain ship sailed on the first of November or on the eighth, and whether it carried 217 passengers or only 203—questions which, the impatient reader knows, really matter less than the proverbial tinker's 'damn!' in Hell, but which the scholarly author must answer in the interests of historical akribeia.

Such books, however, if by trustworthy authors, have the value of instructing us concerning the character and conduct of mediocre and ordinary men, the "common man" of sociological mythology, in a given society at a given time.

Everyone should read two or three such books that deal with local events in the United States during the Nineteenth Century, when the dragon's teeth of the present were carelessly sown. One such book is Earle R. Forrest's History of Washington County, of which I have cited an excerpt (December 1989, p. 13). Another is a book that has just been lent to me for a few days, Professor Walter O. Forster's Zion on the Mississippi—the Settlement of the Saxon Lutherans in Missouri, 1839-1841 (St. Louis, Concordia Publishing House, 1953). This volume of 620 pages gives a painstakingly accurate account of the migration of one group of c. 700 Germans, most of them from the Kingdom and Duchies of Saxony, to St. Louis in 1839.

The central figure in the story is, for our purposes, the least interesting, since he was an abnormality, and our concern is with the ordinary men and women whom he so strongly influenced, but we must therefore take some notice of him.

As Professor Forster refrains from telling us, Martin Stephan was not a German. He was almost certainly a Slav, born in Moravia and early left an orphan by parents of the very lowest social class. His native language was Czech, and although he later acquired an adequate command of German, he always spoke the language with a pronounced Czech accent.

The orphan was given little education, but was taught a trade, and it was as a journeyman weaver that he migrated from Bohemia to Breslau (in Prussian Silesia) in 1797, when he was twenty.

The young workman, spontaneously or shrewdly, found ways of commending himself to a group of Pietists, some of whom were persons of social position, whose emotional beliefs more or less coincided with those of the Moravian Brethren, the cult which, it will be remembered, greatly influenced John and Charles Wesley when they induced quite a few impressionable youngsters at Oxford to wear out the knees of their trousers while conversing with an imaginary super-ghost up in the clouds.

The Pietists charitably sent the pious young man to a German Gymnasium, where, however, he proved himself an inferior and incompetent student, who either could not or would not learn Greek and Latin. Had he been a German youth without an influential patron, he would have been summarily ejected, but instead, despite his academic failure, Count von Hohenthal financed for him five years at the Universities of Halle and Leipzig, where he frittered away his time by reading pietistic trash instead of studying, to show his contempt for "carnal erudition"—a contempt which, at least in later years, did not extend to other forms of carnal knowledge.

In 1810 the government of Saxony, doubtless on the recommendation of influential persons, appointed Stephan to the pulpit of the "Bohemian church" in Dresden. This was a part of the state-supported Lutheran Church, but it had been established for Bohemian refugees during the Thirty Years War and had thus been granted many privileges that were not enjoyed by the German churches. One of these permitted the appointment as minister of a man who did not have even the minimum academic qualifications for the position. Its congregation was almost confined to the descendants of the refugees, and Stephan delivered his sermons both in Czech and, for those who had neglected their ancestral language, in German.

So far as I can tell, the small Bohemian congregation of no more than thirty families had no part in what followed. His sermons in German, however, soon attracted wide attention. At this stage in his career, he is said to have preached in a sober and quietly authoritative style, and to have only later developed the techniques of an "ordained spellbinder."

He soon acquired great psychological skill in obtaining an ascendency over his auditors, and he attracted so many Germans that membership in the "Bohemian church" included more than a thousand persons from all parts of Saxony and even beyond its borders, most of whom, of course, could not travel to Dresden to hear him.

Stephan's astonishing success was the result of much more than concionatory expertise. He, by conviction or astute calculation, rode a contemporary wave of sentiment and opinion that was without a recognized champion, and he made himself a leader of it.

The Thirty Years War had ruined Christianity for thinking persons by demonstrating conclusively that there was nothing above the clouds except the void of interstellar space, and furthermore, the growth of scientific knowledge and critical acumen made belief in the myths patently irrational. Professor Forster quotes a clergyman who, around 1800, announced from his pulpit, "I declare every so-called revealed religion to be a lie." That man stated the obvious, but with a candor and honesty that is rare and almost unique in his profession. His colleagues were not quite so explicit, but, given the high educational standards of the State Church in Saxony, most of its clergymen were too learned to believe tales about incarnate gods, ghosts, and other violations of the known laws of nature, so their Lutheran religion became, in effect, virtually an ethical deism, dispensed by clergymen who thought of themselves as gentlemen, far above the mindless emotionalism of howling savages and of many still primitive and only superficially civilized members of the lower classes. Consequently, the parts of Luther's Augsburg Confession and Catechism that required belief in the impossible were openly abandoned or tacitly relaxed.

The orgy of conspiratorial crime and proletarian savagery called the French Revolution horrified educated men and, as Gibbon said, made them aware of "the danger of exposing an old superstition to the contempt of the blind and fanatical multitude." Many of them, not unreasonably, concluded that a revival of the absurd but venerable superstition was the best way of controlling the ignorant and thoughtless masses. They therefore lent their probably decisive support to a basically antithetical movement.

The French Revolution was as irrational as anything that preceded it and its apologists professed superstitions as preposterous as the religion they rejected because it then supported the civilization they wanted to abolish. Their vehement anti-clericalism was cleverly represented by adroit salvation-hucksters as the failure of human reason—a conclusion that naturally appealed to persons whose brains craved repose. Furthermore, the disasters that accompanied and followed the bloody frenzy in France stimulated in all the persons who had been born with what a friend of mine calls "incorrigible religiosity," a yearning for a blind faith that would permit them to shut off their minds and let their glands take over.

To such persons Stephan's lamentations about the "apostasy" of the rest of the Lutheran clergy and his insistence on unquestioning acceptance of Luther's Confession and Catechism, had the irresistible appeal that catnip has for cats.

They recognized as their champion the outspoken advocate of irrational faith and the vulgar emotionalism that went with it, and Stephan's verbal attacks on his fellow clergymen in the Established Church were proof that he was well acquainted with their terrible god. Accordingly, men and even women from all that part of Germany began to come to him for counsel about moral and domestic problems, and he had, by instinct or calculation, the art to give to each individual authoritative advice that was adjusted to his or her character and therefore gratefully accepted. He thus acquired an extraordinary prestige.

Stephan, furthermore, had the psychological acumen to exploit the emotional naïveté of adolescents, especially theological students, and send them into fits of terror in which they could almost smell the singeing of their boots by the fires of Hell. He thus induced an insane remorse for their sins and an expiatory asceticism and self-torment that often drove them into nervous breakdowns. This, oddly, made them blindly devoted to him. Professor Forster remarks on the fact that when Stephan finally led his sheep to green pastures in the New World, almost all of his influential followers were still below the age of thirty, i.e., were still adolescents in terms of social theory.[1]

By such methods the whilom day laborer acquired a large following and became, in effect, the heresiarch of a cult that is called Stephanism.

Professor Forster's well-documented account makes it obvious that the commonly accepted story that Stephan and

1. In social theory, as distinct from physiology, men's lives are divided into periods of approximately fifteen years, thus: 0-15, childhood; 15-30, adolescence; 30-45, youth; 45-60, maturity; 60-x, senility. The effective work of the world is always controlled by men of 45-60, subject only to the power and authority that a few men retain in senility.

his Stephanites came to the United States because they were "persecuted on account of their religious opinions" is only some of the hogwash to which Americans are fatally susceptible.

They were not persecuted in Saxony. On the contrary, if we take into account the social and governmental standards of the time, they were shown an extraordinary tolerance.

For one thing, Stephan's activities were illegal. The special privileges accorded to one church in Dresden and to him as its pastor had been designed in the Seventeenth Century for the accommodation of a congregation of foreigners, Bohemian refugees, and with the expectation that they would eventually return to their own country when peace finally broke out. Those privileges did not authorize expansion of the congregation of that one small church to include Germans from all parts of Saxony and even other German lands and thus to create what was actually a sect or separate church within the Established Church, but still subsidized by the Saxon government. The government of Frederick Augustus II, and no doubt the King himself, looked on these activities with disfavor, but took no action to stop them.

Stephan's fellow clergymen, whom he reviled for their apostasy, were naturally annoyed and sometimes retorted polemically in sermons and rarely in writing, but they seem to have made no attempt to organize an opposition to him.

Stephan was "persecuted" legally for personal eccentricities that would have got him into trouble anywhere and certainly in the United States at that time.

It was his custom to take long walks, usually into the forest, at midnight. He explained to the authorities that he was afflicted with insomnia in the hours when normal people slept, and that his health required the long walks. What he did not explain was why his health required the companionship of females, unmarried or separated from their husbands. He certainly did not explain successfully this requirement of his health to the wife whom he left at home with numerous children when he went on his nocturnal excursions.

When a man emerges from a dark forest at 5:30 A.M. with one or two women on his arm or arms, the sexual morality of good society at that time automatically drew a censorious inference.[2] But still the authorities took no legal action.

On his excursions, Stephan sometimes went to nocturnal assemblies, usually in the vineyard lodge of one of his followers,[3] and on 1 February 1836 one such assembly after midnight apparently became so boisterous that the police raided the establishment and arrested the holy man for disturbing the peace. Thus Stephan, who had already matured plans for leading his flock to Missouri, could indignantly claim that he was being persecuted.

We may charitably assume that Stephan was afflicted with the megalomania that often accompanies a sudden rise from the lowest social stratum to a position of great authority over others. To use the phrase made current by the sociologically perspicacious novels of Paul Bourget, one can never brûler les étapes without peril—not even in a relatively open society. The very willingness of so many individuals who were socially, culturally, and educationally far superior to him to accord him an uncritical veneration and virtually unlimited authority was enough to turn a head stronger than that of the erstwhile day laborer from Bohemia.

2. Now that women have been liberated to promiscuity, many of our contemporaries do not understand how uncompromising were the standards of sexual morality that prevailed in the respectable society of all civilized countries in the Nineteenth Century and until the First World War. In one of Mary Roberts Rinehart's early and very popular novels, the heroine, a girl of good family, accepts a ride in the automobile of a young man who simulates a breakdown on a lonely road and thus delays her return home until long after midnight. Since Society will not give her the benefit of the doubt, she can avoid ostracism only by agreeing to marry the cad. In the novel, of course, she is saved in the nick of time by a train wreck and its consequences.

3. What happened to his females during these visits is not clear, but it is likely they attended the party with him. On a later occasion, when the police raided one of the nocturnal meetings before Stephan arrived, he sent his woman to reconnoitre and it was only by chance that the police found him hiding in the bushes, for the devoted woman did not betray him. At this point, another woman devoted to his holiness appears in the story, and it is not clear whether she also came with him or was already present at the religious rout in the vineyard.

But even if we make this allowance, we cannot avoid the conclusion that Stephan by his subsequent conduct, his flouting of all authority and open defiance of it, was deliberately and cunningly provoking "persecution," perhaps even one case in which he could claim to have been proved innocent,[4] in order to create a crisis in which he (and his followers) would have no alternative but to execute his long-standing and detailed plan for an hejira to a land in which his followers would be isolated strangers and thus even more totally subject to the absolute monarch they had piously put over themselves.

Stephan soon succeeded in so embroiling himself that he was under house arrest in the custody of policemen and awaiting trial on numerous charges, both financial and moral, when the gracious interposition of the King enabled him to join his followers on one of the five ships they had chartered for migration to "freedom from persecution" in the United States.

Now all the foregoing account would be otiose—for the recently notorious Bakker was by no means the inventor of satisfying ways to Praise the Lord—if this summary had not been necessary to point the significant lesson that all the scandals and acts of wanton defiance not only did not weaken the veneration accorded Stephan, but served only to confirm it and make it the more total. This was true of both the laymen and the clergymen whom Stephan had enlisted as his coadjutors or, rather, bailiffs.

After the débâcle, the educated Stephanites sought to exculpate themselves by claiming that Stephan had "deceived" them, but the very multiplicity and variety of the charges against him and his indubitable guilt of some of the

4. He was prosecuted as the father of a young girl's unborn bastard, but eventually absolved when the girl finally named another man as the father. That the case went so far before her announcement will suggest to evilly suspicious minds that she absolved Stephan because he was a Man of God and at least gave him the benefit of a doubt. I am reminded of an incident at a trial that an acquaintance of mine attended ex officio. The young wife of a soldier at an army camp was on trial for murder, and when the prosecuting attorney asked her whether the month-old baby she had thrown into a snowbank was her husband's child, she rolled her luminous eyes at him and asked innocently, "How could I tell?"

alleged offenses is proof that either those men had been made superstitious to the point of insanity and believed that whatever the godly Stephan did was sanctified by divine authority, or they were bound to him by self-interest as his confederates.

The migration and projected "Canaan in the Wilderness" was not an experiment in communism, as were almost all of the madcap colonies planted in the same era, of which I have suggested Mark Halloway's Heavens on Earth (2d ed., New York, Dover, 1966) as the most concise and inclusive survey.[5] Stephan's plans for the migration—although the details were worked out by several committees, including experienced laymen, lawyers, physicians, and merchants with international connections, the committees instantly reversed their findings at a word from their godly master, so Stephan may properly be described as the author of the plans finally adopted—his plans, I say, were economically sound and practical.

Summarized, the plan called for each migrant to contribute all of his available resources to a treasury from which would be paid all the common expenses of transportation and residence in Missouri until the colony was established on a large tract of land to be purchased for that purpose. The contributors could expect to recover part of their investment when they purchased land from the colony, and the rest when the colony was prosperous and had a surplus. Persons who had to borrow from the common fund would repay the loans, perhaps with interest, as soon as they could.

Such a colonizing expedition of seven hundred men, women, and children[6] could be successful only if led by a man with dictatorial powers, and it was only reasonable for Stephan to appoint himself to that position. But he obviously intended more. He appointed himself Bishop of the Lutheran Church—the whole Lutheran Church, which, by definition, consisted of Stephan and his adherents—and required each member of the expedition to sign a "Pledge of Subjection," an amazing document that pledged absolute and unquestioning obedience in word, thought, and deed to their godly Bishop, who was thus invested with a power that any Pope of the Roman Church would have envied.[7] The pledge was signed by even the clergymen, who doubtless were satisfied that, in return for virtual enslavement to their holy master, they would in turn, as his agents, exercise an absolute power over the laymen under them.

6. The actual number who embarked was 665; one ship, carrying only 56 persons but heavily laden with goods and supplies was lost at sea, and there were births and deaths en route, so the number that reached the United States was 602. Many families were broken in the migration; Stephan set the example by abandoning his wife and all but one of his children, but he did ask the government of Saxony to support his discarded family. A number of persons under age, chiefly adolescent girls, were taken without the knowledge or consent of their parents and smuggled onto the ships in various ways, doubtless to ensure the salvation of their souls.

There are clear indications of Stephan's plans for the future. He had roseate dreams that when thousands of Germans had followed him to a growing colony in an isolated region of the United States,[8] he would have a little theocratic empire of his own. He would promote himself to Archbishop—'Autocrat' would have been a better title—and the six pastors would become bishops slavishly obedient to him, while the nine candidates for ordination would become pastors, augmented by new arrivals from Germany, and they, as agents of the Archbishop, would govern every detail of the waking life of the colonists. Thus God, alias Stephan, would have a holy domain almost as self-contained and autonomous as Brigham Young's in Utah.

It was Stephan's plan and it was he who ruined it. He began by insisting on the inclusion of a comparatively large number of indigent individuals who could contribute nothing (but flattered him adequately), thus forcing the others to pay their expenses. The inclusion of so many of the indigent could be defended as charity or even as a plan to provide bondservants in the New World, but it placed an inordinate burden on the treasury. The clergy were mostly, but not quite entirely, free-loaders, entitled to the best of everything that Stephan did not take for himself, and they were a sufficient drain on a treasury that was barely adequate, even though it seems to have received considerable sums from prosperous Germans, including at least one nobleman, who sympathized with an undertaking in which they took no part.

7. This pledge of perpetual obedience was in addition to signed acceptance of the detailed and generally sensible rules of procedure and conduct (pp. 566-583 in Forster's book) from embarcation to final settlement in the projected colony.

8. Hundreds actually did follow him in the emigration or were about to do so when the débâcle occurred; and it is quite likely that, had the colony proved successful, several thousand Germans would have migrated to it, seeking to join the only true Lutheran Church and thus escape the damnation and eternal torment that awaited all who remained in Sodom (i.e., Saxony) or hoping to become prosperous or more prosperous in the fabulous Land of Opportunity. Stephan's ambition was not so fantastic as it may seem at first sight.

Stephan not only drew money at will from the treasury for his personal use, but made everything expensively subordinate to his convenience, comfort, and vanity. Here are a few examples. Although space on sailing ships was at a premium, the ship that carried him had also to carry his coach, evidently a large and elaborate vehicle, for it proved to be too heavy for American roads and had to be replaced in St. Louis. In New Orleans, a special couch had to be purchased and installed on a river boat to ensure his comfort by day on the voyage upstream. An abundance of choice wines and esculent delicacies had always to be supplied for his table. Although most of the emigrants had to dwell in cheap and crowded quarters, some with two or three families in one room, Stephan soon had in St. Louis a comfortable episcopal residence in which he could enjoy the company of five or six women at a time, some of whom, at least, were complaisant in personal service to God's chosen servant and later confessed to having been his concubines, and some of whom, including a married woman, were rewarded from the treasury for unstated services. Nevertheless, if you can believe unanimous testimony, no one, clergy or laymen (except the women themselves and, perhaps, a cuckolded husband who soon deserted the colony), had at this time the slightest suspicion that there was anything improper or unchaste in Stephan's personal life!

His philogyny, so long blandly ignored (or, if you can believe them, unsuspected) by his adherents, both clerical and lay, in both Saxony and America, became the ostensible cause of Stephan's downfall. In St. Louis, he had four concubines on a more or less permanent basis, and quite possibly an additional four or more as opportunity offered. We can forgive any man for susceptibility to the charms of the lovable sex—any man, that is, except a dervish, who professionally drives his auditors into hysterics with vivid descriptions of the eternal torment that awaits persons guilty of sin, including the awful sin of fornication. That is what cancels any sympathy we might otherwise feel for a man who was either a religious fanatic or a shrewd purveyor of ghost stories.

The efficient cause of Stephan's downfall, however, was not his libidinous recreations. His management of the migration was generally sound until he was installed in St. Louis, where his prudence seems to have deserted him. He appears to have been principally interested in obtaining vestments, paraphernalia, and plate suited to his episcopal eminence, and in architectural plans for the episcopal palace from which he would rule the colony that had yet to be founded. He neglected active direction of the enterprise at its most crucial stage, except for a kind of paranoid fear lest any of his sheep escape from his control.

It was, I think, his failure to assume active and vigorous direction of the efforts to find land suitable for his colony that was the primary cause of the excessively long and financially ruinous stay of the emigrants in the comparatively expensive city of St. Louis. At the same time, he forbade them to accept employment for a period longer than one day. Thus they were compelled to seek jobs as transient and unskilled workmen, often at wages of only twenty-five cents a day, although the majority of his followers were craftsmen whose skills were in demand in the bustling and booming city, and whose wages would have partly replenished the sadly depleted treasury.

Professor Forster is almost certainly right in deciding that what insured the ruin of the undertaking was Stephan's peremptory refusal of a large tract of excellent land, advantageously near St. Louis, offered on very generous terms by an American sympathizer—a refusal for which the only conceivable motive was Stephan's determination to locate his "new Canaan" in a wilderness remote from contact with un-Lutheran (i.e., un-Stephanite) Americans, who might exert a seductive influence on some of his flock.

The constantly diminishing treasury soon became inadequate for the purchase of good land anywhere, and the site eventually chosen, after long delay, in Perry County was of land of dubious fertility, much of it dank and unhealthy, and otherwise unattractive. The purchase, however, virtually exhausted the treasury, although a large part of it was obtained at the price of $1.50 an acre. But even so, it is hard to believe that some more promising site could not have been found at the same cost.

(The scale of contemporary prices reported by Professor Forster is instructive in a more important connection. Oak timber cost $1.50 a hundred feet. A two-storey house of logs was built for $10.00. A frame house with conventional clapboard siding could be built for $20.00. A comfortable house and lot in a new town cost $30.00. An ordinary nigger cost from $800.00 to $900.00. If you will ponder the contrast of these prices, you will understand much of the righteousness of the Abolitionists, who precipitated the barbarous and fratricidal war that devastated the most cultured of the theretofore united states and destroyed the American Republic.)

Stephan, either because he did, or because he did not, perceive that matters were approaching a crisis, became most injudiciously despotic. He had become too exalted to admit most of his followers to his august presence. He would not tolerate even the slightest and most tentative disagreement.

Offended by a remark in a sermon that had not been submitted to his censorship, he even punished one of the clergymen, on whom his power really depended, by separating the man from his wife and placing her under the jurisdiction of another clergyman until the offender humbly begged leave to apologize and atone for his indiscretion. What is most significant, however, is that this despotic treatment of the erring pastor was not only countenanced, but was openly approved by his clerical colleagues, who, instead of resenting their despot, were, as Professor Forster notes, engaged in "jockeying for power and control" under him.

Laymen, even if gentlemen, were dealt with more summarily. Merbach, the lawyer who was devoted to Stephan, had given him indispensable assistance in many legal matters, and had done the administrative work in arranging the emigration, displeased the master, was denounced for "slavery to his wife, love of this world, [and] ambition," was placed under a ban that made all the others shun him, and saw his wife confined in a kind of house arrest until the offending dog came to heel and abjectly begged pardon. But again, this outrageous and almost insane conduct was evidently approved by all the others, one of whom recorded as the "most remarkable day" of his life the day on which he first heard muttered criticism of the holy Bishop.

A detachment of the party was sent to occupy the land in Perry County, settle it, and prepare the way for their fellows, who were still precariously and penuriously existing in St. Louis. Since the treasury was exhausted, the settlers could not borrow money for plows, oxen, and other agricultural necessities or for provisions to take with them. They underwent great privation and hardship, suffered and sometimes died from fevers induced by the unwholesome location, and might have all perished, but for the charity of some Americans in the vicinity, from whose damnable impiety Stephan had designed to isolate them. This part of the narrative will excite pity in the hardest heart, but need not be summarized here.

It was then that Stephan made his last blunder. He went to Perry County to inspect the settlement.

His absence suddenly made his chief adherents aware of a smouldering resentment of his tyranny and especially of the bankruptcy of the enterprise. By a very odd coincidence, two of Stephan's concubines suddenly acquired conscientious scruples and confessed to their clergymen, who were amazed by the revelations and further astounded when other women complained of Stephan's sexual advances, which they, perhaps truthfully, claimed to have resisted. The holy men all asserted that never, never had they had the least suspicion that the Bishop could conceivably be guilty of such awful wickedness, and their righteous indignation soon produced unanimity in a conspiracy to overthrow him.

The most adroit of their number was despatched to Perry County to engineer a coup d'état and drive the despot from the holy communion he had profaned by fornication.

The emissary was shrewd and prudently crafty. He enlisted the resident dervish in the conspiracy and secretly they prepared a revolution that took Stephan by surprise.

The first objective of such a revolution, of course, is to make certain that the deposed despot can never regain his power. It was not necessary to assassinate him. He was abused, humiliated, forced to sign a degrading abdication, stripped of almost everything except his clothes, put in a rowboat, and taken across the Mississippi to Illinois, where he was landed with an emphatic reminder of his promise never to return to Missouri. It had been intended to leave him almost penniless in Illinois, but the treatment he received makes us glad that the old scoundrel had somehow been able to conceal and take with him $700 in currency, which was probably more than the combined worth of all the personal property owned by his whilom colonists in Perry County. We must add, however—alas! frailty, thy name is woman!—only one of his concubines was loyal enough to follow him into exile.

This is the end of the story that need concern us. The ranking clergymen assumed that they had inherited the hierarchical power of the tyrant they had deposed and could rule almost as despotically as he had, but the few educated laymen, profiting by their example, revolted and forced the installation of a new régime in which they had their share of power. Nothing, however, could save the bankrupt and demoralized enterprise, and it collapsed. Its one surviving accomplishment was to bring to Missouri a number of Germans that eventually served as the nucleus from which the youngest and most talented of Stephan's clergymen, Carl F. W. Walther, years later, formed the organization that eventually became the Lutheran Church: Missouri Synod.

After the fall of Stephan, his influential followers agreed that he was responsible for everything that had gone wrong, claiming that they had vigorously protested all of his blunders, although their signatures to many documents give them the lie. They also claimed that they were astounded when they discovered his erotic predilections. Many of them wrote and published books to prove their child-like innocence of all wrongdoing or acquiescence in it.

Now the grave problem posed for us by Stephan's career is, how was it possible for him to retain for so long so complete an ascendency over educated and presumably not unintelligent men?

There is nothing puzzling about the heresiarch's control over the majority of his followers, who were uneducated and could be scared into piety and obedience by the customary verbal terrorism and hypotyposic depiction of the red-hot grills on which sinful ghosts would sizzle and scream, not merely for five or ten thousand years, but for all eternity. But how can we explain the conduct of men who should—who must have known better?

For example, Vehse, who resigned as Curator of the Saxon State Archives to follow Stephan, must have been a man of wide and varied learning; and must furthermore have been familiar with life at the Royal Court and learned from it. Merbach, mentioned above, was a successful lawyer and must have learned something about human nature. Neither can have been naïf.

The clergymen, educated at reputable universities, must at least have been familiar with the sorry history of Christianity and the shabby tricks of the theologians who, century after century, fought for prestige and power by contriving alembicated doctrines about matters that were patently unknowable. Furthermore, they presumably were not without a general culture and some knowledge of history. There are only two bits of specific evidence in the book. Löber kept his diary in Latin; the quotations from it are too brief for me to pronounce about his stylistic attainments and, anyway, one does not expect literary quality in memoranda of quotidian events. When Bünger and Walther had to work out the details of their conspiracy in crowded quarters, they conversed in Latin; they may not have spoken with Terentian elegance, but they must have had an effective command of the language to discuss all the details of a complicated and delicate operation, and attain by argument a working accord.

When we consider the incredible naïveté of the clergy, the crucial question is one on which there is no evidence, unless Professor Forster has pudically suppressed it. Did any or all of the holy men emulate the Bishop's philogyny, perhaps on a more modest scale, in keeping with their lower rank?

Aphrodite is a gracious and lovely goddess, whose divinity will certainly outlast the repute of vulgar gods, but, as Hippolytus learned, she has a power that none can defy with impunity. And although paederasty has always been in vogue among the holy men of a religion that began with strident misogyny, the better ecclesiastics have always appreciated the alternative, when it was available. A staunchly Roman Catholic author of the fin du siècle—Barbey d'Aurevilly, if recollection serves me—knew Parisian priests who boasted that they had had sexual intercourse with every desirable woman in their parish. Protestant divines may not have equaled such records, but many of them have tried, and some have successfully relied on married or unmarried Hester Prynnes to shield them, even at the cost of their own reputations.[9]

If some or all of Stephan's priests believed that their god would not deny recreation to his valiant soul-catchers, they protected each other and presented a solid front of credulous virtue to the world. We may speculate, but, as I have said, there is no available evidence.

Discarding then an undemonstrable conjecture, we are left with the only other plausible explanation of the conduct of the educated men who were so subservient to Stephan: they were bound to him by self-interest, seasoned, no doubt, by belief in the truth or the utility[10] of the brand of religion he professed. In Saxony, the clergymen chose between the secure but boring mediocrity of a commonplace life as pastors in the State Church, and an opportunity to become the authoritarian spiritual and social arbiters of congregations who could not escape them, in a new land that it would be interesting and perhaps exciting to visit, as they never could otherwise. There would certainly be novelty. There might even be safe adventures. All this was to be had for obedience to a parvenu, who, however, had the charismatic power to move multitudes. They took care to be discreetly blind to his indiscretions. They cannot have foreseen, of course, to what lengths of arrogance and folly their leader would go.

9. According to a sociological study reported in Christian News, 12 February 1990, one in ten Protestant clergymen confessed (in confidence) to having carried on a liaison with one or more married or unmarried women in his congregation, and one in four confessed to having had "some kind of sexual contact" with women in his congregation, evidently without specifying whether the "contact" had included some form of sexual intercourse. Virtually all admitted they had been "sexually interested" in some of their female parishioners. It is most unlikely that holy men were less susceptible to the allicience of femininity in the Nineteenth Century.

After they reached the United States, they were more or less at Stephan's mercy. Even if they had the funds needed for a return to Saxony, they would have to make an humiliating confession of error and defeat, and sue, perhaps in vain, for restoration to the appointments from which they had so confidently resigned. In Missouri, they enjoyed comfort and security under Stephan, and, given the cult's hierarchical structure, they enjoyed virtually unlimited power over their congregations, so long as they retained the Bishop's favor. If they defied him, they would be ejected from the cult, disgraced in the eyes of the other German and the American inhabitants of St. Louis, have shamefacedly to repudiate their unequivocal testimonies in his favor, and perhaps be left stranded and penniless in a strange land, thousands of miles from home. Consequently, they studiously maintained ignorance of his eccentricities and vices, and "jockeyed for power and control" under him, so long as virtual bankruptcy did not make certain the proximate collapse of the enterprise.

When they all saw that Stephan had come to the end of the road and had no future, they united to depose him in their own interest and in order to save what they could from disaster. And since they could not avow their true motives, they had to concoct apologies for their conduct which neither Professor Forster, for all his good will toward them and their religion, nor we, who are less kind, can believe.

10. This very important factor should never be overlooked, as does Professor Forster, who, for some reason, pretends that only religious faith is involved in religious transactions. Many of the most sincere and generous supporters of religious cults have been atheists. I remember the manufacturer who, to the horror of his eavesdropping wife, told me, over excellent Scotch, that he naturally did not believe silly stories about the supernatural, but contributed generously to his church because he believed faith in the impossible to be both psychologically salubrious for many simple-minded believers and an indispensable force for the maintenance of social stability.

I have tried to illustrate the profit to be derived from a critical reading of even dull and tedious books of this kind about intrinsically unimportant events, and to assure you that such a reading will enhance your understanding, not perhaps of the crude human nature that is common to all races, but certainly of the nature and innate character of most of your fellow Aryans. The book I have considered here is especially valuable, since that normal nature and character is exhibited, not by vulgarians, but by cultivated and educated men in a century that preceded our own and was far less corrupt.

The nature and character that is normal in our species is something you must understand before you try to influence such men today on behalf of our imperiled nation and race. □

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. LÜGE UND WAHRHEIT

("Falsehood and Truth")

Translation by Charles E. Weber

April 1940 witnessed the first large-scale military action of the Second World War other than that in Poland and naval engagements. In conjunction with the fiftieth anniversary of the struggle between England and Germany for the control of Norway, it is appropriate that we reëxamine the background of this struggle.

The following is the fourth translation from the Kritik series, nos. 60 and 61, letter no. 17. Previous translations were published in Bulletins nos. 28 (on the German declaration of war against the United States), 34 (on the reprisal action against the town of Lidice) and 40 (on the responsibility for the outbreak of the Second World War). These three previous translations were republished in the Liberty Bell, issues of October 1988, June 1989 and October 1989.

For information about the Kritik series, nos. 61 and 62, see the introduction of Bulletin 28.

It is a lie that Adolf Hitler ordered the occupation of Denmark and Norway 40 years ago because this was a further preliminary step in his "program of world conquest."

It is the truth that after the victorious conclusion of the campaign in Poland there were no intentions on the part of Germany whatsoever to impair the neutrality of the Scandinavian countries. In a secret memorandum from Adolf Hitler for the General Staff dated 9 October 1939 there is the following in this connection: "The Nordic countries: Their neutrality, even in the future, must be assumed to be probable unless entirely unforeseen factors arise. The continuation of German trade with these countries seems possible even if the war lasts a rather long time." (Brennecke, Die Nürnberger Geschichtsentstellung, page 234 [=The Nuremberg Distortion of History]).

On the following day Grand Admiral Raeder called Hitler's attention to the fact that intelligence information in this regard existed to the effect that England was planning to occupy strongpoints in Norway. As early as 12 September 1939 Churchill [at that time First Lord of the Admiralty] had requested in a memorandum that Germany be cut off from the importation of iron ore from Scandinavia. On 19 September 1939 he presented a further memorandum to the Cabinet, about which he writes in his own memoirs: "This morning I pointed out to the Cabinet how important it is to prevent the transportation of Swedish iron ore from Narvik along the Norwegian coast." (Der Zweite Weltkrieg, volume II, page 50). On 29 September 1939 Churchill urged the mining of Norwegian waters.

At first, Hitler reacted to these questions simply by saying that he would investigate them. In the winter of 1939-1940 reports were accumulating that English spies were gathering information about landing possibilities and harbor capacities in Norway and investigating the capacity of Norwegian railways and the location of land and sea airfields. On 16 December 1939 the Allied chiefs of staff were ordered to prepare plans for a possible invasion of Scandinavia. It was even publicly known that the British were not about to respect Scandinavian neutrality. On 6 February 1940 they demanded of Norway and Sweden, almost as an ultimatum, that they were to be given permission to land several divisions in Narvik and, using the Norwegian-Swedish ore railway, to proceed as far as the ore region of Gällivare and to occupy the Swedish harbor of Lulea. Aid to Finland in opposition to the U.S.S.R. was given as a reason, but this was only a pretext, since the western powers had also not declared war against the U.S.S.R. after the invasion of Allied Poland by the Russians.

On 16 February 1940 British sailors of the destroyer Cossack boarded the unarmed German supply ship Altmark in Norwegian waters and shot seven men of the merchant marine crew. Following that, on 1 March 1940, Hitler approved the "Weser Exercise" Plan, that is, the occupation of Norway and (as a country of passage) Denmark, "if the situation demands it." Three days prior to that Churchill had declared that he was tired of considering the rights of neutral countries.

By this time, on both sides preparations were underway for an occupation, in the case of which the western powers were contemplating the occupation of Norway and Sweden, while Germany contemplated the occupation of Denmark and Norway. For the British home fleet the order was issued to commence the occupation of Norway by British, French and Polish troops on 5 April 1940. Accordingly, on 5 April 1940, at the same hour in London and Paris, the British Foreign Minister, Lord Halifax, and the French Prime Minister Reynaud received the ambassadors of Sweden and Norway and handed them a note in which it was stated: "England and France have the right to block off the supplying of Germany with raw materials necessary for its conduct of the war...."

For reasons which have never been fully explained, even today, the start of the British-French action was postponed to 8 April 1940, so that German troops, which landed on 9 April, were ahead of the Allies by a few hours. Thereupon the Allied landing troops turned back.

On 9 April 1940 the German ambassadors explained in notes the reason for the German occupation, which was undertaken for the protection of the neutrality of the countries because these countries could not take on the protection themselves. The Danish Council of Ministers decided to accept the German protection and to order that no military actions be undertaken against the German troops. The Norwegian government, however, had already mobilized its troops during the night, which then offered resistance. As early as December 1939 Vidkun Quisling had already expressed his fear to Raeder that an agreement between England and Norway concerning the occupation of Norway was already extant. French and British general staff officers had investigated the terrain. They had been oriented by Norwegian military authorities about the logistic conditions of the country. The boarding of the Altmark had not been protested before German pressure was exerted, and only with a limp protest at that.

When, on 6 April 1940, British and French ships laid mines at three locations in Norwegian territorial waters, the Norwegian government responded simply with a note of protest without making an attempt to attack with Norwegian naval vessels the British ships which were guarding the mine barriers.

Previously 1,000,000 tons of Norwegian shipping space had already been chartered to England on a long-term basis with the approval of the Norwegian government, space which England needed urgently for supply. The order had been given to the Norwegian coastal batteries and ships not to fire on English naval vessels, but certainly to fire on German naval vessels in case they penetrated Norwegian territorial waters. Likewise, English and French landing troops were not to be resisted.

Norway had thus distanced itself from a strict neutrality. Since it was neither willing nor able to maintain its neutrality, Germany had to intervene. On account of the icing over of the Baltic Sea during the winter, it was absolutely necessary that the possibility of transporting Swedish iron ore by way of the harbor of Narvik be maintained throughout the year. The English government knew why it refused during the Nuremberg Trials to put its cards on the table; its lie that it had never intended to occupy Norway unless it had been called upon to do so would have been refuted by such an action.

Only if the young people of Germany and Norway learn the truth will it be possible to put an end to the work of those who poison the nations.

Opinions of Two Famous Scandinavians on The Meaning of Hitler's Life

In Bulletin 36 we discussed the meaning of Hitler's life in conjunction with the 100th anniversary of Hitler's birth. We now supplement Bulletin 36 with comments on the meaning of Hitler's life by two very famous Scandinavians, who concurred with many of their compatriots, a considerable number of whom volunteered to serve in German military units engaged in the titanic struggle to block the Communist drive into western Europe. (See Europäische Freiwillige im Bild, Osnabrück: Munin-Verlag, 1986, especially pages 24-98.)

Knut Hamsun (1859-1952) was a Norwegian novelist whose works praised rural life. Hamsun was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1920. After Hitler's death Hamsun expressed the following opinion of Hitler:

> I am not worthy of speaking about Adolf Hitler in a loud voice. Moreover, his life and his work do not call for any emotional speeches. He was a fighter for humanity and a proclaimer of the message of justice for all nations. He was a reforming figure of the highest rank and it was his historical fate to have had to function in a time of unparalleled vileness, which finally brought him down.

Hamsun was arrested in 1945 and severely punished by the Norwegian government which had fled during the war.

The second famous Scandinavian who praised Hitler even after his death was Sven Hedin (1865-1952), a distinguished geographer and explorer, notably of Tibet and the western parts of China. In the Dagens Nyheter of 2 May 1945 Hedin wrote:

> I retain a deep and inextinguishable memory of Adolf Hitler and consider him to be one of the greatest men to whom the history of the world can point. Now he is dead. But his work should live on. He made Germany a world power. Now Germany is on the edge of a precipice because his adversaries could not tolerate his growing strength and power.

Note: These two translations are derived from German translations, the first of which was taken from the March 1989 issue of Die Bauernschaft (published by NORDWIND, Postfach 2238, D-2390 Flensburg, West Germany; present address: NORDWIND-Verlag, Molevej 12, DK-6340 Kollund, Denmark), and the second of which was taken from Worte über und von Adolf Hitler, compiled by Ursula Beyrich and dated 1983.

No matter whether we agree or disagree with these statements by Hamsun and Hedin, we must acknowledge their courage and integrity for having made them just after Hitler's death, thus at a time when these distinguished men had much to lose and nothing of a material nature to gain by expressing such evaluations. □

FOR MY LEGIONARIES. The Legionary Movement in Romania, commonly known as the Iron Guard, —perhaps the oldest anti-Communist movement in the world, still alive—was founded by Corneliu Z. Codreanu in 1927. For My Legionaries (353 pp., pb., $8.00 + $1.50 for postage & handling), Codreanu's stirring work, is a complete and authoritative account of the ideals and principles of the Legionary Movement which shaped the character of young Romanians before WWII. Control over the communications media and the normal channels of book distribution by our international enemies makes it impossible to reach the broad market this unique book deserves. We are certain that For My Legionaries will soon become a collector's item. This book also provides the 'missing pieces' of the drastically censored The Suicide of Europe by Prince D. Sturdza; the identity of those who masterminded Romania's takeover and who are now engaged in carrying out the same program in the U.S. will no longer be unknown to you. THE ANTI-HUMANS, by D. Bacu (307 pp., hb. $7.00 + $1.50 for postage & handling) describes what was done to the young men whom Corneliu Z. Codreanu, the founder of the Legionary Movement in Romania, inspired, when seven years after his brutal murder, Romania was delivered to the Bolsheviks. They were subjected to what is the most fully documented 'Pavlovian experiment' on a large number of human beings. It is likely that the same techniques were used on many American prisoners in Korea and Vietnam. The Anti-Humans is a well-written document of great historical and psychological importance. Reading it will be an emotional experience you will not forget. "A sequel to Orwell's 1984" —R.S.H. "A searing exposé of Red bestiality!" —Dr. A.J. App). THE ANTI-HUMANS, Order #01013. A REAL CASE AGAINST THE JEWS

One of Them Points Out the Full Depth of Their Guilt

Of course, you don't resent us. It is no good telling me you don't. So let us not waste any time on denials and alibis. You know you do, and I know it, and we understand each other. To be sure, some of your best friends are Jews, and all that. I have heard that before, once or twice, I think. And I know, too, that you do not include me personally—"me" being any particular individual Jew—when you fling out at us in your wholesale fashion, because I am, well, so different, don't you know, almost as good as one of yourselves. That little exemption does not, somehow, move me to gratitude; but never mind that now. It is the aggressive, climbing, pushing, materialistic sort you dislike—those, in a word, who remind you so much of your own up-and-coming brethren. We understand each other perfectly. I don't hold it against you.

Bless my soul, I do not blame anybody for disliking anybody. The thing that intrigues me about this anti-Jewish business, as you play at it, is your total lack of grit. You are so indirect and roundabout with it, you make such fantastic and transparent excuses, you seem to be suffering from self-consciousness so horribly, that if the performance were not grotesque it would be irritating.

It is not as if you were amateurs: you have been at it for over fifteen centuries. Yet watching you and hearing your childish pretexts, one might get the impression that you did not know yourselves what it is all about. You resent us, but you cannot clearly say why. You think up a new excuse—a "reason" is what you call it—every other day. You have been piling up justifications for yourselves these many hundreds of years and each new invention is more laughable than the last and each new excuse contradicts and annihilates the last.

Not so many years ago I used to hear that we were materialists; now the complaint is being whispered around that no art and no profession is safe against Jewish invasion.

We are, if you are to be believed, at once clannish and exclusive and unassimilable because we won't intermarry with you, and we are also climbers and pushers and a menace to your racial integrity.

Our standard of living is so low that we create your slums and sweated industries, and so high that we crowd you out of your best residential sections.

We shirk our patriotic duty in wartime because we are pacifists by nature and tradition, and we are the arch-plotters of universal wars and the chief beneficiaries of those wars (see the late Dearborn Independent, passim, and The Protocols of the Elders of Zion).

We are at once the founders and leading adherents of capitalism and the chief perpetrators of the rebellion against capitalism.

Surely, history has nothing like us for versatility!

And, oh! I almost forgot the reason of reasons. We are the stiff-necked people who never accepted Christianity, and we are the criminal people who crucified its founder.

But I tell you, you are self-deceivers. You lack either the self-knowledge or the mettle to face the facts squarely and own up to the truth. You resent the Jew not because, as some of you seem to think, he crucified Jesus but because he gave him birth. Your real quarrel with us is not that we have rejected Christianity but that we have imposed it upon you!

Your loose, contradictory charges against us are not a patch on the blackness of our proved historic offense. You accuse us of stirring up revolution in Moscow. Suppose we admit the charge. What of it? Compared with what Paul the Jew of Tarsus accomplished in Rome, the Russian upheaval is a mere street brawl.

You make much noise and fury about the undue Jewish influence in your theaters and movie palaces. Very good; granted your complaint is well-founded. But what is that compared to our staggering influence in your churches, your schools, your laws and your governments, and the very thoughts you think every day?

A clumsy Russian forges a set of papers and publishes them in a book called The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which shows that we plotted to bring on the late World War. You believe that book. All right. For the sake of argument we will underwrite every word of it. It is genuine and authentic. But what is that beside the unquestionable historical conspiracy which we have carried out, which we have never denied because you never had the courage to charge us with it, and of which the full record is extant for anybody to read?

If you really are serious when you talk of Jewish plots, may I not direct your attention to one worth talking about? What use is it wasting words on the alleged control of your public opinion by Jewish financiers, newspaper owners and movie magnates, when you might as well justly accuse us of the proved control of your whole civilization by the Jewish Gospels?

You have not begun to appreciate the real depth of our guilt. We are intruders. We are disturbers. We are subverters. We have taken your natural world, your ideals, your destiny, and played havoc with them. We have been at the bottom not merely of the latest great war but of nearly all your wars, not only of the Russian but of every other major revolution in history. We have brought discord and confusion and frustration into your personal and public life. We are still doing it. No one can tell how long we shall go on doing it.

Look back a little and see what has happened. Nineteen hundred years ago you were an innocent, care-free, pagan race. You worshiped countless gods and goddesses, the spirits of the air, of the running streams and of the woodland. You took unblushing pride in the glory of your naked bodies. You carved images of your gods and of the tantalizing human figure. You delighted in the combats of the field, the arena and the battle-ground. War and slavery were fixed institutions in your systems. Disporting yourselves on the hillsides and in the valleys of the great outdoors, you took to speculating on the wonder and mystery of life and laid the foundations of natural science and philosophy. Yours was a noble, sensual culture, unirked by the prickings of a social conscience or by any sentimental questionings about human quality. Who knows what great and glorious destiny might have been yours if we had left you alone.

But we did not leave you alone. We took you in hand and pulled down the beautiful and generous structure you had reared, and changed the whole course of your history. We conquered you as no empire of yours ever subjugated Africa or Asia. And we did it all without armies, without bullets, without blood or turmoil, without force of any kind. We did it solely by the irresistible might of our spirit, with ideas, with propaganda.

We made you the willing and unconscious bearers of our mission to the whole world, to the barbarous races of the earth, to the countless unborn generations. Without fully understanding what we were doing to you, you became the agents at large of our racial tradition, carrying our gospel to the unexplored ends of the earth.

Our tribal customs have become the core of your moral code. Our tribal laws have furnished the basic groundwork of all your august constitutions and legal systems. Our legends and our folk-tales are the sacred lore which you croon to your infants. Our poets have filled your hymnals and your prayer-books. Our national history has become an indispensable part of the learning of your pastors and priests and scholars. Our kings, our statesmen, our prophets, our warriors are your heroes. Our ancient little country is your Holy Land. Our national literature is your Holy Bible. What our people thought and taught has become inextricably woven into your very speech and tradition, until no one among you can be called educated who is not familiar with our racial heritage.

Jewish artisans and Jewish fishermen are your teachers and your saints, with countless statues carved in their image and innumerable cathedrals raised to their memories. A Jewish maiden is your ideal of motherhood and womanhood. A Jewish rebel-prophet is the central figure in your religious worship. We have pulled down your idols, cast aside you racial inheritance, and substituted for them our God and our traditions. No conquest in history can even remotely compare with this clean sweep of our conquest over you.

How did we do it? Almost by accident. Two thousand years ago nearly, in far-off Palestine, our religion had fallen into decay and materialism. Money-changers were in possession of the temple. Degenerate, selfish priests mulcted our people and grew fat. Then a young patriot-idealist arose and went about the land calling for a revival of faith. He had no thought of setting up a new church. Like all the prophets before him, his only aim was to purify and revitalize the old creed. He attacked the priests and drove the money-changers from the temple. This brought him into conflict with the established order and its supporting pillars. The Roman authorities, who were in occupation of the country, fearing his revolutionary agitation as a political effort to oust them, arrested him, tried him and condemned him to death by crucifixion, a common form of execution at that time.

The followers of Jesus of Nazareth, mainly slaves and poor workmen, in their bereavement and disappointment, turned away from the world and formed themselves into a brotherhood of pacifist non-resisters, sharing the memory of their crucified leader and living together communistically. They were merely a new sect in Judea, without power or consequence, neither the first nor the last.

Only after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans did the new creed come into prominence. Then a patriotic Jew named Paul or Saul conceived the idea of humbling the Roman power by destroying the morale of its soldiery with the doctrines of love and non-resistance preached by the little sect of Jewish Christians. He became the Apostle to the Gentiles, he who hitherto had been one of the most active persecutors of the band. And so well did Paul do his work that within four centuries the great empire which had subjugated Palestine along with half of the world, was a heap of ruins. And the law which went forth from Zion became the official religion of Rome.

This was the beginning of our dominance in your world. But it was only a beginning. From this time forth your history is little more than a struggle for mastery between your own old pagan spirit and our Jewish spirit. Half your wars, great and little, are religious wars, fought over the interpretation of one thing or another in our teachings. You no sooner broke free from your primitive religious simplicity and attempted the practice of the pagan Roman learning than Luther, armed with our gospels, arose to down you and reenthrone our heritage. Take the principal revolutions in modern times—the French, the American and the Russian. What are they but the triumph of the Jewish idea of social, political and economic justice?

And the end is still a long way off. We still dominate you. At this very moment your churches are torn asunder by a civil war between Fundamentalists and Modernists, that is to say, between those who cling to our teachings and traditions literally and those who are striving by slow steps to dispossess us. In Dayton, Tennessee, a Bible-bred community forbids the teaching of your science because it conflicts with our ancient Jewish account of the origin of life; and Mr. Bryan, the leader of the anti-Jewish Ku Klux Klan in the Democratic National Convention, makes the supreme fight of his life in our behalf, without noticing the contradiction. Again and again the Puritan heritage of Judea breaks out in waves of stage censorship, Sunday blue laws and national prohibition acts. And while these things are happening you twaddle about Jewish influence in the movies!

Is it any wonder you resent us? We have put a clog upon your progress. We have imposed upon you an alien book and alien faith which you cannot swallow or digest, which is at cross-purposes with your native spirit, which keeps you everlastingly ill-at-ease, and which you lack the spirit either to reject or to accept in full.

In full, of course, you never have accepted our Christian teachings. In your hearts you are still pagans. You still love war and graven images and strife. You still take pride in the glory of the nude human figure. Your social conscience, in spite of all democracy and all your social revolutions, is still a pitifully imperfect thing. We have merely divided your soul, confused your impulses, paralyzed your desires. In the midst of battle you are obliged to kneel down to him who commanded you to turn the other cheek, who said "Resist not evil" and "Blessed are the peacemakers." In your lust for gain you are suddenly disturbed by a memory from your Sunday-school days about taking no thought for the morrow. In your industrial struggles, when you would smash a strike without compunction, you are suddenly reminded that the poor are blessed and that men are brothers in the Fatherhood of the Lord. And as you are about to yield to temptation, your Jewish training puts a deterrent hand in your shoulder and dashes the brimming cup from your lips. You Christians have never become Christianized. To that extent we have failed with you. But we have forever spoiled the fun of paganism for you.

So why should you not resent us? If we were in your place we should probably dislike you more cordially than you do us. But we should make no bones about telling you why. We should not resort to subterfuges and transparent pretexts. With millions of painfully respectable Jewish shopkeepers all about us we should not insult your intelligence and our own honesty by talking about communism as a Jewish philosophy. And with millions of hard-working impecunious Jewish peddlers and laborers we should not make ourselves ridiculous by talking about international capitalism as a Jewish monopoly. No, we should go straight to the point. We should contemplate this confused, ineffectual muddle which we call civilization, this half-Christian half-pagan medley, and—were our places reversed—we should say to you point-blank: "For this mess thanks to you, to your prophets and to your Bible."

COMMISSARY TO THE GENTILES

The First to See the Possibilities of War by Propaganda

MARCUS ELI RAVAGE

You Christians worry and complain about the Jew's influence in your civilization. We are, you say, an international people, a compact minority in your midst, with traditions, interests, aspirations and objectives distinct from your own. And you declare that this state of affairs is a menace to your orderly development; it confuses your impulses; it defeats your purposes; it muddles up your destiny. I do not altogether see the danger. Your world has always been ruled by minorities; and it seems to me a matter of indifference what the remote origin and professed creed of the governing clique is. The influence, on the other hand, is certainly there, and it is vastly greater and more insidious than you appear to realize.

That is what puzzles and amuses and sometimes exasperates us about your game of Jew-baiting. It sounds so portentous. You go about whispering terrifyingly of the hand of the Jew in this and that and the other thing. It makes us quake. We are conscious of the injury we did you when we imposed upon you our alien faith and traditions. Suppose, we say tremblingly, you should wake up to the fact that your religion, your education, your morals, your social, governmental and legal systems are fundamentally of our making! And then you specify, and talk vaguely of Jewish financiers and Jewish motion-picture promoters, and our terror dissolves in laughter. The goi, we see with relief, will never know the real blackness of our crimes.

We cannot make it out. Either you do not know or you have not the courage to charge us with those deeds for which there is at least a shadow of evidence and which an intelligent judge and jury could examine without impatience. Why bandy about unconvincing trifles when you might so easily indict us for serious and provable offenses? Why throw up to us a patent and clumsy forgery such as the Protocols of the Elders of Zion when you might as well confront us with the Revelation of St. John? Why talk about Marx and Trotski when you have Jesus of Nazareth and Paul of Tarsus to confound us with?

You call us subverters, agitators, revolution-mongers. It is the truth, and I cower at your discovery. It could be shown with only the slightest straining and juggling of the facts that we have been at the bottom of all the major revolutions in your history. We undoubtedly had a sizable finger in the Lutheran Rebellion, and it is simply a fact that we were the prime movers in the bourgeois democratic revolutions of the century before the last, both in France and America. If we were not, we did not know our own interests. But do you point your accusing finger at us and charge us with these heinous and recorded crimes? Not at all? You fantastically lay at our door the recent great War and the upheaval in Russia, which have done not only the most injury to the Jews themselves but which a school-boy could have foreseen would have that result.

But even these plots and revolutions are as nothing compared with the great conspiracy which we engineered at the beginning of this era and which was destined to make the creed of a Jewish sect the religion of the Western world. The Reformation was not designed in malice purely. It squared us with an ancient enemy and restored our Bible to its place of honor in Christendom. The Republican revolutions of the eighteenth century freed us of our age-long political and social disabilities. They benefited us, but they did you no harm. On the contrary, they prospered and expanded you. You owe your preëminence in the world to them. But the upheaval which brought Christianity into Europe was—or at least may easily be shown to have been—planned and executed by Jews as an act of revenge against a great Gentile state. And when you talk about Jewish conspiracies I cannot for the world understand why you do not mention the destruction of Rome and the whole civilization of antiquity concentrated under her banners, at the hands of Jewish Christianity.

It is unbelievable, but you Christians do not seem to know where your religion came from, nor how, nor why.

Your historians, with one great exception, do not tell you. The documents in the case, which are part of your Bible, you chant over but do not read. We have done our work too thoroughly; you believe our propaganda too implicitly. The coming of Christianity is to you not an ordinary historical event growing out of other events of the time, it is the fulfillment of a divine Jewish prophecy—with suitable amendments of your own. It did not, as you see it, destroy a great Gentile civilization and a great Gentile empire with which Jewry was at war; it did not plunge mankind into barbarism and darkness for a thousand years; it came to bring salvation to the Gentile world!

Yet here, if ever, was a great subversive movement, hatched in Palestine, spread by Jewish agitators, financed by Jewish money, taught in Jewish pamphlets and broadsides, at a time when Jewry and Rome were in a death-struggle, and ending in the collapse of the great Gentile empire. You do not even see it, though an intelligent child, unbefuddled by theological magic, could tell you what it is all about after a hasty reading of the simple record. And then you go on prattling of Jewish conspiracies and cite as instances the Great War and the Russian Revolution! Can you wonder that we Jews have always taken your anti-Semites rather lightly, as long as they did not resort to violence?

And, mind you, no less an authority than Gibbon long ago tried to enlighten you. It is now a century and a half since The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire let the cat out of the bag. Gibbon, not being a parson dabbling in history, did not try to account for the end of a great era by inventing fatuous nonsense about the vice and degradation of Rome, about the decay of morals and faith in an empire which was at that very time in the midst of its most glorious creative period. How could he? He was living in the Augustan Age in London which—in spite of nearly two thousand years since the coming of Christian salvation—was a good replica of Augustan Rome in the matter of refined lewdness as the foggy islanders could make it. No, Gibbons was a race-conscious Gentile and an admirer of the culture of the pagan West, as well as an historian with brains and eyes. Therefore he had no difficulty laying his finger on the malady that had rotted and wasted away the noble edifice of antique civilization. He put Christianity down—the law which went forth from Zion and the word of God from Jerusalem—as the central cause of the decline and fall of Rome and all she represented.

So far so good. But Gibbon did not go far enough. He was born and died, you see, a century before the invention of scientific anti-Semitism. He left wholly out of account the element of deliberation. He saw an alien creed sweeping out of the East and overwhelming the fair lands of the West. It never occurred to him that the whole scheme of salvation was dedicated. Yet the facts are as plain as you please.

Let me in very brief recount the tale, unembroidered by miracle, prophecy or magic.

For a good perspective, I shall have to go back a space. The action conveniently falls into four parts, rising to a climax in the third. The time, when the first curtain rises, is roughly 65. B.C. Dramatis personæ are, minor parts aside, Judea and Rome. Judea is a tiny kingdom off the Eastern Mediterranean. For five centuries it has been hardly more than a geographical expression. Again and again it has been overrun and destroyed and its population carried into exile or slavery by its powerful neighbors. Nominally independent, it is now as unstable as ever and on the edge of civil war. The empire of the West, with her nucleus in the City Republic of Rome, while not yet mistress of the world, is speedily heading that way. She is acknowledged the one great military power of the time as well as the heir of Greece and the center of civilization.

up to the present the two states have had little or no contact with one another. Then without solicitation on her part Rome was suddenly asked to take a hand in Judean affairs. A dispute had arisen between two brothers over the succession to the petty throne, and the Roman general Pompey, who happened to be in Damascus winding up bigger matters, was called upon to arbitrate between the claimants. With the simple directness of a republican soldier, Pompey exiled one of the brothers, tossed the chief priesthood to his rival, and abolished the kingly dignity altogether. Not to put too fine a point on it, Pompey's mediation amounted in effect to making Judea a Roman dependency. The Jews, not unnaturally perhaps, objected; and Rome, to conciliate them and to conform to local prejudice, restored the royal office. She appointed, that is, a king of her own choosing. He was the son of an excise-man, an Idumean by race, named Herod. But the Jews were not placated, and continued making trouble. Rome thought it very ungrateful of them.

All this is merely a prelude, and is introduced into the action to make clear what follows. Jewish discontent grew to disaffection and open revolt when their Gentile masters began importing into Jerusalem the blessings of Western culture. Graven images, athletic games, Greek drama, and gladiatorial shows were not to the Jewish taste. The pious resented them as an offense in the nostrils of Jehova, even though the resident officials patiently explained they were meant for the entertainment and edification of the non-Jewish garrison. The Judeans resisted with especial strenuousness the advent of the efficient Roman tax-gatherer. Above all, they wanted back a king of their own race and their own royal line.

Among the masses the rebellion took the form of a revival of the old belief in a Messiah, a divinely appointed savior who was to redeem his people from the foreign yoke and make Judea supreme among the nations. Claimants to the mission were not wanting. In Galilee, one Judas led a rather formidable insurrection, which enlisted much popular support. John, called the Baptist, operated in the Jordan country. He was followed by another north-country man, Jesus of Nazareth. All three were masters of the technique of couching incendiary political sedition in harmless theological phrases. All three used the same signal of revolt—"The time is at hand." And three were speedily apprehended and executed, both Galileans by crucifixion.

Personal qualities aside, Jesus of Nazareth was, like his predecessors, a political agitator engaged in liberating his country from the foreign oppressor. There is even considerable evidence that he entertained an ambition to become king of an independent Judea. He claimed, or his biographers later claimed for him, descent from the ancient royal line of David. But his paternity is somewhat confused. The same writers who traced the origin of his mother's husband back to the psalmist-king also pictured Jesus as the son of Jehovah, and admitted that Joseph was not his father.

It seems, however, that Jesus before long realized the hopelessness of his political mission and turned his oratorical gifts and his great popularity with the masses in quite another direction. He began preaching a primitive form of populism, socialism and pacifism. The effect of this change in his program was to gain him the hostility of the substantial, propertied classes, the priests and patriots generally, and to reduce his following to the poor, the laboring mass and the slaves.

After his death these lowly disciples formed themselves into a communistic brotherhood. A sermon their late leader had once delivered upon a hillside summed up for them the essence of his teachings, and they made it their rule of life. It was a philosophy calculated to appeal profoundly to humble people. It comforted those who suffered here on earth with promised rewards beyond the grave. It made virtues of the necessities of the weak. Men without hope in the future were admonished to take no thought for the morrow. Men too helpless to resent insult or injury were taught to resist not evil. Men condemned to lifelong drudgery and indigence were assured of the dignity of labor and of poverty. The meek, the despised, the disinherited, the downtrodden, were—in the hereafter—to be the elect and favored of God. The worldly, the ambitious, the rich and powerful, were to be denied admission to heaven.

The upshot, then, of Jesus' mission was a new sect in Judea. It was neither the first nor the last. Judea, like modern America, was a fertile soil for strange creeds. The Ebionim—the paupers, as they called themselves—did not regard their beliefs as a new religion. Jews they had been born, and Jews they remained. The teachings of their master were rather in the nature of a social philosophy, an ethic of conduct, a way of life. To modern Christians, who never tire of asking why the Jews did not accept Jesus and his teachings, I can only answer that for a long time none but Jews did. To be surprised that the whole Jewish people did not turn Ebionim is about as intelligent as to expect all Americans to join the Unitarians or the Baptists or the Christian Scientists.

In ordinary times little attention would have been paid to the ragged brotherhood. Slaves and laborers for the most part, their meekness might even have been encouraged by the soldier class. But with the country in the midst of a struggle with a foreign foe, the unworldly philosophy took on a dangerous aspect. It was a creed of disillusion, resignation and defeat. It threatened to undermine the morale of the nation's fighting men in time of war. This blessing of the peacemakers, this turning of the other cheek, this non-resistance, this love your enemy, looked like a deliberate attempt to paralyze the national will in a crisis and assure victory to the foe.

So it is not surprising that the Jewish authorities began persecuting the Ebionim. Their meetings were invaded and dispersed, their leaders were clapped into jail, their doctrines were proscribed. It looked for awhile as if the sect would be speedily wiped out. Then, unexpectedly, the curtain rose on act three, and events took a sudden new turn.

Perhaps the bitterest foe of the sectaries was one Saul, a maker of tents. A native of Tarsus and thus a man of some education in Greek culture, he despised the new teachings for their unworldliness and their remoteness from life. A patriotic Jew, he dreaded their effect on the national cause. A traveled man, versed in several languages, he was ideally suited for the task of going about among the scattered Jewish communities to counteract the spread of their socialistic pacifistic doctrines. The leaders in Jerusalem appointed him chief persecutor to the Ebionim.

He was on his way to Damascus one day to arrest a group of the sectaries when a novel idea came to him. In the quaint phrase of the Book of Acts he saw a vision. He saw as a matter of fact, two. He perceived, to begin with, how utterly hopeless were the chances of little Judea winning out in an armed conflict against the greatest military power in the world. Second, and more important, it came to him that the vagabond creed which he had been repressing might be forged into an irresistible weapon against the formidable foe. Pacifism, non-resistance, resignation, love, were dangerous teachings at home. Spread among the enemy's legions, they might break down their discipline and thus yet bring victory to Jerusalem. Saul, in a word, was probably the first man to see the possibilities of conducting war by propaganda.

He journeyed on to Damascus, and there, to the amazement alike of his friends and of those he had gone to suppress, he announced his conversion to the faith and applied for admission to the brotherhood. On his return to Jerusalem he laid his new strategy before the startled Elders of Zion. After much debate and searching of souls, it was adopted. More resistance was offered by the leaders of the Ebionim of the capital. They were mistrustful of his motives, and they feared that his proposal to strip the faith of its ancient Jewish observances and practices so as to make it acceptable to Gentiles would fill the fraternity with alien half-converts, and dilute its strength. But in the end he won them over, too. And so Saul, the fiercest persecutor of Jesus' followers, became Paul, the Apostle to the Gentiles. And so, incidentally, began the spread into the pagan lands of the West, an entirely new Oriental religion.

Unfortunately for Paul's plan, the new strategy worked much too well. His revamped and rather alluring theology made converts faster than he had dared hope, or than he even wished. His idea, it should be kept in mind, was at this stage purely defensive. He had as yet no thought of evangelizing the world; he only hoped to discourage the enemy. With that accomplished, and the Roman garrisons out of Palestine, he was prepared to call a truce. But the salves and oppressed of the Empire, the wretched conscripts, and the starving proletariat of the capital itself, found as much solace in the adapted Pauline version of the creed as the poor Jews before them had found in the original teachings of their crucified master. The result of this unforeseen success was to open the enemy's eyes to what was going on. Disturbing reports of insubordination among the troops began pouring into Rome from the army chiefs in Palestine and elsewhere. Instead of giving the imperial authorities pause, the new tactics only stiffened their determination. Rome swooped down upon Jerusalem with fire and sword, and after a fierce siege which lasted four years, she destroyed the nest of the agitation (70 A.D.). At least she thought she had destroyed it.

The historians of the time leave us in no doubt as to the aims of Rome. They tell us that Nero sent Vespasian and his son Titus with definite and explicit orders to annihilate Palestine and Christianity together. To the Romans, Christianity meant nothing more than Judaism militant; anyhow, an interpretation which does not seem far from the facts. As to Nero's wish, he had at least half of it realized for him. Palestine was so thoroughly annihilated that it has remained a political ruin to this day. But Christianity was not so easily destroyed.

Indeed, it was only after the fall of Jerusalem that Paul's program developed to the full. Hitherto, as I have said, his tactic had been merely to frighten of the conqueror, in the manner of Moses plaguing the Pharaos. He had gone along cautiously and hesitantly, taking care not to arouse the powerful foe. He was willing to dangle his novel weapon before the foe's nose, and let him feel its edge, but he shrank from thrusting it in full force. Now that the worst had happened and Judea had nothing further to lose, he flung scruples to the wind and carried the war into the enemy's country. The goal now was nothing less than to humble Rome as she had humbled Jerusalem, to wipe her off the map as she had wiped out Judea.

If Paul's own writings fail to convince you of this interpretation of his activities, I invite your attention to his more candid associate John. Where Paul, operating within the shadow of the imperial palace and half the time a prisoner in Roman jails, is obliged to deal in parable and veiled hints, John, addressing himself to disaffected Asiatics, can afford the luxury of plain speaking. At any rate, his pamphlet entitled "Revelation" is, in truth, a revelation of what the whole astonishing business is about.

Rome, fancifully called Babylon, is minutely described in the language of sputtering hate, as the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth, as the woman drunken with the blood of saints (Christians and Jews), as the oppressor of "peoples and multitudes and nations and tongues" and—to remove all doubt of her identity—as "that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth." An angel triumphantly cries, "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen." Then follows an orgiastic picture of ruin. Commerce and industry and maritime trade are at an end. Art and music and "the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride" are silenced. Darkness and desolation lie like a pall upon the scene. The gentle Christian conquerors wallow in blood up to the bridles of their horses. "Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets; for God hath avenged you on her."

And what is the end and purpose of all this chaos and devastation? John is not too reticent to tell us. For he closes his pious prophecy with a vision of the glories of the new—that is, the restored—Jerusalem: not any allegorical fantasy, I pray you, but literally Jerusalem, the capital of a great reunited kingdom of "the twelve tribes of the children of Israel."

Could any one ask for anything plainer?

Of course, no civilization could forever hold out against this kind of assault. By the year 200 the efforts of Paul and John and their successors had made such headway among all classes of Roman society that Christianity had become the dominant cult throughout the empire. Meantime, as Paul had shrewdly foreseen, Roman morale and discipline had quite broken down, so that more and more the imperial legions, once the terror of the world and the backbone of Western culture, went down to defeat before barbarian invaders. In the year 326 the emperor Constantine, hoping to check the insidious malady, submitted to conversion and proclaimed Christianity the official religion. It was too late. After him the emperor Julian tried to resort once more to suppression. But neither resistance nor concession were of any use. The Roman body politic has become thoroughly worm-eaten with Palestinian propaganda. Paul had triumphed.

This at least is how, were I an anti-Semite in search of a credible sample of subversive Jewish conspiracy, I would interpret the advent of a modified Jewish creed into the Western world.

The Moses-God Fight

by
Allan Callahan

There is a passage in the Bible that used to puzzle me. It says that God once attempted to Kill Moses. It reads: "And it came to pass by the way in the inn, that the Lord met him, and sought to kill him." (Exodus 4:24; King James Version). This, of course, means that God tried to kill him, and failed! Imagine the Ruler of the Universe trying to kill someone, and not being able to do the job. Of course, Moses may have been a super-kike, but he was still only mortal, nonetheless. We think of God as being immensely powerful, but maybe he isn't as strong as we think. Elsewhere in the Bible it says that: "And the Lord was with Judah; and he drove out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron" (Judges 1:19).

Still, he is no doubt plenty strong. He must be if he is able to lug around a planet under each arm, and indeed hurl whole galaxies into space with the flick of his wrist. So why couldn't he kill Moses? Was he getting too old, or was he sick and run down at the time, or what? The Bible doesn't say. But I had always been intrigued by the battle itself. A "Dock A Brawl" must have taken place, it appeared. And if God attacked Moses, the latter must have fought back with a vengeance, and apparently did a good job of defending himself, causing the attack to fail.

But how to find out? The only way, I assumed, was to get a vision, or a revelation, from heaven. So for three days and nights, pausing only for prayer and sleep, I concentrated on getting this revelation, and heaven finally rewarded me.

Here is what happened: Moses had been whooping it up with some of his pals at Hymie's Bar & Grill (referred to as the "inn" in the Bible). God arrived and crawled up on the edge of the roof, by the front door. When Moses made his exit an hour or so later, God made a surprise attack by jumping off on to his back. Moses was knocked heavily to the ground, but was up on his feet again instantly.

They squared off. Moses was taller, but God was better muscled. He was a little bit bowlegged, probably due to many years of horseback riding. (Yes, God does ride horses. See Hab. 3:8). Moses knew he had to avoid God's fearful grip to have any chance of winning, so he could not let it turn into a wrestling match. He would have to box him. And this is exactly what he did. God bored in, trying to grab Moses, but the latter would jab, step away, and throw an occasional right. All the Jewish bar-flies poured out of the inn and gathered around, cheering them on. Round and round the opponents went, God vainly stumbling forward, while Moses kept him off balance, rocking him with punches.

In the end, it was a case of "youth will prevail." God began to tire. (Yes, God also gets tired. See Is. 1:14.) A right cross from his younger opponent knocked him to his knees. He wearily struggled to his feet. Moses quickly knocked him down again, and this time he stayed, until they poured water on him to bring him around.

In the end, when Moses's hand was raised in victory, God's face was unrecognizable. It was the worst beating a deity had ever taken.

On another occasion, Moses defeated God in a verbal argument, causing him to repent. (Ex. 32:9-14.) But who would have thought he could beat him in a physical test?

It was after the fight had taken place that the famous incident occurred where the Most High showed Moses his "back parts." (Ex. 33;23.) Although a lot of time had elapsed since the fight, God's face had still not healed. (Wounds heal very slowly in the intense cold of outer space, where the Big Jew hangs out most of the time.) God was ashamed of all his cuts and bruises, and did not want Moses to see them.

Of course, it can be argued that Moses was lucky to have whipped old Yahweh, and I agree with this. And if God had kept on trying to kill him by hook or crook, no doubt he would have succeeded, sooner or later. But God never tried it again. Perhaps he repented, who knows? He had repented of things before. (According to Jer. 15:6 he once got tired of repenting.)

At any rate, dear reader, if you, too, have wondered why the Lord Of All Creation tried and failed to kill Moses, I am happy to share my heavenly revelation with you. □

Breed - Or Perish

By Major Donald Vincent Clerkin

Are we certain that we know why the White race is losing ground in the world? Can our steady decline as a people be laid at the door of the Jews, the non-whites, the liberals, or even the Aryan race traitors? Could it be that the reason is more organic in nature, more ingrained in the White race itself; that is, have we become so decadent that we no longer have the desire to survive, much less prevail over those who would rather that we were dead?

The fact that the White race falls in total number and percentage of the world's population at the rate of 20% per generation should tell you something is very wrong fundamentally with th elife-force of this race. Though the Aryan race has the mark of brilliance stamped on its exemplars, still, the average White today is uncertain of why he is part of something so special. History is not taught to Aryan youth these days. Or when a version of history is presented, it indicts the White race for alleged past crimes against 'humanity.' This itself would not tend to lower the White birth rate.

To understand this problem, it is likely that we have failed to understand our West European / American culture and its stretch of more than a thousand years of development. Oswald Spengler claimed that cultures and races age, as do individuals. The Aryan race is as old as Cro-Magnon man, and the successive cultures it has expressed have each had its stages of birth, growth, stagnation and death.

It may be, therefore, that the Aryan race has run its course—at least within the confines of the West European / American culture. Spengler's The Decline of the West taught us that the last stage of a culture is identified by conflicting ideologies, a lack of faith, the sham of democracy, and the desire to live only for the moment. Each culture that Spengler studied displayed the identical symptoms of pathology in its later stage. Did you know that Caesar Augustus scolded his nobles over the fact that they were not having enough children to insure the survival of the Roman noble class? The rise of the Roman Imperium was an historical indication that Rome was entering the final stage of its cultural life. And there the leading class was having a "birth dearth." Those of us who labor in the Aryan movement know that we cannot continue to compete as a race with a falling birth rate. We argue for racial separation because we know that a low birth rate means some other people will eventually come to inherit North America, and Europe as well. The Jews have a different attitude about birth rates, though in Israel the high Palestinian birth rate scares them. Jews are a distinct minority in the world. The average Jewish birth rate is about 1.2. The Jews in North America compensate by lobbying to bring all 3.5 millions of Soviet Jews into the United States. Whether these Jews will raise the Jewish birth rate is questionable. Most are secular Jews, and secular Jews are not prolific breeders. This is why the American Jewish birth rate is so low: they are materialists, and children get in the way of acquiring things. But the Jews do not worry about a low birth rate as much as we Aryans do. They feel that they have a special racial dispensation to rule the world. A race so conditioned sees no need to create large numbers of offspring. Jews believe that they ought to inherit the leadership of the world and its property because their Talmudic rabbis long ago told them that the God they don't believe in had decreed it. This mythology has driven the Jews since the time of Christ.

The Jews are so decrepit a people that the only act of faith they are now capable of is belief in the Holohoax. They think that the stupid goyim are obligated to them as superior specimens of humanity, in fact the only specimens of humanity, everyone else being just beasts with two legs. This is a belief system that will mislead the believer into making gross mistakes, such as thinking that because the aryans are so easily buffaloed with the Holohoax and Judeo-Christianity, the non-whites will be just as easily maneuvered into servant status to the Jews . The Jews will gnash their teeth over the situation they are creating in North America by opening the immigration doors to all comers.

It would be a mistake, however, to blame everything that besets the Aryans on the Jews. The Aryans have no idea of world domination. Most young Whites live only for the immediate pleasures to be derived from a corrupt society. They are Hellenistic in scope, which means that they can see neither forward nor backward. The bit of ground stood upon is all that the decadent Whites can see; or shall we say that it is all they take notice of. They have no sense of their history, or anyone else's. Most do not realize that they are White today only because their forebears were segregationists. Not being able to comprehend the past, and the future of little interest to them, today's Aryans in the main opt to satisfy their desires and lusts for material gain, objects and sensual pleasures—without incurring any obligation, without the production and nurturing of children.

Aryan movement activists have a different idea of the meaning of life than have the decadent yuppie types. We realize that the production of healthy children is the most important thing we can do to insure the continuation of the White race. Our view of the future is one of the necessity to expand our racial numbers, especially when the Aryan Republic is established. There must be a place for Aryans to raise their children. But there must be enough Aryan children to raise up the Aryan Republic to front-rank position in the world. This, then, is a battle of numbers, as well as quality of those numbers.

We prepare to erect the Aryan Republic because the present society has corrupted many Aryans. The Aryan Republic will be a separate political entity on the North American continent. There will be no racial integration or miscegenation permitted. But the idea of a superior race pales before the fact that a race which refuses to breed in sufficient numbers to insure even break-even survival is, in the end, actually superior to no one. The winner in the racial superiority contest is he who is alive at the end, and in control of his destiny. Everything else is just big talk.

* * * * *

South Africa—It is not racial separation or Apartheid to employ blacks as servants, pay them low wages, and then think that they will not make demands upon you for "rights." Better had the wealthy White South Africans employed only White labor, paid them decent wages, and strictly kept the millions of blacks out of South Africa. It was the wealthy White greed for cheap labor that permitted the millions of blacks to come into the Union of South Africa and then the Republic of South Africa. Whites from other parts of the world were not permitted immigration status in South Africa, because the fat-cats feared that they would drive wages up. The black labor force was increased because of the lower wage paid to them. It may now be too late to save White South Africa becausc of this hypocrisy, a fate it probably deserves as much as America for its own immigration policies that favor the Third World. When the Aryan Republic is created, such mistakes will not be made. We will not import hordes of non-white labor to do our work for us. There will be plenty of work to do, and we trust plenty of Aryan hands to do it. If we need it done, then we must be willing to do it. That cheap, non-white labor snare is what made slavery the pitfall it became for the American South. White South Africa should have learned this lesson.

We must further understand that all races naturally regard themselves as superior to all others. We think Congoids unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious–whether by its technology or its fecundity–from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet.

We think Congolds unintelligent, but they feel only contempt for a race so stupid or craven that it fawns on them, gives them votes, lavishly subsidizes them with its own earnings, and even oppresses its own people to curry their favor. We are a race as are the others. If we attribute to Ourselves a superiority, intellectual, moral, or other, in terms of our own standards, we are simply indulging in a tautology. The only objective criterion of superiority, among human races as among all other species, is biological: the strong survive, the weak perish. The superior race of mankind today is the one that will emerge victorious—whether by its technology or its fecundity—from the proximate struggle for life on an overcrowded planet."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH—FREEDOM OF THOUGHT
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The editor/publisher of Liberty Bell does not necessarily agree with each and every article in this magazine, nor does he subscribe to all conclusions arrived at by various writers; however, he does endeavour to permit the exposure of ideas suppressed by the controlled news media of this country.

It is, therefore, in the best tradition of America and of free men everywhere that Liberty Bell strives to give free reign to ideas, for ultimately it is ideas which rule the world and determine both the content and structure of our Western culture.

We believe that we can and will change our society for the better. We declare our long-held view that no institution or government created by men, for men, is inviolable, incorruptible, and not subject to evolution, change, or replacement by the will of the people.

To this we dedicate our lives and our work. No effort will be spared and no idea will be allowed to go unexpressed if we think it will benefit the Thinking People, not only of America, but the entire world.

The Twentieth Century: An Historical Aberration

With the modern certainties collapsing everywhere, says John Tyndall, we may be returning to a world which went into suspension in 1918.

The twentieth century—my God,
how I hate the twentieth century!
Gen. George S. Patton

HISTORIANS are fond of telling us that the 19th century began, in real historical terms, in 1815 and ended in 1918 (some say 1914). There is much truth in this, assuming that we associate centuries with particular historical epoches rather than regarding them merely as dull statistics from a calendar. The final salvoes of Waterloo put an end to a long-lasting status-quo, namely French domination of Europe, while they signaled the emergence of Britain as one of the world's great powers, no longer threatened in her imperial domains by any serious European rival. Eleven years earlier, in 1804, the first performance of Beethoven's Eroica symphony marked a crucial milestone in the arrival of romanticism in music, paralleled by similar developments in the visual and literary arts which were to dominate our cultural life in the hundred or so years that followed. In human morals and social attitudes, the licentiousness of the 18th century was giving way to an era of stern religious discipline—to which we later gave the name 'Victorian'. These trends did not begin at exactly the same time—indeed it is impossible to state any time which marked a neat boundary line between the old and the new. But it is broadly correct to say that the 19th century was a phase in history with a distinct identity in all the aforementioned departments.

When we went to war in 1914 Foreign Minister Earl Grey made his famous observation that "the lights are going out all over Europe." They were. The opinion of this writer is that the darkness of which Grey spoke descended at the end, rather than at the beginning, of hostilities. But to argue this fine distinction would be hair-splitting. In general terms, the observation was correct. The 19th century has its admirers and its critics, and most people, including myself, are part one and part the other. But what ought not to be argued about that century is that it represented a normal continuity of political, cultural and historical development. It was a century that, like its predecessors, proceeded in accordance with a natural order of things in the world. Nations may have risen or fallen, but the nation-state at least remained the accepted unit to which man owed loyalty. Cultural patterns may have been subject to considerable change, but such changes remained constantly within the parameters of the European cultural tradition, which in its turn was accepted without question as the highest to which man could aspire. The century had its share of myths and falsehoods, but only in tiny and isolated enclaves did it ever succumb to the most destructive falsehood of all: that of human equality. Behind the façade of the century's established moral order there was much humbug and much inconsistency between what was preached and what was practised; but at least some moral order did exist, and within it millions lived lives conducive to a strong family, a strong community, a strong nation and to positive evolutionary advancement.

THE BAD AND THE GOOD

When we look back at the 19th century we may indeed be appalled at some of its uglier features: the grinding poverty and malnutrition that were the lot of millions of the less affluent classes; the availability of education only to a socially and economically favoured few; the smoke-laden urban blight that was our legacy of uncontrolled capitalism.

But side by side with these undoubted sores there were many admirable features. The 19th century was a century of grandeur: in music, in literature, in painting, not least in the civic and private architecture whose monuments we gaze at in wonderment today. Everything about this architecture had form—even down to its ironcast railway bridges and its brickwork power stations. It was a century in which to be British was no mean fate—we were not loved by all of the world but we were respected by a very large part of it. Our race was not afflicted by any kind of death-wish but multiplied rapidly, while spreading itself out to colonise and civilise enormous stretches of the globe. Manhood and womanhood were appreciated for their unique and entirely separate qualities, recognised as complementary in the maintenance of life.

By comparison, what has the 20th century to offer? What it has to offer is an unprecedented advancement and achievement in technology. But when you have said that you have virtually said it all. And even this technology itself has achieved very little in enriching human life because of our utter failure to create political, economic, social and cultural institutions to cope with it. Having the potential to become a boon to mankind, it has in most places become a curse. This is not the fault of technology itself, because technology, like the rains, the winds and the earthquakes, is inevitable. The fault lies with Man—and more specifically our own particular branch of Man, the people of the White Aryan West—in his inadequate response to the technological revolution.

So what will the 20th century leave behind in the way of impressive monuments when it has passed? It will leave the space capsule, the micro-chip, the transistor, jet propulsion, the deep freeze—and, of course, the oblong silver screen in the corner of nearly every drawing room. But beyond those things it will leave very little. Culturally and artistically, it will leave a desert, broken only by jungle. In the realm of the refinement of the human mind and spirit it will leave a total void. In its contribution to western thought, it will leave little of worth—except that which its own high priests have stigmatised as 'evil' and 'barbaric' and, almost successfully, outlawed from legitimate debate. Above all, it will leave the wreckage of western civilisation and western power, the latter perhaps best symbolised by the anti-birth pill and the abortion clinic.

And what will be remarkable about the 20th century will be that it will become seen, eventually, as quite outside the normal pattern of historical development. It will be as if the real world suddenly stopped, at some point after the termination of the Great War, and was delivered into cold storage while another world was substituted in its place—a world seemingly unconnected with the one that existed before and unrelated to the one that was to follow. For the 20th century may be likened to a totally discordant note in the symphony of human progress, a vulgar interruption of the march of real history—or, in its own terminology, a computer system that has gone haywire as a result of being fed false data and contradictory instructions.

The 20th century will have just one good thing to commend it—its end! And it is the opinion of this writer that that end has already started.

NEW WIND FROM THE EAST

Just as the 19th century ended, in reality, in the flames and bloodshed of the 1914-1918 conflict, the consequences of which destroyed utterly the world that had existed up to that time, so the 20th century, I believe, will be seen to have ended in the tumultuous events beginning in Eastern Europe in the second half of the 1980s and now having reverberations that are sweeping like a brush fire across the remainder of Planet Earth. In the well-chosen words of the author of an article that appeared in these columns last month, "We inhabit a world in which the petrified certainties of most of our lifetimes are giving way."

In the forefront of these 'petrified certainties' is, of course, the 'cold war'—a state of affairs, always much more apparent than real, which has paralysed the minds of politicians, journalists and political philosophers for over forty years following the collapse of Hitler's Germany, imprisoning their thinking in a straightjacket that permitted no outlook on world affairs not dominated by the concept of an 'east-west' power struggle underpinned by 'east-west' military confrontation. In this outlook there was little room for consideration of true national interests—which, anyway, were presumed to be outdated relics of an age of history now dead and superseded by global and ideological perspectives which saw modern conflicts, not in terms of rivalry between nations and races, but arising out of the supposed incompatibility between international communism and international capitalism, or, as some would prefer to put it, between 'totalitarianism' and 'freedom.'

Recent events have blown this comfortable picture of the world into a thousand fragments. The idea of a military 'threat' from the Soviets is no longer remotely plausible. This, in turn, will demolish the credibility of a whole series of institutions, structures and strategies that have been based on the presumption of that 'threat:' NATO, the Atlantic Alliance, the Anglo-U.S. 'special relationship,' the presence of American forces in Europe and of British forces in Germany, just to mention a few. Standing next in line for demolition are such bodies as the Royal Institute for International Affairs (Chatham House) and the Institute for Strategic Studies, both of which have been maintained on the same discredited presumption of 'east-west' military conflict and therefore the need for western military integration.

It is visible that people like Mrs. Thatcher, whose minds still remain padlocked within the confines of post-1945 international thinking, are petrified at these new developments and frantically anxious to keep the old status-quo in being, pleading with the Americans to keep their forces in Europe for that purpose. But the Thatchers of this world will before long be swept away by a tide of events now rolling so fast that even the most forward-looking amongst us are having difficulty keeping up with them.

GERMAN UNITY

One such event, which is also a product of the communist collapse, will be the reunification of Germany and the assumption by that country of unquestioned leadership of mainland Europe. This—a development on which I wrote at some length three months ago—is now becoming recognised as inevitable by even the most embittered Teutonophobes in press and politics. This development will, in turn, have enormous repercussions among the nations that are the neighbours, or near neighbours, of Germany, including our own. For one thing, as I wrote in December, it will make a nonsense of the entire strategic criteria on which the two world wars of this century were deemed to be justified—for it will, in effect, reverse the verdict of those wars. For another, it will demolish the fantasy world of the pan-European school of political thought, which has envisaged the Common Market as a 'club' of equal partners held together by a mutual faith in internationalist ideals instead of by the dominant power of one leading nation-state.

As a single Germany increasingly calls the tune within its artificial structure, the other members will grow increasingly disenchanted with it, and the old national enmities will reemerge. Britain, in particular, will recognise that she is onto a loser by being part of an integrated Europe in which she can never be more than a peripheral and secondary force. She will resent being overshadowed by the nation she twice thought she had defeated; and she will be led, by the sheer pressure of international realities, to a fundamental reconsideration of her global rôle. It is my conviction that when this happens many will begin to see anew the value of our old family ties with Anglo-Saxon states across the oceans, will lament the fracture of these ties and will look for ways of restoring them. This will be yet one more development which will bring us to a scenario that will have much more in common with the 19th century than with the 20th.

WILL WE GO TO WAR OVER EASTERN GERMANY?

But there is a further consideration which must be in the minds of some but which, perhaps for diplomatic reasons, has not yet been widely aired. It is a consideration which must strike dread in the minds of those who danced and sang in the euphoria of the 1945 'victory.' Supposing that the Germans, increasingly strong and self-confident as a result of the union of the two parts of their country that are acknowledged to exist at present, later call for the restoration to them of other areas claimed, not without historical justification, as German soil, on the basis that these lands were severed from Germany by force of conquest by the 'victors' of 1945 and that therefore force of conquest would in the last resort be warranted as a means of bringing them back to the Fatherland when all peaceful negotiations (as is probable) had failed. What then would be the rest of the world's response? Would the Russians wish to divert—indeed, could they divert—large armies to a new war in the west which were already tied down keeping what remained of the Soviet Union together? Would the Americans, sick and tired of seeing their young men cut down in foreign adventures in no way necessary to the security of the United States, want to go through it all again?

And would an enfeebled Britain and an enfeebled France be able, on their own, to prevent things taking their course in the way of the reclamation of the ancient eastern territories of the German Reich—the real 'East Germany,' as distinct from the Central Germany that is today given that name? And even if Britain and France were not thus enfeebled, even if they had recovered some of their old strength and could stand up to Germany, would they consider it right or wise to do so—with all the memories of the two great European catastrophes of this century imprinted so firmly on the national consciousness of both peoples? Would we not, and would the French not, conclude that there must be a better way, that those catastrophes must not be repeated, that they must never, never happen again?

In fact, were Germany to lay claim, successfully, to her traditional eastern territories, and were we to have the good sense not to try to stop her, this would be just one more development that would bring us to a status-quo more like that existing before 1918 than like anything existing since.

And these are not mere idle projections into the future; these are realities made distinctly possible by current events. And here enters the central question: is this not where we came in?

Is it not inconceivable that, as the 21st century dawns, we will find ourselves placed back at a point in history similar to that existing at the end of the 19th? And will this not mean that our world, having gone berserk in its aberrations and contortions for 70-80 years in which it has tried to escape from history and into some other-worldly cosmic system, will be returning to the rails and proceeding again on course—a course not identical to those of the 19th and previous centuries but in logical progression from them and in accordance with the same basic historical laws?

This would signify that the childish and dishonest fantasies that have governed the 20th century would have become finally discarded. As nationalism asserted itself again—as it is now doing from Vilnius to Baku, from Tallinn to Timisoara—internationalism would disappear into the dustbin of worn-out and exhausted ideologies. It would mean—as I believe we are shortly about to see happen—that the theory of race-equality will crumble beneath the ruthless weight of events. Here it may take a catastrophe in South Africa, in the way of a white surrender and the creation of another Ethiopia from out of that prosperous and orderly land, to bring reality home to us. One hopes, of course, that a less painful awakening will suffice, but awakening there will be in some form or another, and thereby one more of the 20th century's absurd sophisms will reach the point of expiry—hastened on its way of course by the disintegration of the great cities of Britain and the U.S.A.

WILL THE RUSSIAN WHEEL TURN FULL-CIRCLE?

Then there is another prospect. At the moment the soothsayers of western 'democracy' are heralding the communist collapse east of the Elbe as a great victory for their own suppositions and ideals—perhaps best symbolised by the triumphal opening of the first McDonald's burger bar in Moscow last month. But how long will this honeymoon last? Already the people of Russia, and of Poland, and of Rumania too, are coming to realise that the slogans of 'liberalisation'—glasnost, perestroika, etc.—are not reducing the bread queues, not making the transport systems run properly, not making the factories produce better and more plentiful goods. In fact, things that were functioning badly under the old autocracies in these countries are now functioning much worse, and in some cases not functioning at all. So what does this portend?

Walter Lacquer, writing In the Sunday Telegraph on January 28th, spoke alarmingly of 'The rise of Russian fascism.' The theme of his article was that, as more and more people in the Soviet Union recognise that the new 'democratic' dispensation is not working, there is likely to be a big swing in favour of the setting up of an authoritarian system of the nationalist right. He said:

> This phenomenon is rooted in the general crisis of Soviet society, in the disappointment with the party, the unions and other official organisations. Although communism has been a bitter disappointment, there is no love of capitalism; there is, on the contrary, resentment against the noveaux riches (according to some estimates, there are now 175,000 millionaires in the Soviet Union) who made their money, not through honest work, enterprise and inventiveness, but by cheating the Soviet worker, by black market activities and so on.

What the writer did not say directly but implied in a later passage was that a not insubstantial portion of these 175,000 were Jews—referring to a recently published essay by one Mikhail Leontiev in which it was stated that:

> The doctrine of the extreme right is largely based on fear of 'satanic forces' that undermine everything sacred to the heart of Russian patriots, exploit people, instal local mafias to corrupt the population, instigate social and national strife. Leaders such as Mikhail Gorbachev and Alexander Yakovlev are mere puppets, manipulated by international corporations and Zionist billionaires.

Lacquer's article went on to speak of the fear "that the Russian people is gradually becoming a stranger in its own home, that it is biologically and culturally threatened with extinction..." What is interesting about these theories is that, right or wrong, they have obviously been formulated by many Russian people on the basis of their own local observation and experience, and can have been influenced scarcely, if at all, by propaganda on the subject coming from abroad. Those who discount such views are at the disadvantage of having to explain how, without collusion, different sets of people in entirely different parts of the world could come to adopt a picture so similar—these concepts of the 'extreme right' in Russia having obviously so much in common with concepts formed by people in Britain, the United States and elsewhere as responses to problems in their own societies.

It clearly was not inconceivable, according to Mr. Lacquer, that one possible option open to Russia could be the eventual restoration of Tsarism. Curiously enough, in a mammoth demonstration in Moscow on the 4th February flags of the old Imperial Russia were much in prominence.

Again, these tendencies point to a strong possibility of a reversion in Russia, as elsewhere, to the state of affairs pertaining in the 19th century—in the Russian case, that century being seen to have ended in 1917.

Simon Jenkins, writing in the Sunday Times on February 4th, spoke of the people of Eastern Europe "waiting for the real revolution." He went on to say that those who leapt to the assumption that liberal democracy was to provide the solution to the troubles of the countries affected could well be getting on a loser. "The future for a liberal, capitalist democracy across...East Europe must be uncertain," he said, and he continued:

> Central Europe has never been good at anarchy. The yearning for ordnung is strong, bolstered sometimes by imperialism, sometimes (such as now) by a contrasting desire for ethnic sovereignty. The alumni of the Leonid Brezhnev charm school may yet return to strut the ministries of Europe. Nationalism and Socialism are a heady European brew, and can be mixed in many different cocktails.

The significance of the two '-isms' juxtaposed in Mr. Jenkins' final sentence will not of course be lost on the perceptive reader! But what was also interesting was this writer's reference to the "real revolution" being waited for. This would suggest that the 'revolution' currently appearing to be in progress in Eastern Europe is merely a tactical retreat by the old guard, supported by their backers in the West, with a view to keeping the old system going under new colours. The 'real revolution' of which Mr. Jenkins speaks would be that revolution which would overthrow the communist order root and branch, breaking free not only of communism but also of the international financial cabal in the West which in the first case created communism and now is attempting to preserve its hold on Eastern Europe by some alternative confidence-trick which, when all the covering is stripped away, will reveal much the same forces still in command. It is, of course, the 'real revolution' that western finance fears—a fear that is expressed through the scribblings of journalists like Mr. Jenkins and Mr. Lacquer, who are its mouthpieces in a press that serves as the loyal organ of the Money Power that has created most of the chaos of our century.

THE CULTURAL COUNTER-REVOLUTION

While the developments indicated above all point to a return to old and familiar ground in the political context, developments in the cultural field may well be pointing in a similar direction. In an article in our January issue we focused attention in one of the most interesting phenomena of our times, namely a massive revulsion against modernism in architecture, and we spotlighted the similarity of attitude between those who defend the modernist school and those who champion other causes uniquely identified with 20th century 'progressiveness,' such as multi-racialism, feminism, birth control, homosexual liberation, anti-hanging and much else. Usually it is found that these are much the same people, and that when challenged in respect of one or other of their sacred cows they react in frenzied intolerance, more often than not resorting to crude name-calling against those who disagree with them rather than engage in reasoned debate. All this simply underlines what most intelligent folk well understand: that political and cultural revolutions usually go together, just as do counter-revolutions against them. What we are certainly seeing now is a counter-revolution against 20th century trends in architecture, and this is particularly marked in Britain and the United States, where classical architects, having been beyond the pale for a long time, are now coming back into fashion and can actually earn a living again!

It would be improbable for this trend not to be accompanied by parallel trends in music, painting, literature and the other arts—for the aesthetic instincts that lean people back towards beauty and form in one will also lean them likewise in others. To put it in a nutshell, the great modernist 'con' by which the western world's self-appointed cultural establishment has bemused the people for the greater part of this century is at last being seen for what it is, and there would be no surprise if some day, in some place, a Bauhaus architect were seen pursued through the streets by an angry mob howling for his blood in much the same way as is now happening to the former apparatchiks of the various Soviet régimes that have been toppling everywhere.

BACK TO HISTORY

So what do all these developments point to? In my submission they point to the fact that the 20th century is in the process of being massively rejected—thrown out, as if it were not part of true history but merely a hideous aberration from history. As this century draws to its close, a few years ahead of time, its great certainties, its fallacies, its naive dreams, its contrived falsehoods and its repulsive ethics and styles are being discarded—as events discredit them and human instinct recoils from them.

The champions and the profiteers of the 20th century have been telling us for a long time that we must drag ourselves into this century and that we cannot put the clock back. But it is not, and never was, a matter of putting the clock back; on the contrary, the rhythm of the clock is now simply being restored, and the 21st century is dawning upon us and becoming the era of history into which we must drag ourselves. The process of doing this will be the most difficult for those who have been most at home in the century now ending.

I am generally not one given to predictions, but I am going to take the risk of ending this article with a few of these that are based, as the punter would say, on a thorough study of form—while being allied, as I hope does not seem too arrogant, to a reasonable historical sense. These begin with the general prediction that, as we end the 20th century, the world will take a form far more prevailing at its outset than at any time since, that as chronological distance from the 19th century increases so will historical distance decrease, and we will find ourselves again on ground that would have been familiar to our grandfathers and great-grandfathers in the days of their youth.

Part of this will be the world's rejection of internationalism and the return to the primacy of the nation-state. This is not to say that the internationalists do not still have some strong cards to play; in those places where power resides (at least in the West) the drive towards internationalism will not abate but will intensify, but it will be an intensification that becomes more and more out of step with the realities of the world around it, and with millions of people's perception of those realities. The one-worlders will become like the dinosaurs of the Soviet bureaucracy, pronouncing ever more absurd decrees as the tide of popular sentiment wells up against their walls.

With the rejection of internationalism will come a rejection of its concomitant superstition: the theory of race-equality. Today neither reason nor sentiment are on this theory's side; all that sustains it is fear—the fear that kept the Bolshevik apparatus in being for some while after its credit had become exhausted. But, just as with the Bolsheviks, the multi-racialists will find that fear of them will evaporate with the passing of time—until the point is reached at which they will be the ones who are fearful, running for their lives from the chaos and the anger that their evil experiments have created.

With the coming of the new century there will emerge an international balance of power much more similar to that prevailing at the end of the 19th century than to that that has existed for most of the 20th. Russia will certainly be a power of no small significance, just as she was in Tsarist times. But the world will not tremble before her—as it has done since 1917, and particularly since 1945. Russia will in due course cease to be the 'Soviet Union' and will again become 'Russia.' She may keep her Ukrainian and Byelorussian parts, but she will lose much of the rest. She will become again a Slav nation, and this nation will look much more like Russia of pre-1917—perhaps even with a Tsar, probably at least with a patriotic ruling autocracy.

Germany will again become one of the world's truly great powers—particularly, as is probable, as she eventually regains her lost eastern territories and enters into a merger with German Austria.

OURSELVES

As for Britain, I have said before that events in Europe, and particularly in Germany, will force us to a wholesale revaluation of the usefulness of our rôle as a participant in continental affairs. By meddling in Europe we have done ourselves no good and we have done Europe no good either. We are part of the European racial and cultural family that extends from this continent right across North America and over to Australasia, taking in small but valuable minorities in Southern Africa. But we must understand properly which part: it is the part comprising those countries, or sections of countries, in which people of British stock predominate. Our destiny lies with these peoples, and not over the Channel. It is a paradox, but nevertheless a true one, that the lesser our involvement in Continental Europe the better will be our relations with Continental Europe.

It is possible—though premature to say probable—that the 21st century could become similar to the 19th century in that it could witness a great resurgence of British power. Whether that happens will depend very much on whether we in Britain grasp the full meaning of the times into which we are now moving. Our revival as a great nation standing together with a family of peoples of the same race will, of course, be a concept which our enemies (within and without) will stigmatise as 'putting the clock back.' But I would aver that it is a matter, not of putting the clock back, but of putting it forward—that is, of anticipating in advance the kind of new century in which we are likely to have to live, and preparing ourselves for that century. The 21st century, like the 19th century, is going to be a century of nations—and in which the nations that are strong will survive and prosper while those that are weak will fall by the wayside. The recipe for our own renewed strength is clear; whether we adopt it remains to be seen. In whatever event, our one hope is a wholesale rejection of everything the 20th century has stood for.

This is not to say that the 19th century will be recreated in replica, with the restoration of the british Empire. Even if such a return to the past were possible, it would not be desirable since a resumption of the burden of ruling India, plus a multitude of other colonies and dependencies not peopled by our kind, would contribute not one iota to the renewed national strength we should wish to acquire. What we most certainly should pursue is a close trading alliance with Australasia and Canada that would bring into complementary relationship our own manufacturing aptitude (appropriately revived) and their immense surplus of minerals, food products and habitable land. Such a concept will, of course, be opposed by those who say that present political realities in the countries in question would not permit it. But to this the reply would be that present political realities, like so many of those elsewhere in the world, are liable to be swept away like flotsam by the storms of change now beginning to sweep this globe. We know not what opportunities the new realities of tomorrow will create, but we should at least now be working out clearly in our minds the goals that should underlie our response to them.

More available space would permit further forecasting, but we are running out of column-inches and must condense things into the briefest possible statement of probabilities. These are:

(1) That America will retreat from her world rôle and into isolation. The 'melting pot' that is the present United States will dissolve in civil war and chaos, and a new nation will have to be formed in the southern part of the North American continent that will correspond to ethnic realities.

(2) Africa will at some time in the new century revert to European control, though not necessarily with its boundaries exactly as before.

(3) Japan will be driven from her dominant position on world markets by protective measures applied against her exports by most of the countries that are now her main customers. This will force the Japanese to opt for a policy of autarky, and thus again of colonial expansion.

(4) The European Common Market will disintegrate as a reality, though it may remain in being as a purely paper institution with everyone ignoring its rules. This would be due to the fact that its leading advocates and functionaries would not be people of the required courage and honesty to declare it dissolved.

(5) Zionism, the most powerful single world force of the 20th century, will decline into one of negligible influence in the 21st.

RETURN TO CULTURE

The final prediction concerning the 21st century is already being fulfilled in the way stated earlier. That century will rediscover what is true art, true music and true literature, just as it will return to sanity in other related cultural fields. It will laugh at 20th century 'artistic' trends as we now laugh at the flat-earthers and the followers of witchcraft. It will reflect in wonderment how its recent ancestors allowed themselves to be dazzled for so long by garbage masquerading as profundity and by charlatans assuming the mantle of genius. Perhaps, as was done in a certain part of Europe during a short-lived cultural renaissance in the present century, our descendants of tomorrow will stage exhibitions of these heaps of concrete, monkey daubings and other artistic excrescences of a diseased siecle—as a reminder to all of the fits of lunacy to which mankind can succumb under the stimuli of alien forces allowed to insinuate themselves into the cultural fabric when guards are down.

All of these things, I predict, will come to pass in the century that lies before us and which has probably started as these words are written. With them will come a strange upturning in the use of language. The 'progressives' will become the reactionaries and the 'reactionaries' progressives. Perhaps that will be appropriate, for has not the old century been one in which language has been stood on its head: good becoming evil and evil becoming good, truth becoming falsehood and falsehood becoming truth, the great men becoming the demons and the demons becoming the great men?

20th century RIP—and without regrets. Our civilisation is awakening from a nightmare, and is ready again to resume history's road!

They're at it again!

HAD HITLER won the Second World War, one of his subsequent actions would have been to invade the United States! Yes, this is actually solemnly stated in a new book now in circulation. The book is titled If Hitler Had Won the War, and has been written by one Ralph Giordano. In case some may think that name has an Italian ring about it, it should be stated that, as acknowledged in a Sunday Times (11th February) report on the book, Giordano's mother was as German-born Jewess.

Giordano claims to have based his information on Nazi archives—odd how these archives have a habit of popping up decades after the war, no-one ever having discovered them before!

No doubt there will be plenty of people around with pretensions to 'education' who will eagerly swallow this latest piece of gobbledygook without giving a moment's thought, first to the logistics of a transatlantic invasion by German armies that would have had to be huge beyond imagination, or to the even more elementary question of whether Hitler would have seen the slightest political advantage in such an invasion even had it been militarily possible. Such rational considerations never have inhibited the self-appointed World War II historians in the past, and are unlikely to inhibit them in the future. Shock, horror and fantasy are always much better weapons by which to hold a mass audience than common sense or facts.

What should give us food for thought is not that the partly Jewish Mr. Giordano should have written the book but that such a paper as the Sunday Times should comment on it in a decidedly non-derisory tone. In fact, the report on the book, written by a Graham Lees, while not exactly testifying to the truth of it, does not in a single line suggest that it is obvious nonsense. The Sunday Times is, of course, a paper that, like its stablemate the Times, has pretensions to being the most 'up-market' of papers in this country, very definitely appealing to the élite among newspaper readers. This does not seem to be allowed to prevent the paper's editor featuring material in its columns which would be more appropriate to the pages of a schoolboy's comic.

Our media masters have, we well know, always had a low estimate of the public's intelligence, but we never knew it was quite as low as this!

WHICH WAY, WESTERN MAN?
SURVIVAL MANUAL FOR THE WHITE RACE

William Gayley Simpson has spent a lifetime of keen observation, careful analysis, and deep reflection developing the principal thesis of his book: that the single, undying purpose of all human activity should be the ennobling of man. In support of this thesis he looks at the foundations of Western Society, at the structure of our government, at the effect of technology and industrialization on man, at the roles of the sexes, at economics, and at race. The book goes to the roots of the problems facing the White Race today, and it shows the ways in which White society must be changed if the race is to survive. Which Way Western Man? is an encyclopedic work whose conclusions can be ignored by no one with a sense of responsibility to the future. Jews Fear Return of Pogroms in Russia

The Sunday Time, London, 18 February 1990
by James Blitz, Moscow

A CHILLING word has begun to reappear in the Russian language. It is heard on television and in newspapers, in homes and on the streets. The word is pogrom, and it summons up demons from Russia's anti-Semitic past.

Its literal translation is "like thunder", but to its victims it means pillage and murder.

Anti-Semitism is again on the rise. Pogroms have already occurred in Azerbeijan, and Moscow's large Jewish population fears it is next.

Two weeks ago a member of the Congress of People's Deputies appeared on television with a grim warning: a pogrom would be carried out against the city's Jews on May 5 and the perpetrators would be Pamyat, a militant anti-Semitic group devoted to the restoration of pure Russian traditions.

It was the latest in a long string of rumours that have heightened tension and led to an unprecedented exodus of Jews to Israel. Although there are no reports of physical attacks on Jews in Moscow, there have been assaults in Leningrad, with one man murdered and the Star of David carved into his flesh. In Moscow it has so far been confined to poison pen letters, the desecration of cemeteries and anti-Semitic demonstrations.

Jews have also been barred from schools and universities, and have become the victims of abuse in the street.

The authorities have urged people to keep calm. In Kiev, the city council last week denounced rumours of pogroms against Jews as "designed to destabilise the political situation."

But the damage to the Jewish community has already been done. Last week it was apparent in the grubby rooms of the Shalom Jewish Musical Theatre on the outskirts of Moscow. Sitting around a makeshift platform were 60 Jews, some well-dressed, some in headscarves and skull-caps, asking Mikhail Chlenov, a leader of the Jewish community, how they could emigrate.

Latent anti-Semitism has existed in the Soviet Union since the last century. But under the reforms of Mikhail Gorbachev a dangerous mix of economic woes and glasnost has pushed prejudices further into the open.

Even though anti-Semitic material is illegal, hostile articles are appearing. "You Jews started the revolution and now your plot to ruin Mother Russia has succeeded; you are scuttling out again," said one letter to the mainstream magazine, Ogonyok.

"Jews are getting terrified," said Chlenov. "There was a threat last year from Pamyat that there would be a pogrom on June 4. Jewish families asked to be locked away in the police cells for protection. Others hid with non-Jewish neighbours. Hundreds went into hiding. I don't expect it to be any different in May."

Gorbachev's perestroika has meted out kindness and misery in equal measure to Jews. The kindness has been to allow most of those who want to leave to do so. Sixty thousand left in 1989; 100,000 could go this year.

Perhaps 1m, a quarter of the Soviet Union's Jewish population, could leave over the next few years, draining valuable skills from an already atrophied economy. Many of them are professionals—doctors, engineers, scientists—with precisely the skills the Soviet Union can ill afford to lose.

The misery glasnost has brought is in allowing anti-Semitic groups to speak openly. Last month, a meeting of the Russian writers' union in Moscow was disrupted by 60 members of Pamyat shouting anti-Semitic slogans while the militia looked on with indifference.

There have been threats of violence. Yusef Perozovsky, manager of Moscow's only kosher restaurant, claims Pamyat is constantly threatening to murder him. The strain is taking its toll: he has the saddest face in his lively establishment.

But not all Jews are fleeing. Only last week, in the Ukrainian city of Kharkov, there was an anti-Pamyat rally after the organisation had raided Jewish apartments.

Nor is Pamyat willing to take the blame. At its headquarters in south Moscow, the most striking impressions are the powerful smell of incense and a huge black poster which shows a Star of David with the word "danger" written underneath.

Pamyat's leader is Alexei Grigorievich Vasiliev, an ox-like former actor. Dressed in the group's uniform black shirt, he surrounds himself with tsarist memorabilia. Vasiliev was outraged by rumours that his movement would launch a pogrom in May. "We are totally against pogroms and all acts of vandalism," he said. "Often these are being carried out by people who say they belong to Pamyat but have no connection with us."

He thumped the table. "If I wanted to carry out a pogrom, would I want it announced publicly? The papers are always calling us anti-Semites, but we are not anti-Jews. We are simply against the idea of the Jews as the chosen people and against aggressive Zionism. We are also against the Jews who brought ruin to the Soviet Union: Marx, Trotsky and others."

He vigorously denied accusations that his members bully or threaten Jews, or have covert links with the KGB, the secret police. He claims to have a loyal following of 1,000 and says that his largest demonstration attracted a crowd of 15,000.

Perhaps most alarming for the Jews is that Pamyat is probably not behind many of the threats and prejudice. Chlenov accepted that there were many anti-Semitic organisations and individuals. "The trouble is," said Chlenov, "that the authorities have never condemned anti-Semitism openly."

Their passive attitude is clear. Although Chlenov is head of the first organised Jewish movement since the revolution, with thousands of members and a formal congress, the authorities have given him no office, as would be routine for other such organisations.

Nor have the authorities supported Jewish ventures. The Mikhoels Jewish Cultural Centre, which was established last year amid much fanfare, has disappeared, largely because of official indifference.

"Gorbachev's attitude is to be silent in the face of our problems," said Chlenov. "Perhaps the leadership is frightened of being accused of being pro-Zionist. Or maybe they would far rather we all left the country, once and for all."

As he said this, there was a knock on the door. A long line of people waited outside the theatre dressing room for his advice on emigration. The Jewish community may have won its battle to leave the Soviet Union, but is losing its battle to live in it.

THE LATE GREAT BOOK:
THE BIBLE

AN ACCOUNT OF CHRISTIAN AND BIBLICAL ORIGINS.

Nicholas Carter feels that it is time for us to sit down and do what many Christians rarely do: Study the Holy Bible. In doing so, we may discover whether or not the Bible is indeed "Holy" and the "Word of God." In strict biblical order, the author methodically, and scathingly, examines the various claims made in the "Holy Book" and shows how many of them bear no relationship to reality whatsoever. ARYAN SOCIALISM

by Major Donald Vincent Clerkin

"Of this economic Stoicism of the Classical world the exact antithesis is Socialism, meaning thereby not Marx's theory but Frederick William I's Prussian practice which long preceded Marx and will yet displace him—the Socialism, inwardly akin to the system of the Old Egypt, that comprehends and cares for permanent economic relations, trains the individual in his duty to the whole, and glorifies hard work as an affirmation of Time and Future." (Oswald Spengler, The Decline of the West, Vol. I, page 138.)

"Men are tired to disgust of money-economy. They hope for salvation from somewhere or other, for some real thing of honour and chivalry, of inward nobility, of unselfishness and duty. And now dawns the time when the form-filled powers of the blood, which the rationalism of the Megalopolis has suppressed, reawaken in the depths. Everything in the order of dynastic tradition and old nobility that has saved itself up for the future, everything that there is of high money-disdaining ethic, everything that is intrinsically sound enough to be, in Frederick the Great's words, the servant—the hard-working, self-sacrificing, caring servant—of the State, all that I have described in one word as Socialism in contrast to Capitalism—all this becomes suddenly the focus of immense life forces." (Spengler, op cit., Vol. II, page 464.

We Aryans realize that the age of Capitalism and its stooge Democracy is just about over. The Western Culture has evolved into the Megalopolitan Civilization. We are beset by political parties, press and media, the parties in the pocket of Jewish Money, the press and media the mouthpieces of Jewish Money. Jewish Money talks and rules in American society today. At this juncture it is inevitable that Caesarism will crush the sham Democracy, which is permitted to the masses by the Money Power in order to organize them into easily-fleeced tax herds. The masses have no choice, so locked into the System are they with greed for monetary gain, but to play the game of phony election politics, of voting for Tweedle candidates who espouse disastrous policies, and who tell the sort of lies that the masses prefer to hear. Down this road the masses will travel just once. Caesarism waits at the end, which for the Roman proletarian meant bread and circuses, but which for the White men in this age will mean mongrelization in the One-World Corporate System.

There is nothing honorable in being forced to join an ant-heap. Those who rule the Megalopolis see no need for separate races and divergent cultures. Exploit and extirpate—these will be the motives of the new Caesars. But the Aryan does not have to share this fate. He can throw off the cult of Money and greed for gain. Money has become an idol, the sole reason for existence of all too many Aryans. Children are either not begot, or quickly thrown aside by the parents in pursuit of things. The State has become the symbol of this greed, causing millions of the non-White unwashed to come to these shores seeking enrichment. When the Aryan racial State—the National Socialist government of Germany—existed, the world's unwashed did not seek asylum there. It was understood that the NS Staat existed for the building up of the Aryan race, and not for exploitation by the world of Finance. Wherever Money and Finance rule, the State appears to the crows, gulls and vultures like a great, stinking landfill. Where the caring servant of the Aryan people is the shepherd who guides the State, there are permitted no opportunities for parasites to feed from the life and blood of the Aryan race.

This is the Aryan Socialism we support. It had nothing to do with Money, or phony party politics; neither is it an ideology, which Marx, Engels and Lenin made of what they called "socialism." Aryan Socialism is a racial ethic—a Soul-Force. Marxism is Jewish exploitation of the frustration the people feel against Capitalism, also a Jewish motive, so as to get the wealth of the State and the peoples' live into Jewish hands. Jewish Capitalism robs the people, then the Jewish Marxists come in and enslave them. It is not true Socialism. True Socialism existed long before Marx in the soul of Gothic Europe. It was the underlying motive behind the Old Régimes, that series of European governances which held sway before the Jewish Revolution against the French (1789) emancipated the power and authority of Usury, the prime tool of Jewish exploitation. The Socialism we see as Aryan caring is first and foremost thoughtful of the Aryan race. It exists to nurture and protect, not to exploit, but to raise up. Call it Aryan Racialism, if you prefer. It is the racial "glue" which binds the Aryan race together. The Jews gave the Aryans the idol of Money to worship, which brought on an orgy of atomism—every man for himself! Aryan Socialism once again ties the race together, forbidding the exploitation of our people and punishing racial treason committed against the Aryan race.

In Aryan Socialism, no Aryan need fear the loss of property rights or individual immunities against government persecution. Every other 'ism'—Capitalism, Communism, Conservatism, Liberalism—exists to either exploit the weaknesses of the Aryans, or to use the non-White masses against the traditions of the Aryans as a battering ram. Aryan Socialism cares nothing at all for the masses of the world, neither seeking to exploit or eradicate them. But Aryan Socialism will not permit the Arayn race to be humilated and exterminated by the Corporate Caesars. Neither will we permit the unwashed Third World masses to engulf our lands. There will be a showdown between the forces of Aryan Socialism and Corporate Caesarism. Corporate Caesarism won the first round in 1945. The next round—the final showdown—will come when the Aryan movement has succeeded in mobilizing the Aryan race in its own defense. Look at Europe today. In Italy, "immigrants" are being told to get out. France's National Front, Maurice Le Pem's party, is winning local elections on an anti-immigration platform. White Canada is waking up to the threat that 'multi-racialism' and 'multi-culturalism' is presenting to the future of an Aryan racial presence there. In Budapest, thousands of Hungarians demonstrated against the influence of Jews in the Hungarian State Television Authority. The German Republicans are saying clearly that they have had all they want of the trash 'refugees' that have come in while Bonn does nothing to stop it. Be sure that a reunified Germany will put an end to this invasion of immigrants from the Third World.

We Aryans in the United States have a choice. We can continue to do nothing, and see our children and grandchildren dragged down to the level of the people in Bangladesh, mixed in the racial crucible and destroyed forever, or we can start right now to make our racial cause heard. Do not be afraid to be known as a White Racist. Do proclaim your racial concerns loudly. This is what it means to be an Aryan Socialist: caring about the future of your race is what this fight is all about. I have always been of the opinion that all it would take to stop the Jews and their stooges in their track is for enough Whites to tell them to stop. Everywhere in Eastern Europe the Jews are being indicted by the peoples. The old Marxist stooges do not dare oppose the rising tide of anti-Jewish sentiment. Even in the USSR, the Pamyat society is able to speak right out against the Jews. They can do it because they dare to do it. But if Whites in the USA refuse to speak out, they will continue to be humiliated and ruined as a people. □

DOES THE WEST HAVE THE WILL TO SURVIVE?

That is the obvious question posed by Jean Raspail's terrifying novel of the swamping of the White world by an unlimited flood of non-White "refugees." But there is also a less obvious and even more fundamental question: Must Whites find their way to a new Morality and a new spirituality in order to face the moral challenges of the present and overcome them? THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS is the most frightening book you will ever read. It is frightening because it is utterly believable. The armada of refugee ships in Raspail's story is exactly like the one that dumped 150,000 Cubans from Fidel Castro's prisons and insane asylums on our shores in 1980 – except this time the armada is from India, with more than 70 times as large a population. And it is only the first armada of many. If any book will awaken White Americans to the danger they face from uncontrolled immigration, it is THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS. Health and AIDS

by
Ernst Zündel

To my friends
in the English-speaking world: 17 March 1990

The news does not seem to be very uplifting today. Southwest Africa being handed over to the communist SWAPO—who would have believed that only a few years ago?! Who would have thought that South Africa would hand over that mineral-rich area to a noisy enemy sworn to destroy the Republic of South Africa?!

Inside South Africa, the release of Mandela is, of course, nothing short of revolutionary! The media world-wide is going crazy. One can only compare what is happening with a media-shark feeding frenzy.

Many of you have called me, upset and worried by these developments. You were astonished at my calm and quiet reassurance that "the universe is unfolding as it should," in the face of these "war-dancing" or "joy-dancing" blacks which fill the TV screens world-wide.

Let me say that I am glad for Mandela, the man, to get out of prison, for I think that to be free is wonderful. However, I question the wisdom and wonder what was going on in the minds of the South African government. Maybe they got too much of that African sun? They give me a "gag order" in Canada for publishing a pamphlet, Mandela is released after being convicted of planning terrorist attacks and associating with people who preach the Marxist gospel of violent revolutionary struggle! Mandela was released unconditionally!

South Africans of all colours will have to decide if they want to destroy the only functioning and "people feeding" modern state in Africa. We who do not live there can only watch and see what will be done.

To those of you who get my newsletter, I would simply say this: grit your teeth! Organize your defenses! Hang in there! Time is working for you, as astonishing as this may sound to you at this moment. Africa, black Africa to be specific, is facing a population crash, a demographic disaster of the greatest magnitude! The "AIDS Belt," as experts call it, is already in very serious trouble and will be a disaster area in another 2-3 years. Believe me when I tell you that if the projections of various experts are correct, then there will be no "functional armies" in some of these states by the mid-nineties. The same will hold true for medical services; the infrastructure, even now tenuous at best, will be collapsing as the western-trained civil servants and government employees, bank clerks, administrators, even policemen will either be dead, dying or terribly sick. The urban black elite seems to be the worst hit, apparently, and thus the most threatened with virtual extinction. For those who have lived in or have been to Africa, it will be immediately apparent that every one of these states will virtually dissolve into roaming bands of violent bandits, factions and tribes.

Little danger to the outside world will come from these regional bands of marauders. As these states collapse, harbors and airports will be closed. More food shortages will kill more people, a disaster the likes of which we cannot imagine will befall millions, if not hundreds of millions of people! "Survival of the fittest" will take on new meaning, because it will mean that those who are not yet sick will want to stay healthy and will follow a primordial path to security. We might well experience "Stone Age" behaviour, in the Space Age!

Five years, only five short years, could change every military, political and economic as well as demographic projection ever made by those arrogant eggheads in their Ivory Towers and "Think Tanks." Nature, rape, mutilated, polluted, sometimes briefly "tamed" by man's efforts, would be striking back with a vengeance. Man-made laws on the "freedom to travel" worldwide, by people suspected to be diseased because they come from "hot-beds of infection," would be as rigorously enforced, and travelers, asylum-seekers, would be quarantined as in the days of Empire.

Oh, you can laugh, call me a dreamer, unrealistic, go ahead! I hope you are right—I hope I am wrong. But look at the statistics, think about the news stories, the projections which must follow the trends to a logical conclusion. Africa is in bad shape. Everybody who has studied AIDS is just about agreed on that point. Let's now look at some of the other deductions we have to make. Hiding our heads in the sand won't make AIDS go away.

Let's look at Superpower USA and AIDS. Let's look at a story by UPI, 23 February 1990, coming out of Atlanta.

AIDS Cases Expected to Climb Again

by Charles S. Taylor

ATLANTA (UPI) The United States has "yet to turn the corner on the AIDS problem," with up to 57,000 new cases expected this year and nearly a half-million cases possible by the end of 1993, federal officials said.

New data indicate an average of more than 80,000 people are becoming infected each year with the AIDS-causing human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), and there are now about 1 million HIV-infected individuals in the United States, the national Centers for Disease Control said Thursday.

Dr. James Curran, who heads the CDC's AIDS task force, said the finding that new HIV infections are occurring at a greater rate than active cases of AIDS shows that "we have yet to turn the corner on the AIDS problem. There is no premature delaration of victory here."

The new projections of HIV infection and AIDS cases were formulated at a recent workshop on AIDS sponsored by the CDC. The projected 52,000-57,000 AIDS cases for 1990 represent a 14 percent increase over the 44,000-50,000 estimated for all of 1989. Curran said the projections through 1993 show increases at a slightly slower rate than 14 percent.

New AIDS cases are expected to range between 56,000 and 71,000 in 1991, between 58,000 and 85,000 in 1992, and between 61,000 and 98,000 in 1983. By the end of 1993 total deaths from AIDS will range between 285,000 and 340,000, the experts said.

Then let's look at an article in the Chicago Tribune of 10 November 1989, by Margareth Roth:

Army Can't Find a Strategy for Fighting its Invisible Enemy—AIDS

The afflicted include single men, married women and—as with AIDS cases in the civilian world—a disproportionate number of blacks and Hispanics.

While the infection rate among men is more than twice that for women, married women are more likely than single women to be infected with the AIDS virus, Army officials don't know why.

Black soldiers make up 54.7 percent of the HIV-positive cases in the Army but account for only 27.1 percent of all troops. Likewise, Hispanic soldiers represent 6.4 percent of the HIV-positives, but only 3.7 percent of all soldiers.

The federal Center for Disease Control keeps statistics only on people with AIDS, not those who carry the AIDS virus but have not developed the disease.

The Army will admit no one who carries the virus, but it has been unable to stop soldiers from getting infected after they join. Efforts to alert them to the dangers of AIDS have been dampened by the Army's official taboo on homosexuality. A film created in 1987 to broach the subject has yet to win approval from the Army chief of staff.

There are supposed to be no gay soldiers. Homosexuality is grounds for dismissal from the armed forces. Yet the military reflects the society at large, and some soldiers are gay. Army doctors assume, in fact, that homosexual sex is most often responsible for soldiers contracting AIDS.

Measuring how many soldiers are practicing unsafe sex and talking to them about the dangers of AIDS are impossible goals, since any gay soldier is unlikely to risk dismissal by being frank.

Legally, military doctors are bound by regulation not to use any information against troops provided in AIDS counseling, such as an admission of homosexual sex or illegal behaviour, such as sex with a prostitute or drug use.

Practically speaking, infected soldiers may be intimidated by a doctor's rank and be less than candid. "When they come see me, I'm still an Army officer," say Col. Charles N. Oster, chief of infectious diseases at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

After a US military commander grouped all "his" AIDS sufferers in a special barrack and assigned them jobs which dealt with the everyday operations of the post, the barracks quickly became known as the "HIV-Hotel." A stink was raised, an investigation followed, and Margaret Roth covered it this way:

In probing the reasons for the reassignment of at least 65 HIV-infected soldiers, the inspector general found that the command at Ft. Hood had acted to safeguard military readiness, "an issue of primary importance to deployable units... No evidence was discovered that suggested the policy arose from an antipathy toward these soldiers."

A Forces Command officer who asked to remain anonymous put it this way: "Put yourself in the position of a commander. He's go to say these are the guys I can take (overseas). These are the guys I can't take. Somehow you've go to identify people you can take on a certain contingency mission."

So mulitply this by the thousands in a few years' time, and you have an army of bed-ridden, barrack-bound invalids!

The Globe and Mail of Saturday 23 December 1989 had an article by Stephen Strauss, titled "How to prevent spread of AIDS? Separate politics from statistics." He goes on with remarkable frankness to say:

In 1986, women accounted for a very small percentage—4.8 or 40 cases—of the total. In 1989, women accounted for 5.7 percent, 186 cases, of the total. And as much as it strikes a racial cord to say it, when blood transfusions (50) are removed from the list of reasons, many (at least 70) of the cases of AIDS in women in this country remain restricted to those who were born in Haiti and those having sex with men who were born in Haiti or Africa. The Haiti connection accounts for the fact that the lion's share of women with AIDS—127—is found in Quebec.

In many places, the pattern of AIDS in the Caribbean—and Haiti in particular—now follows the African model. There the disease is roughly evenly distributed between men and women. Why this different pattern is in place still remains a mystery. Until the cause is understood, another racially linked fact also must be faced.

Recent arrivals from Haiti are a particular risk group for the heterosexual spread of the disease. I once asked Dr. Robert Ramis, an epidemiologist working on the problem at Montreal General Hospital, whether he would advise women to steer clear of Haitians.

He answered: "Do you want a truthful answer or a publishable one?" The truthful answer is yes. If you want to reduce your risk, you cut out risky behaviour with groups in which the disease is relatively widespread.

The problem, he also pointed out, is that the public was confused about how one got the disease. They had been led to believe that behaviour alone caused the illness. Sharing needles, or anal sex or blood transfusions. But in fact what harbors AIDS is a virus. If you are partnered with someone who is not infected and you are both monogamous and don't inject drugs, you are fairly safe.

I frankly don't know how to combine AIDS' racial and sexual incidence patterns with a caring social system, except to say that we cannot avoid the numbers by hiding behind political liberalism. Unpalatable truths won't go away just because they are unpalatable.

So, now we have it; if Stephen Strauss, who by looks and name seems Jewish, can come to these conclusions, why can we not?

But the stories don't end there; China now admits to a much larger AIDS problem than hitherto. Brazil, which until 1987 denied any AIDS problem, is now third in the world after Africa and the USA. Thailand reports 50,000 infected prostitutes and IV drug users. India reports "AIDS crisis in blood banks which have been infected by repeatedly using dirty needles." UN soldiers sent to Beirut are all tested for AIDS upon their return to their home countries! France has an acute AIDS problem; even little Switzerland, that jewel of a country, the epitomy of cleanliness and conservatism, has a frightening AIDS problem.

In those countries, Stephen Strauss' advice should also be taken! Statistics should be separated from politics and consideration of race or anything else! The public has a right to know the facts, all the facts. I for my part am convinced that by the end of the 1990s we won't recognize the world. I believe in the survival of the fittest—I do not mean the muscle-bound Rambos, pictured by Hollywood films, no, I mean those of us who think a problem through before they act. But once they act, they do so with calm, even cold, detached, deliberate and forceful steps to protect themselves and their families. I guarantee you that there is not a single man-made law that will stand in a man's, or a group of people's way who have made up their minds that they, their wives and children are going to live.

We are not facing pleasant times, but what will come out of the next upheaval will be a little more reality-oriented than the sick liberal minds with their unnatural and therefore doomed egalitarian marxist ideas. These people are already the political dinosaurs of tomorrow.

Ten years, that's all it will take—maximum. The one thing which could change all that is an effective vaccine or some other potion which prevents, arrests or even cures AIDS. The chances are slim for that!

The AIDS virus is apparently mutating into ever different strains, so all of you who put your blind faith into our modern ability to find a cure for everything, well, they have not found a cure for the common cold.

Cheer up! Where there is life, there is hope! □

THE BIG AIDS DECEPTION

from Sunday Times, South Africa, 21 January 1990

SCIENTISTS examining satellite photographs taken over Central Africa noticed a curious phenomenon. Several formerly prosperous villages in Zaire had been deserted and bush was already encroaching on the roads leading to ghostly circles of abandoned dwellings.

Further investigations revealed that AIDS was the monster that had caused the villagers to flee in panic into the bush—leaving their dying behind them.

The researchers, from the World Health Organisation, then turned their attention to Uganda. There the picture was similarly "clear and awful" with more deserted "AIDS villages."

Entire towns were heading for a similar fate—in Kasensero, for instance, one in every four inhabitants had already died and nearly all those still alive were infected with the disease known as "Slim."

Kenyan prostitutes on the streets of Nairobi were tested—and not one was found to be free of the virus.

It has only recently dawned on Western AIDS agencies that African nations are guilty of grossly and shamelessly underreporting their AIDS casualties, often to avoid loss of face and keep the tourist dollars flowing.

Piecing together the evidence, independent researchers have painted a grotesque picture of a continent dying of AIDS. The most frightening projection of all has come from WHO itself which believes the virus could claim half Africa's population within the next ten years.

The SA AIDS Economic Research Institute predicts the disease will cause a huge population vacuum in Central Africa by the mid-1990s, causing all mineral production to cease.

"AIDS is everyone's problem," say the posters lining the avenues of Harare. But the next line is the telling one: "Jesus Christ—the only hope."

The implication is one increasingly heard in Africa—that short of divine intervention the continent is lost to AIDS.

Five years ago Zimbabwe's blood transfusion service was proud to become the third in the world to screen blood for the HIV virus. Now the nation leads the continent in the great African AIDS deception.

Collapse

Two years ago Zimbabwe decreed that the official death toll be reduced from 380 to 119. Nearly all research was halted. There are reports, officially denied, that sufferers are confined to AIDS concentration camps near Lake Kariba.

All reference to AIDS on death certificates is banned and blood transfusion services are under orders not to release HIV statistics because these are "state secrets."

Western agencies believe up to a million Zimbabweans are sero-positive—a quarter of the nation's adults—and have warned that the country faces economic collapse by the end of the next decade.

"It's an internationally-held opinion that statistics from many African countries are huge underestimations," says South African AIDS expert, Professor Ruben Sher. "Only 10 percent of cases in Africa are being reported." WHO has no choice but to accept statistics provided by reporting nations—many of which are up to a year late and subject to each nation's prejudices. Thus late last year WHO announced there were 33,000 sufferers in Africa.

This is an amazing distortion of the true picture. Malawi, one of Africa's smallest countries, is estimated to have a sero-positive population at least TWICE the size of the official total for the entire continent.

In Africa there is a surprisingly widespread belief that AIDS is an invention of the church aimed at curbing sexual freedom. This led to a popular quip that SIDA, the French acronym for the virus, stood for Syndrome Imaginaire pour Discourager les Amourex.

In the Zairean cabinet, jokes about AIDS were once rife. But they suddenly stopped when a senior cabinet minister died of AIDS—along with his wife and mistress.

Further south, three Zambian cabinet ministers died within a year from causes never publicly revealed, but widely rumoured to be AIDS. Then President Kenneth Kaunda publicly admitted that his fifth son had died of the disease.

There is strong evidence that AIDS originated in Africa, whether or not one believes the green monkey theory. Nevertheless, African nations—with the possible exception of Uganda, Zaire and Zambia—still often hold the belief that AIDS is a white man's disease.

"In the US they said AIDS was from Haiti," says Renee Sabatier of London's Panos Institute. "In Haiti, they said it was from Africa. In Africa they said it was a disease of the degenerate West."

The truth is no one knows where AIDS came from. But it is here and there is no cure. It's time all African nations admitted an epidemic is sweeping the continent. □

WHEN ABORTION IS A CRIME

All simpletons know there ain't no difference 'tween races, but nevertheless female Congoids commonly become puberate when they are nine. A few years ago in Chicago, one specimen, perhaps a little precocious, being barely nine and in an advanced stage of pregnancy, was mentioned in the local press because she had been raped by her uncle, and had been taken to a hospital where she would be aborted. Immediately, a passel of men and women, all of the species that is so stupid that it permits itself to be taxed for the comfort of Congoids and to accelerate their breeding, assembled outside the hospital to protest what they called a crime. They wailed that old Jesus had injected a soul into the precious fetus and destined it to grow up to afflict white boobs like themselves. Whether old Jesus had also incited the rape was not clear; perhaps that question did not occur to their clotted minds.

There is one instance in which a similar abortion would have been a crime against humanity. Whether it occurred or not, I unfortunately do not know.

The Weekly World News is given to sensationalism, but, unlike more respected newspapers, it never, so far as is known, invents the stories it publishes. In its issue for 20 December, it stated that a fifteen-year-old female Congoid in Kenya was pregnant and would give birth normally in January. She said she had been raped by a baboon.

There was obviously something wrong with that story, because, as everyone knows, male baboons, having many activities to occupy their time and hold their interest, become sexually aroused only when a female in oestrus presents herself to them and solicits fecundation.

According to the obstetrician's report, however, there was ample proof that the child in the womb had been engendered by a baboon. He had, a priori, believed such an event impossible, because, as you know, baboons are not apes; they are monkeys, and therefore farther removed from the human species, having diverged from the evolutionary line much earlier than gorillas, orangutans, and chimpanzees.[1]

He was, however, convinced that the "young woman was impregnated by a baboon... We are certain the child [in the womb] is not entirely human. It has the facial features of a baboon and appears to be covered with a thick mat of hair."

"God only knows," he added, "how it will behave after it is born. The infant may be weak and helpless like a human—or it may swing from the chandeliers."[2] Obviously, the infant was one that should properly arouse the solicitude of all intelligent persons, and the pregnant mother and her child, when born, deserved the utmost care, since it was a phenomenon that would provide crucial data about the genetics of anthropoids.

There were suggestions of abortion, although an abortion in the eighth month of pregnancy would endanger the life of the mother. I do not know whether the nitwits who "demonstrated" in Chicago would have been certain that Jesus had been at work in Kenya, thus making the semi-baboon sacred as a future customer for holy men, but aborting it would have been a crime against mankind, preventing our race from obtaining scientific information of the utmost value on a crucial matter.

1. The reproductive systems and procedures of human females, of the higher races, at least, differ greatly from those of other primates, thus raising physiological questions that you may wish to consider.

2. The physician was, of course, exaggerating to make his point. Infant baboons require considerable care from their mothers (often assisted by other females in the band) before they are ready to scamper about, but it is true that they develop more rapidly than do infant Congoids, who, in turn, develop much more rapidly than infant Caucasoids (and, no doubt, Mongolians). There are further differences between the White races and subraces, and some indications that Nordic infants develop the most slowly of all.

Unfortunately, I do not know what happened in Nairobi. Unless the reader who kindly sent me the article I have cited overlooked a subsequent item in the Weekly World News, there was no report in the American press, for the New York Times and similar publications well know why American boobs should not be allowed to learn that female Congoids can conceive by baboons.

Baboons, as I have said, are monkeys (Cynocephali), and that is what made the pregnancy in Kenya so astonishing. It has long been believed that human females could conceive by gorillas (Anthropitheci). One apparent hybrid, named Julia Pastrana, became quite famous in the middle of the Nineteenth Century; see the article by Allan Callahan in Liberty Bell, March 1986, pp. 58 ff. The author justly observes that although she exhibited human intelligence, the fact that her child, sired by the man who virtually owned her, closely resembled her corroborates the opinion that she had been engendered by an ape.[3] In January 1976, a similar creature, evidently part gorilla or orangutan (as shown by the published photograph), was purchased for $8000 by an attorney in New York named Michael Miller, who thought it a capital investment from which he intended to profit. I do not know what happened.

3. As Mr. Callahan saw, this is the crucial datum, to be weighed against the report that the creature was born in Mexico, where there are no gorillas or other apes suited to paternity. The truly horrible science of teratology has been largely limited to recording the appearance of anthropoid monsters without ascertaining the genetic causes. The best known examples of monstrous births are the so-called Siamese twins, and some of the most shocking deformity is found in what may be called uncompleted Siamese twins, i.e., the individual, who may live to become adult, is born with some organs that were evidently part of a twin that for some reason ceased to develop further. Some creatures that have been exhibited (like Julia) as partly simian have probably been deformed mulattas or mestizas.

If any reader of these pages knows what was the result of the highly significant pregnancy in Kenya, I shall be very grateful for the information.

BUILDING YOUR FUTURE

The scandalous affair of the Savings & Loan Associations, also known as Building & Loan Associations, has received relatively little attention from its victims, the American taxpayers. Perhaps the world's beasts of burden are so used to their servitude and the yoke about their necks that they realize it would be futile to complain when they are goaded.

There have, of course, been articles in the press, more or less openly predicting that the worst is yet to come. The best that I have seen in a periodical of wide circulation is the series of articles in Forbes by Ashby Bladen, of which the first, in the issue for 21 March 1988, shows that he clearly understood the political causes of the débâcle, although he prudently refrained from tracing them to their source.

The details of the malodorous fraud were set forth in an incisive article by Stephen Pizzo, Mary Fricker, and Paul Muolo, "Inside Job," which appeared in Playboy, presumably in the issue for December 1989, of which a kind correspondent has sent me photocopies. It describes the amazingly audacious swindle carried out by unsavory individuals who are named, and whose antecedents, criminal affiliations, and police records should have prevented even naive persons from entrusting them with so much as one dollar.

Most significant is the blatant ostentation with which the thieves displayed their corruption, traveling in their own private jet planes, living in conspicuously wasteful luxury, proudly displaying vulgar prodigality, and giving lavishly expensive parties at which they provided teams of highly talented whores for their guests. You may at first sight wonder why the many individuals who witnessed the ostentatiously spendthrift antics of the heads of the various Savings & Loan Associations, and knew from the press of some of their patently spurious investments, did not immediately withdraw whatever funds they had entrusted to persons whose apolaustic prosperity could not have been honestly attained. You will see the reason at once: they knew that no matter how much had been stolen, the solvency of the agencies was guaranteed by the taxpaying animals in the United States.

When you read the article you may wonder at the cleverness of scoundrels who can make $30,000,000 disappear overnight, and loot a single agency of $540,000,000 by making loans to pals who intend never to repay them. Individuals so talented might have been useful in really high finance on the international scale, if they had prudently arranged to have their depredations concealed.

What is clear is that the débâcle had been foreseen, if not planned, by the thieves whom the dim-witted taxpayers elect to form the Congress of the United States. A politician, as Mencken observed, confesses that he is a liar, a thief, and a scoundrel, but his racket demands a certain animal shrewdness in addition to the talent to tell nonsense convincingly to the gullible majority of voters. This requires an intelligence which must have perceived the consequences of freeing Savings & Loan Agencies from regulation while making the taxpayers guarantee their solvency. Not even the most fatuous uncle would tell his favorite nephew, "Go, have fun, and I will honor all the cheques you write on my account." That, in effect, is precisely what the Congress made the taxpayers promise.

Congressional complicity is further demonstrated by the efforts of Senators to prevent inquiry into the affairs of obviously bankrupt associations. Whether the Senators received remuneration in the famous brown paper bags that some, when thoroughly soused at lunch, forget and leave on the table,[1] or merely followed the political rule, asinus asinum fricat, is uncertain.

1. Several years ago, the retired maître d'hotel of the Senate restaurant reported in his memoirs that when the drunks happily staggered from their tables, they sometimes left behind paper bags, some of which, if I remember correctly, contained as much as $100,000 in tightly-packed currency.

The world's beasts of burden will be taxed $285,000,000,000 (two hundred and eighty-five billion dollars) to pay for the fun of the heads of the associations that have thus far become bankrupt, and the authors of the article estimate that each individual taxpayer will have to contribute at least one thousand dollars.

But, after all, why not? The stupid creatures have long consented to be taxed for "foreign aid," and to provide prosperity for the Kikes in Israel and for boss niggers in "developing" countries, and nothing can be more certain that creatures so low in intelligence that they would consent to be taxed for "foreign aid" to anyone have become a species of mammal that is no longer viable.

There is, therefore, nothing scandalous or immoral about the looting of the Savings & Loan Associations. If the American imbeciles are willing to give part of their incomes for "foreign aid," they certainly cannot logically object to financing the high-jinks of Jews and other spoilers in the United States, where the money was spent.

Even the most perceptive writers on the subject of the Savings & Loan Associations seemed to treat the matter as unprecedented and unconnected with anything in the past. They do not see that what happened to the Savings & Loan Associations was already determined in 1932.

We are entitled to assume that the future of the United States had been planned, at least in general outline, in the fateful year 1913, when the Congress, at the behest of Sheenies despatched from Germany for that purpose, and in return for bribes that are said to have been absurdly small in comparison with what was sold, violated the Constitution to subject the American people to the owners of the Federal Reserve, for which preparation was made by the Communist device of the Income Tax.

An obvious first step was the First World War, which not only inflicted death, destruction, and bankruptcy on the Aryan nations of Europe and established the Bolsheviks in Russia, but in the United States killed many young Aryans, forced both Federal and state governments to contract enormous debts to the usurers, and, perhaps most important of all, deformed our social structure and demoralized American society.

That war was followed by a blind American reaction, which was speedily contained and reversed by the simple device of precipitating the so-called "economic depression" and thus electing a government of traitors, headed by our great War Criminal, in 1932.

By that time, the future of Savings & Loan Associations was already determined, because the local associations were then eminently safe investments for persons who were content with a modest but secure return on their capital. It was necessary to convert the Americans from saving and investing to spending and borrowing from the usurers. At one time, "New Deal" propaganda even claimed that it was "unpatriotic" to save money: that was "hoarding" and delayed "recovery" from the "depression." It was everyone's duty to spend everything he had.

Led by venal politicians and dim-witted dupes, Federal, state, and local governments borrowed and squandered immense sums, ostensibly to "prime the pump" or construct "improvements" that were spendthrift's luxuries when financed by debt, but actually for the purpose of sabotaging and demoralizing the nation's economy and taxing everyone to pay ever more interest to usurers for imaginary loans, in a progression of which the only possible end will be the bankruptcy of an impoverished nation and its stupid inhabitants.

That is how, by design and crafty deceit, Americans were converted into "a nation of borrowers and spenders," as Mr. Bladen said in 21 March 1988. Were converted, in other words, to a feckless horde of imbecile spendthrifts.

It is true that many felt misgivings when they saw the vogue of policies patently foolish, but they were usually befuddled by the sophistries of shysters who called themselves expert economists and spoke nonsense with assurance and authority. Naive persons assumed that such big brains must perceive factors too abstruse to be tested by common sense.

Financial folly was authorized by the pretentious economics devised by John Maynard Keynes, who claimed that nations and individuals could make themselves rich by spending money borrowed from usurers. His strange and, no doubt, crafty theory[2] was eagerly accepted by the vampires who batten on the credulity of the ignorant, and they financed a propaganda of intensive deception that induced persons who seemed to be both sane and sober to countenance the theft of their property.

The purpose of the "new economics" was not merely to loot the nation; that was just the preliminary to the reinstitution of slavery.

It is obvious, of course, that slavery depends on making the slave totally dependent on his owner for the necessities of life. That required the abolition of private property—real property—before the boobs could be successfully enslaved.

As we all know, the very first targets of the "financiers" were the agrarian part of the population. Ownership of land gave a real independence, even after ownership was impaired by the imposition of taxes to be squandered in various kinds of

2. Keynes was an intelligent man and he cannot have believed what he said. When you read him, your first impression that what he recommends is a moderate use of inflation, and that the guilt falls on politicians who violate that advice, but if you pause to reflect on his proposed remedy, you will see that it really amounts to what a proverbial metaphor in Sanskrit describes as trying to extinguish a fire by feeding it enough wood to glut its appetite. Keynes was a noted pervert, and emotionally unstable. The late Malcolm Muggeridge, who was well acquainted with Keynes and the circle about him, believed that Keynes devised his economic hokum to take vengeance on society, which he blamed for the loss of a favorite "boy-friend." If you reread Keynes with that in mind, you may see in certain quirks of vocabulary and style corroboration of Muggeridge's opinion.

do-gooding. A steady pressure since the 1920s reduced American farmers, once the largest potentially cohesive segment of the population, to a small minority, totally dependent on regulations and handouts from the Federal government, and now being gradually but methodically dispossessed and replaced by coolies from the Orient.

In American towns, the local owners of local hotels, grocery stores, comparatively small factories, and other businesses had a certain limited independence. They have been replaced by the hirelings of enormous corporations of unascertained ownership—hirelings who own nothing, not even the houses they are "buying" at usurious rates on long-term mortgages, and of which they will have to sell their equities, if any, when their masters transfer them to other posts.

Now real estate is really rented from the governmental thieves who impose taxes.

The few corporations that were safe investments so long as there was any social stability have been crippled or looted or are perilously near to being taken over by the enemies of the American people. Government bonds, once thought safe investments, have been made one of the most outrageous swindles by inflation of the currency.

The American serf, soon to become notoriously a slave, now exists to work about five months of the year for his owners, and is temporarily allowed to work the rest of the year for himself. But he is, in fact, owned by the Federal Reserve—totally owned since the last bits of money were taken from the uncomprehending creature and replaced by trading stamps, bits of intrinsically worthless paper of which the purchasing power is being steadily and rapidly reduced, and which will soon become entirely worthless, unless, perhaps, the bits can be "recycled" to manufacture more useful paper.

The Building & Loan Associations that have been and will be made bankrupt were, of course, doomed, long before the present scandal, by manipulation of the currency. They had entered the current phase with much of their funds in loans at interest rates of 6%, 5.5% and sometimes even 4.5% on contracts prohibiting rapid repayment.[3] Naturally, the dividends they paid investors were only 5% or less.

Before the national economy was thoroughly sabotaged, the Savings & Loan Associations could count on a steady recovery of their invested capital as the borrowers paid off in monthly installments the mortgages on the homes they were buying. Almost all such associations therefore guaranteed to their investors the right to reclaim their investment at any time on very short notice. When the Federal Reserve began to ravage the economy by setting high rates of interest, with the hypocritical pretense they were trying to check the inflation they were simultaneously creating, many persons quite naturally wanted to withdraw their capital from the Associations in order to profit by the higher returns that were available elsewhere, often directly from the U.S. Treasury. When the reserves that had been thought an ample cushion against fluctuations were exhausted, the Associations had to borrow at rates capriciously set by the usurers, sometimes more than twelve percent, to honor withdrawals of funds, while they were receiving from their borrowers much lower rates of interest.

Obviously, even honestly managed associations were put under stresses that made them financially unstable by the end of the 1970s, often before. The looting described in the article in Playboy that I have cited was, so to speak, merely the icing on the Federal Reserve's delicious cake.

3. Rates of interest differed in many states, but were always below the legal maximum, because the original purpose of the associations was to encourage persons of moderate means to own their own homes, for that, in a sane America, was regarded as the foundation of a stable society. In most states, the maximum legal rate of interest was 7%, although Texas and a few other 'Western' states allowed 10%. Mortgages on real property in excess of the legal rate were invalid, and the courts usually were reluctant to permit evasion of the legal limits by "finder's fees" or collecting interest before it was earned. In the 1950s, when many insurance companies had a surplus of funds to invest and were debarred from speculative investments, they offered loans on real estate at the low rate of 4.5% provided the borrower would agree not to repay the loan in less than thirty-five years; some Building & Loan agencies tried to meet that competition.

The looting will help put white slaves securely in the ergastula they built for themselves. The slaves seem proud of their fetters, of the iron collar they riveted about their own necks. They are so accustomed to their bonds that they cannot imagine what it would be like to be freemen, as Americans once were.

Many Americans with moderate incomes still believe that Old Ronnie lowered the income tax, although many of them had to pay more last year with the abolition of certain exemptions and allowances, and will, of course, always pay much more by virtue of the continuous inflation of the Federal Reserve's trading stamps.

Experts differ as to whether the insurance companies or the banks will be the next to be collapsed. A secondary question is whether either or both operations are to precede the next war, which is surely now being secretly arranged and scheduled. The answers to both questions are known, of course, only to the owners of the United States, i.e., the owners of the Federal Reserve.

There has been some muttering of discontent with present and coming slavery, but there is nothing you can do about it.[4]

There was a time when the American people could have recovered control of their currency. A sagacious and courageous lady, Gertrude M. Coogan, a highly respected financial adviser, warned them in 1935—yes, 1935—in her book, Money Creators,[5] which was sponsored by former Senator Robert L. Owen, who had been Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking

4. In 1981 James von Brunn made a valiant attempt to force consideration of the constitutionality of the Federal Reserve Act in a Federal court. He was released from prison on probation in 1989.

5. The book is available from Liberty Bell Publications, $8.00 + $1.50 postage.

and Currency in 1913, and had himself drafted the original bill for establishment of the Federal Reserve system, and who was still a member of the Senate in 1920, when he saw and protested the beginning of the Federal Reserve's calculated measures to inflate and then break the national economy, although he did not then perceive that the purpose was to create the "economic depression" that, in turn, permitted the election of the crypto-Communist monster who became the great War Criminal of all time.

Had the American people been willing to face a few unpleasant facts in 1935, they might have remained a relatively free people. It may not have been too late for them to avoid slavery in 1959, when an honest officer of the Federal Reserve, Malcolm Bryan, was President of the Federal District that had its capitol in Atlanta, Georgia, who told his fellows, "If a policy of active or permissive inflation is to be a fact, then we can secure the shreds of our self-respect only by announcing the policy.... We should have the decency to say to the money-saver, 'Hold still, little fish; all we intend to do is gut you."

The little fish wanted to be gutted, it seems. The country and all the Americans in it have been gutted, and now there is nothing they or you can do about it.

You can do nothing about it because the Federal Reserve now owns you and can squash you at any time you trouble your masters. And, anyway, unless you are a very exceptional American, you wouldn't want to do anything about it—not if you know what is really involved.

Who are your owners? They are of course the secret owners of the Federal Reserve's Class A stock. And who are they?

The secret has leaked out in recent years according to reports which are substantially in agreement. The last report, which has just come to me, is in a bulletin issued on 27 March 1990 by James E. Braddock, managing principal of an investment group in Albuquerque, New Mexico. He says that "according to very accurate sources in Zurich and Saudi Arabia," the owners of the Federal Reserve are, "in order of their ownership":

1. Rothschild Banks of London and Berlin.
2. Lazard Brothers Banks of Paris.
3. Israel Moses Saif Banks of Italy
4. Warburg Bank of Hamburg and Amsterdam
5. Lehman Brothers Bank of New York
6. Kuhn, Loeb Bank of New York
7. Chase Manhattan Bank of New York
8. Goldman, Sachs Bank of New York.

All the owners are obviously Sheenies, with the possible exception of the Rockefellers, who are believed to own the Chase Manhattan Bank. Many believe them to be Jewish, but they could be only accomplices in crime; a careful study of their genealogy will be necessary before their claim to be White can be irrefragably refuted or confirmed.

Now you see where that leaves us. Surely no good Christian American could ever be so bigoted and wicked as to become a Nazi and be ungrateful for the privilege of licking the dirty feet[6] of the divine race whom his God placed over him and all other lower animals. Why, that would be aunteye-Seemittic! Better, far better, to live and die in righteous slavery.

OUR JEWDICIAL SYSTEM

Many Americans, with their talent for ignoring the obvious, still imagine that their courts are concerned with the administration of justice in litigation that comes before them. When a wolf seizes a sheep in a pasture, the rest of the flock stops grazing and runs in a general sauve qui peut. Sheep are stupid mammals, but they at least become aware of their danger and have not lost their instinct of self-preservation. A flock of Aryans, however, just goes on grazing, too busy feeding to notice what is happening to one of them.

6. Assuming, of course, that although you are not an Aryan king, you are entitled to share in the privilege of washing Kikes' dirty feet with your tongue, in conformity with the orders which, as all good Christians well know, were issued by their god, whose very words are quoted in their Holy Book, Isaiah 49,23.
